"Hush!" breathed Mat, half-afraid, turning a hurried look towards the door, and allowing Tileston to press her hand as she did so.

"I've a notion," commenced Tileston again, "of my own, of building up myself and Tileston.

The old man has got plenty of funds, I am his only son, and you are the only heir of your uncle. Now, Mat, ahem, ahem—" (Tileston had a strong phthisic affection of the throat just then.) However, after turning about, going to the window, and then re-seating himself just as he was before, he leaned his head towards Mat, who was making a cat's-cradle of her apron-strings, and whispered, "Mat, do you love me?"

Whether there was a sudden reviving of the flickering of the embers on the hearth, or a last effort of the dying candle to illumine her answer, was indeterminate. But certain it was, that there was a fire-red glow upon a certain fair face, and a "No you don't," from the rosy mouth which Will Tileston took the liberty at that moment to taste of.

"But I am in earnest, Mat. I am a man now, two-and-twenty last Monday week. You know the cottage down by the mill—that's mine, when I've a mind to settle down. If you and I can agree, and can bring the old folks to agree with us, I will make the old mill-pond soon ring with the mallet and hammer. Tell me quick, Mattie, do you love me?"

Mat had at this juncture escaped from the room to replenish the fire and the candle, and coming laughingly along, with an apron full of cobs to serve as fuel and light too (Aunt Greg having prohibited another candle), Tileston extended his arm to force her into acquiescence, she dropped her apron accidentally into the fire, and in a moment her whole dress was in a blaze. Tileston screamed with affright, and Aunt Greg and her spouse, both in their robes de nuit, rushed into the room to find Mat gasping in the arms of Will Tileston, who was showing his solicitude in every imaginable way. Uncle Greg was startled at this phase in affairs, never having known the particular penchant of young Tileston for his niece. Though Aunt Greg frowned at first, and then after Mat had been taken to her room, more scared than hurt, she sought the apartment where her spouse and Will Tileston were discussing the delicate theme of marrying Mattie Millis.

"Marrying!" broke in Aunt Greg, "why, the child haint knit her own stockings only this year—you are crazy, Mr. Greg!"

"But you shall have a sewing-machine to help you," broke in young Tileston, "the very first one there will be in town. I will warrant your conviction when you see the beauty of its motions; its humming will be sweeter than was ever Mat's voice. She has been rather a troublesome sewing-machine, I suppose. How is it with Uncle Greg's frock sleeves, any gussets to them yet?"

The dame was rather affronted at first, but seeing a broad grin on the face of the old farmer, she thought better of her ill-nature, and replied:

"Well, I've nothing to say about it. She's the old man's relation instead of mine, he can say what he pleases." It is useless to detail any more about the stratagem of young Tileston, of the illness of Mattie Millis; enough that the old farmer did not say no, and the old rail fence that marked the boundary around the mill-pond on Greg's Hill, disappeared in a few weeks, and the echoes in that vicinity were aroused by the creaking of timber and hewing of stone, and a lofty building soon rose to view, with the sign, "Tileston & Co., Tool Factory," on the very sight where Tileston and Mat had trysted time and again, and talked of the white cottage, in which was in reality settled another Tileston & Co.

In the farmer's kitchen, beside the same window where the first scene of this sketch was laid, about two years after might have been seen Aunt Greg stitching a hemp frock on one of those disputed sewing-machines, while a blue-eyed, curly-haired youngster was crawling upon the carved work beneath, and incommoding Aunt Greg's busy foot, she reprimanded him with:

"Take care, Willie, aunty can't sew."

Farmer Greg's hired man was hitching the oxen to a new-fangled concern called a cultivator, just as the old farmer drove up with the long wagon, and called him to help lift out another of the silly notions of Will Tileston, destined to supercede the old shovel in shelling corn. Meanwhile the old man muttered to himself:

"Corn is worth a dollar a bushel! The rats gnawed into the cornhouse, last winter and carried off half my crop; this ere machine will fill my bags, and when the crop is turned into cash, 'twill fix the vermin. But then, when I think how things are changed, I can't believe my eyes. That scamp of a Tileston that carried off our Mat, how he laughed at me one day when he saw my corn-sheller—but then he's a mighty smart fellow, and I have never begrudged Mat her setting out."

LOVE.

True love's the gift which God has given
To man alone beneath the heaven.

It is the secret sympathy,
The silver link, the silken tie,
Which heart to heart, and mind to mind,
In body and in soul can bind.—WALTER SCOTT.

Wisdom is wealth; but if there was no other wealth than the wealth of wisdom, the world would be shockingly poor.

GONE BEFORE.

BY MRS. B. B. EDSON.

It is very lonely now, darling,
 Since that quiet autumn eve,
 When you meekly folded your loving hands,
 And told us not to grieve;
 For though o'er the light of our earthly love
 The shadows were settling down,
 You saw on the bright, the further shore,
 The gleam of the promised crown.

You asked me to think in the coming years,
 Mid the toils and the cares of life,
 Of her who had been ten happy years
 Your loved and loving wife;
 And when the pang of this parting hour
 Should be dulled by the lapse of years,
 And the quiet joy and the old-time smile
 Have taken the place of tears;

When the grief that is surging so wildly now
 Shall be changed to a quiet flow,
 I know you will never quite forget
 The loved one of long ago;

And when the fair shores of the better land
 Shall break on your fading sight,
 You will know I only went before,
 To make it more homelike and bright.

Dear heart, the sweet home of rest above
 Grows nearer since thou art there,
 And all defects of doubt and fear
 Are vanishing into air;
 And the sullen surge from the unknown shore,
 So vague and undefined,
 Is parted now by the golden wake
 Your love has left behind!

And I think, with the thrill that the mariner feels,
 Who has been long and long away,
 When he sees the blue hills and the headlands rise
 Through the mists of the opening day,
 That a few more weary leagues of space,
 And a few more lagging hours,
 Shall bring me safe where the swinging lamps
 Hang down from the pearly towers!

A NIGHT OF TERROR.

BY JOHN B. WILLIAMS, M. D.

I SHALL never forget to the last day of my life, my emotions of joy when I was called up, on the evening of the Commencement of the University Medical College, in the city of New York, to receive my diploma authorizing me to practise as a physician. The idea of being able hereafter to write John Merrifield with M. D. after my name, was a sufficient reward for all my hard study; and I remember the next day I did nothing else but write it on a piece of paper to see how it would look. This vanity is perhaps pardonable, when it is remembered that for three years I had been looking forward to that happy day; that it was the end of all my ambition; that for this privilege I had burned the midnight oil; and that I looked upon it as a stepping-stone to a respectable position in the world, if not to fortune and renown. I little knew the trials and difficulties a young physician has to undergo to gain even a moderate competence; but I suppose I expected that I should jump into practice at once, and rich patients, large fees and successful cures formed the staple of my thoughts.

I determined that I would settle in the city, as affording me a larger scope where to exercise the abilities I thought I possessed. The very next day I hired a suitable office in Bleeker Street, fixed my "shingle," in all the glory of gold letters on a black ground, to the side of the house, furnished my apartment in a very moderate style, and then sat down in my office to wait for patients.

And I had to wait days, weeks, nay, even months elapsed, and no patients came. My small means were slowly dwindling away, and I saw no prospect of time effecting any improvement in my circumstances. I began to despair, and resolved several times that I would give up my profession and seek some other employment, which would at least afford me a means of support. At last I came to a fixed resolution on the subject, and determined that if another week did not bring me a patient, I would at once take down my sign, scratch out M. D. from my name, and endeavor to procure a situation as clerk in a drug-store, for which position my previous education qualified me.

Six days passed, and not a soul came; the seventh (it was Sunday, how well I remember it!) dawned. It was a bitter cold day in March, and the streets were covered to some depth with snow. I advanced to my office-window and gazed listlessly into the street. It looked so hopelessly cheerless outside that it struck a chill into my heart, and I sat down in my "Boston rocker" utterly dispirited. I attempted to read, but the words swam before my eyes and I threw down the book. I could only gaze into the fire, and endeavor to read my future fate in the glowing coals.

I might have been thus occupied an hour or more, when I was aroused by a violent ring at my office-bell. At first I thought it was only my imagination, and rubbed my eyes to see if I had not been dozing. A second ring, even more violent than the first, caused me, however, to start to my feet. I ran to the door and opened it, and found standing there a young girl about seventeen or eighteen years of age. The passage was rather dark, so I could not see her features well.

• "Does Doctor Merrifield live here?" she asked, in a sweetly musical voice.

"I am Doctor Merrifield," I replied.

"Would you be kind enough to come and see my father, sir? He is very sick, and wishes you to come immediately."

At last, my first patient had come!

"Where does your father live?" I tremblingly asked.

"He lives in the Third Avenue, near Sixteenth Street. I will accompany you, if you have no objection. You might not find the house, as there is no number on the door. I have a hack at the door."

To put on my hat and overcoat was the occupation of but a moment, and in another minute I found myself seated by the side of the young girl in the hack. It was only then that I had an opportunity of seeing her features, and I was immediately struck with her extreme beauty. As I have before said, she was about eighteen years of age. She was above the medium height, and her features were faultlessly regular. Her hair was bright auburn, her eyes dark blue, and her long eyelashes gave that dreamy expression to her face so charming in woman. She evidently possessed a fine mind, for her forehead was lofty, and her actions and motions showed that she had been endowed with a refined education.

We spoke but little while in the carriage. She answered my interrogations as to her father's symptoms, with an eagerness which showed that her whole thoughts were centred in him, and perceiving her pre-occupation, I did not attempt to discuss any other subject.

At last we stopped before the door of her father's house, and I descended from the vehicle and having assisted the young lady to alight, I glanced at the building in which my first patient resided. It was a substantial-looking edifice, standing a little back from the street, and everything around it betokened easy circumstances, if not wealth. The young lady led the way, and in answer to her summons at the front door, it was speedily opened, and we entered a spacious hall. Requesting me to remain in the parlor for a moment or two, my fair companion tripped nimbly up stairs.

While she was gone I had an opportunity of examining the apartment. It was elegantly furnished, and gave the same evidence of more than a moderate income which the exterior did. The walls were decorated with handsome oil paintings, and from the large number of sea-subjects, I judged that my patient had been a sailor. While I was examining the pictures, the young lady re-entered the room and informed me that her father, Captain Linton, was ready to receive me. Escorted by Miss Linton, I ascended the stairs and was shown into the captain's bedroom. The bed on which my patient reclined was at the further end of the chamber. The moment I entered, he stretched out his hand, and I took my place by his side.

He was an elderly man, and at first glance did not appear to be very sick. His face was full, and excepting an anxious expression to be traced on it, bore evidence of good health. The moment, however, that I placed my fingers on his pulse, I discovered the secret of his malady, for it was intermittent. I knew even before examination, that he was suffering from organic disease of the heart. He answered all my questions calmly and to the point. After an interview of about half an hour, I prescribed a sedative and returned to my office.

The next day I visited him again and found that he was something better. I conversed with him longer than I had done the first day, and found him to be a highly intelligent man, full of anecdote and valuable information. It was as I had previously supposed; he had followed the sea as a profession, and had been the captain of a privateer during the war of 1812. He had taken many valuable prizes, and from his successful career had amassed quite a fortune.

I need not dwell on this part of my history; suffice it to say that I attended Captain Linton for three weeks. During this time I had frequent opportunities of seeing his daughter, and my acquaintance with her only served to increase the favorable opinion I had entertained on our first interview. She was a charming girl, full of grace, gentleness, and what the French call esprit. It was, therefore, with no small degree of pleasure that I heard Captain Linton, when he was able to dispense with my professional services, request me to drop in now and then and pay them a friendly visit. Helen Linton had frequently when I was alone with her, asked me my opinion of her father's condition. Without wishing to alarm her seriously, I thought it my duty to intimate in pretty plain language that his heart was organically diseased, and that he might be taken away at any moment. She heard my opinion with tears in her eyes, and begged that I would do everything in my power to persuade him to follow a strict regimen. This I promised to do, and really think my advice had some weight with the hardy old seaman, for I noticed on subsequent visits that he indulged much less in stimulants than he used to do.

I do not know how the feeling crept on me, or what fostered its birth, but I seemed as it were to find myself suddenly in love with Helen Linton. I suppose it was the thorough awakening of my mind to all her noble qualities, that caused me to draw the conclusion that she would make me an excellent wife. Be that as it may, I found myself visiting there every night, and really looked upon myself as one of the family. Helen always received me with empressment, and yet I could not tell whether she simply viewed me in the light of a dear friend, or entertained any tenderer feelings in her heart.

One day, however, I determined to know my fate, and taking advantage of her father's absence, I poured into her ear a flood of impassioned eloquence which proceeded from my heart. I had the supreme happiness of imprinting on her lips the seal of an accepted lover. That same evening I asked her hand of the captain, when he returned home. The only reply he made was to place her hand in mine and repeat a prayer for our happiness. I shall not attempt to paint our joy. It was decided that in a month from that time we should be married. Since my first attendance on Captain Linton, patients began to drop in, and I was getting together quite a good practice.

Three weeks passed on, and the preparations for our wedding were all completed, when I suddenly received a message from Helen, begging me to come immediately, as her father was very sick. I obeyed the summons, but before I got to the house he was dead! Instead of a wedding we had a funeral. Helen was terribly affected by her father's death. Of course our wedding was postponed, and it was decided that she should go and spend a few months with an uncle who lived at a small village called Industry, on the banks of the Ohio. Our parting was an affecting one, but we were cheered by the hope of soon meeting again; for it was agreed between us that after she had been visiting there a month, I should go and see her.

She had been gone about a week, when to my great surprise and consternation, I received a letter from her uncle, Mr. Henry Linton, stating that she had not arrived at his house, and begging some explanation of the delay, at the same time expressing a hope that it was not occasioned by sickness. I did not think it necessary to answer this letter, for I determined at once to go on. I made a hasty arrangement with a fellow-practitioner to attend to my patients during my absence, and that same evening I procured a through ticket to Wheeling, and in a few hours had left New York far behind.

When I reached Wheeling I made the necessary inquiries at the various hotels, and succeeded in tracing Helen there. I also discovered that she had taken passage in a boat to Wellsville. To this last place I hastened with all the celerity I was capable of exercising. Here, however, I lost all trace of her, and nothing was left for me but to go on to Industry, for I thought that perhaps she might have arrived at her relative's house since the latter had been despatched to New York.

When I reached Mr. Linton's house, I found to my consternation that she had not been heard of. Her uncle was extremely surprised to learn that she had left New York, for he had supposed something had detained her. He immediately despatched messengers in every direction to search for her. I would have accompanied them, but I was physically unable to do so, for I was so thoroughly exhausted that I could scarcely stand. Mr. Linton insisted on my resting for the night. Much against my inclination I was compelled to comply with his request.

I woke early the next morning, very much refreshed, and hurrying on my clothes descended into the garden, where, through the window, I saw my host walking up and down one of the paths in an agitated manner.

"Good morning, doctor," he said, "as soon as he saw me. "I suppose you are off again."

"Yes. I will search the earth through but I will find her."

"God grant you may be successful!"

"You speak doubtfully—you cannot think anything serious has befallen Helen."

"I hope not—I trust not, but we live in strange times."

There was something so peculiar in the tone in which he spoke, that I gazed earnestly at the speaker.

"You are alarmed and agitated," I exclaimed.

"Tell me what it is you fear."

"Doctor, I ought to tell you, and yet I am afraid of exciting your fears needlessly, but on reflection, it is perhaps better that you should know all."

"You do indeed alarm me. You have heard some bad news. Speak, I conjure you."

"No, I have heard no bad news, I have heard nothing at all of Helen. But, doctor, there is something very mysterious transpiring in our neighborhood. No less than four or five of our best citizens and several strangers have suddenly disappeared from our midst, and nothing more has been heard of them, and all this within six months."

"But have they been sought for, and is it certain they did not leave of their own free will?"

"If only one or two had disappeared, that would be a very just suspicion, but it is impossible that five respectable farmers and merchants would desert their wives and children, as these men have done. You ask me if search has been made for them. The most minute and careful search has been instituted; in fact, the whole country has been scoured for miles, but not the slightest trace of the missing individuals could be found."

"How strange! What is supposed to have become of them?"

"Heaven only knows! There are a hundred rumors afloat, but nothing reliable in any of them. The thought struck me this morning that perhaps Helen may have disappeared in this manner."

"That is scarcely possible," I returned—at the same time I felt a chill strike my heart. "Surely no one would harm a young girl. Your suspicions will, however, stimulate me to fresh exertions. Is there any particular locality where these people who have disappeared were last seen or heard of?"

"As I before told you, these parties who disappeared were farmers, and most of them were returning from Rochester, a town eight miles from here, where they had been to dispose of their produce. They were traced to Rochester, where they did their business, and were then traced out of that town; then all further clue was lost."

"It is certain then, that the ambuscade, or whatever may be the cause of their disappearance, lies between Rochester and Industry?"

"So it would seem, but every foot of ground has been thoroughly explored without any success at all."

A domestic now came to inform us that breakfast was ready. After a hurried meal, I jumped on the back of a horse which I borrowed from Mr. Linton, and determined that I would explore for myself the road between Industry and Rochester.

It was a beautiful spring morning, and in spite of my anxiety, I could not help noticing the charming country through which I passed. On one side of me was the silvery Ohio, flashing and sparkling in the beams of the morning sun, as if it were greeting its bride. The trees were musical with birds, and covered with the bright green verdure which they assume in the spring of the year. While I was pursuing my journey, I could not help thinking on all I had heard, and the more I reflected on it, the more extraordinary it appeared; at the same time it did not seem to me to be at all probable that Helen had shared the same fate, whatever it might be.

It was while indulging in these thoughts that I reached Rochester. I visited every portion of the town, but could not learn that any one answering to Helen's description had been seen there. It was night by the time I had concluded my search, and I must own my mind was considerably relieved that I had heard nothing of Helen—for the conversation I had with some of the inhabitants of the town, only served to confirm all that Mr. Linton had told me.

It was quite dark when I left Rochester for Industry, but as I had only eight miles to travel I set off at a gallop, expecting to reach the latter place in less than an hour. I had, however, not proceeded more than two or three miles, when my horse fell suddenly lame, and I found that he could proceed no further. I dismounted, and leading him by the bridle, walked for half a mile, when I came to a large inn or tavern, which I had noticed in the morning when I passed along the road.

It was now about ten o'clock, and I determined I would leave my horse there for the night and try and procure another animal from the landlord, which would convey me to my destination. I advanced to the door of the inn, and knocked loudly. Although I could see a light burning in the interior, no reply was made to my summons. I knocked again more loudly than at first, and after a minute or two the bolts were withdrawn, and a man appeared. I made known my request to him; he informed me that he could not let me have another horse, but that I could sleep there until the morning, when a stage would pass the house.

I debated a minute or two in my own mind as to what was best to be done. It was late, and I knew that Mr. Linton would scarcely expect me at that hour, and the idea of walking five or six miles on a road concerning which such terrible stories were rife, was by no means an agreeable one. Not that I felt afraid, for I had taken the precaution to arm myself with a revolver. I finally made up my mind to accept the landlord's offer, and consigning my horse to his care, I entered the house and made my way to the parlor, where I found a woman seated by the fire, whom I afterwards learned was the landlord's wife. I sat down after making a few general remarks, and was soon rejoined by the landlord.

He was a strong, healthy-looking man, with a remarkable mild face and pleasant smile, the very impersonation of a jolly host. His wife was also a very fine-looking woman, with an excellent expression of countenance. I felt perfectly at home in a minute, and we conversed on a hundred different topics.

"By-the-by," said I, after a pause in our conversation, "the road between here and Industry bears a bad reputation, if I am to believe all the reports concerning it."

"You may well say reports, sir," said the host of the White Swan. "The fact is, I don't believe there is a word of truth in the matter. I have lived on this road now going on twenty-two years, and I never saw anything wrong here. It's my belief that the first man who disappeared went out West, and anybody that wants to leave takes advantage of the excitement, and by this means conceals his flight."

"That supposition is very reasonable," I returned; "but I am informed the men who have disappeared were all of the highest respectability."

"That may be, sir, but there's no fathoming the human heart—a man may lead a seemingly virtuous life, and yet in his heart may be everything that is bad. What makes me think that my supposition in this matter is a correct one, is the fact that a man was here the other day and stated to me that he had seen one of the missing men in Wisconsin."

"If that is the case, it certainly goes far to explain the mystery. It is a pity the fact is not made public and positive proof adduced; it would tend to disabuse the public mind."

"If the truth could be made manifest, it would do me a great deal of good, for I assure you, sir, since these reports have been circulated, my business has suffered terribly. Formerly my house used to be always full, now scarcely anybody visits it. If it were not for what I make at my business as a carpenter, we should starve."

We prolonged the conversation for some time longer, when I expressed a wish to retire to bed. I noticed for the first time a peculiar glance pass between the man and the woman, which afterwards returned with terrible significance to my mind, but at the time I paid but little heed to it.

"The white room," suggested the landlord's wife.

"No, the red room," returned the landlord, knitting his brows—which action had the effect of silencing her, for she offered no further objection.

The landlord handed me a lamp and ushered me into my chamber. It was a large, old-fashioned apartment, with a high ceiling and polished floor, for strange to say, it was without a shred of carpet or matting to cover it. The bed was a heavy four-poster, with thick red curtains drawn close all round it. The furniture in the room was old but strong and substantial, and the walls were covered with several large sporting prints. The landlord bade me good night and left me to my own reflections.

When he had gone, I went to the window and looked out on the night. A glorious sight met my gaze. The moon was at its full, and rode through the heavens in all the majesty of its solitary splendor. Through the trees I could see the waters of the Ohio flashing in the moonlight. I put out the light that I might better enjoy the scene, and fastening the curtains back, seated myself close to the casement, and supporting my head with my hand, delivered myself up to my own reflections.

In what I have written, I have dwelt but little on the condition of my own feelings since Helen had been lost, but the reader must not imagine on that account that I did not feel this trial poignantly. It was now, especially as I gazed on the beautiful scene before me, that the recollection of her glorious character, of her noble heart, of her devotion, all came back in a flood to my heart, and unmanly though it may seem, the tears coursed each other down my cheeks. Although her disappearance was most mysterious, I could not bring myself to believe that any accident had befallen her. I thought that perhaps, instead of getting off the boat at Wellsville, she might, through accident, have gone on to Pittsburgh, and be detained there from some unavoidable cause.

It was while plunged in the midst of these reflections, that I distinctly heard a stealthy step on the stairs, and almost directly afterwards the door opened gently, and the landlord's wife put her head in.

"Did you want anything?" I asked, rising up in a standing posture.

"We thought you called," said the woman, withdrawing her head.

"No," I returned, "you are mistaken, I did not call. I want nothing."

"I beg your pardon, sir. Good night."

"Good night."

And the woman closed the door, and left me alone again. It was now that suspicion began to creep into my mind. There was something very strange in this woman's visit to my apartment. I could not believe that they thought I had called. The night was too still and calm to admit the possibility of such a mistake. Then recurred to my mind the look which had passed between them when I expressed a wish to be shown to my chamber. Still, my suspicions took no tangible shape, but only determined me to keep all my senses about me. The thought certainly did strike me once or twice that perhaps this innkeeper might have something to do with the mysterious disappearances, but when I remembered his honest face, I repelled the idea as being most chimerical. After a little time, I dismissed the subject from my thoughts, and resumed my occupation of gazing on the silver river.

One sense I possess in a very acute degree, namely, the faculty of hearing. Ever since I was a boy I have been able to distinguish sounds, while to the majority of persons a complete silence reigns. I suddenly became conscious that some one was listening at my chamber door. It may be that I was more on the alert than usual. My plan was immediately formed. It was evident that for some purpose or other, the worthy host and his wife wished me in bed, so without making any preparation whatever, I threw myself dressed as I was, on the bed. I was immediately conscious that the person left the door, retreating down stairs.

It was now my turn to exercise a little diplomacy, for I was by this time assured that there was something very unusual in all this. I rose quietly from the bed and concealed myself in the folds of the window-curtains, determined to watch and wait. I remained in this position for at least half an hour, without a single sound reaching my ear, and was about to go to bed in good earnest, when I heard the clanking of iron in the room immediately underneath the one I occupied. It was very faint and resembled, as near as I could tell, the hooking of one iron chain to another. I now felt certain that something extraordinary was about to occur. Another long pause, however, followed. It might have been perhaps half an hour, when happening to turn my eyes in the direction of the bed (on which the moon was shining), I saw the top of it oscillate, and then, to my intense surprise, it began to sink slowly through the floor, a large trap-door having opened for that purpose.

More determined than ever to penetrate this mystery—for I was now satisfied that the mysterious disappearances were in a fair way of being explained—I stole gently forward, and before the bed had wholly disappeared, I had clung firmly to one of the bed-posts, the bed-curtains concealing me from a casual observer.

The bedstead continued to descend so gently and slowly that its motion was scarcely perceptible, and I am certain had I been asleep, I should not have felt it. I was not aware at the time how far we went, but it seemed to me to be a considerable depth. At last the motion ceased, and I watched with some anxiety to see what was next to be done. I had not to wait long, for suddenly a heavy iron plate, which appeared to come out of the top of the bed, fell with tremendous force on the bed itself. It is certain if I had been lying there, I should have been instantly killed. As it was, I was shaken from my hold and fell on damp earth. I was not hurt, however, and was immediately aware that I must be in a species of cellar, or cave, from the softness of the ground. I rose on my feet, and endeavored to penetrate the darkness which surrounded me, but I was unable to see a single ray of light.

I groped my way along an uneven wall, until at last I came to a round projection. Passing round this by the aid of my hands, I saw the glimmering of a light which proceeded from an opening in this subterranean chamber, for such it proved to be. I cautiously advanced to this opening and glanced through it, and who should I see there but the landlord and his wife! They were conversing together, and their voices distinctly reached my ear.

"I suppose his business is finished by this time," said the landlord.

"Have you let down the iron plate?"

"Certainly, two or three minutes ago. It kills very surely, that's one comfort."

"John, I wish you had saved this stranger's life," said his wife.

"Why so?"

"Well, we've shed blood enough."

"Pshaw, you're growing squeamish!"

"Do you think he had much money about him?"

"I don't know, but he has a splendid gold watch, and that's something."

At that moment their conversation was interrupted by a scream so loud that it seemed to shake the very ground. Every particle of blood receded from my heart, for I thought I recognized the voice.

"There's that girl screaming again," said the landlord of the inn. "If it had not been for you, I would have settled her business long ago—but you have dissuaded me from it. I tell you what, though, she shall die to-night."

"No, John, don't murder that poor girl."

"What will you do with her?"

"I don't know yet—but let her live."

"No, she must die!"

"John, you must not—cannot kill her."

"But I will though—and this very minute, too!"

"You shall not—you shall not!"

"Hold your tongue, wretch!" exclaimed the landlord.

"I say, John, I will not allow you to kill her

"You will not, hey? Take that for your trouble then."

And I heard the villain give her a blow which evidently felled her to the ground, for she was silent after it.

I now saw the innkeeper, with a bowie-knife between his teeth, stealthily leave the cell, and with a candle in his hand, direct his steps towards the further end of the cavern, where I saw, by the rays of the candle, a circular projection similar to the one he had just left. His fearful purpose was only too apparent. I followed, close to his heels, the soft ground preventing my footsteps being heard.

Another thrilling and heart-rending shriek reached my ears. My only wonder now is, that I did not seize the assassin there and then. But I suppose I was afraid I should never be able to find Helen in that accursed place, unless guided to her place of confinement; at all events, I thought it better to allow him to proceed. He unlocked a grated door and entered a dismal-looking cell. I glided in after him, and saw my beloved girl bound hand and foot to an iron bedstead.

"Young girl," said the villain, as he entered, "I will give you two minutes to say your prayers in—you must die!"

"O, spare me—spare me!" shrieked Helen. "O, John, John, why are you not here to protect me?"

"I am here!" I exclaimed, seizing the villain by the throat, and almost choking the life out of him.

The moment he saw me, he was completely paralyzed, for I suppose he thought I was some one risen from the dead. I bound him hand and foot, and then proceeded to release Helen. I shall not attempt to describe our meeting, for any words I might use would but feebly portray the delights of us both. The cause of her appearance there was explained in a few words. By some mistake, she was landed at Rochester instead of Wellsville, and on inquiring on the wharf the way to Industry, he told her that he was going there and would take her to the stage. This man was no other than the landlord of the inn, and he conveyed her and all her luggage to his dwelling and confined her, as the readers have seen, in the cell underground. His sole motive appeared to have been plunder. He would doubtless, however, have murdered her at once, had it not been for his wife, who had not yet lost every particle of humanity from her heart.

I locked the villain up in the cell where Helen had been so lately confined, and then went to where his wife was lying, still insensible. I found in this apartment a winding staircase, which led to rooms up stairs. I carried the landlord's wife up these stairs and confined her in a bedroom, and then, accompanied by Helen, as soon as it was light, we returned to Rochester.

In a few hours both the man and his wife were in custody, and they were tried a few months afterwards. They attempted no defence, for the remains of all the missing men were found, and the proof was overwhelming. The man was hung and the woman sent to State Prison for life.

The inn, until it was burnt down a year or two ago, was a place of great curiosity, and the proprietor of it reaped a handsome fortune from showing its mysteries. It appeared that the criminal, who, as the reader knows, was a carpenter by business, possessed great mechanical skill, and began the alterations in his house more for his own amusement than for any evil design, but when he had finished them, the thought struck him that he might make them subserve his own private purposes. One thing led on to another, and the first crime committed, all remorse was stifled and he plunged boldly and deeply into every description of iniquity. The mechanical contrivances were perfect, and defied ordinary penetration to discover them. There was no other outlet to the cave, excepting through the lower floor of the dwelling, and the trap-door was so ingeniously concealed, that when the secret was known, but few could distinguish the spot where it opened.

I will not attempt to paint Mr. Linton's joy when I confided his niece to his care. His advice to us was to be married immediately. We were of the same opinion, and before I returned to New York, I called Helen by the endearing name of wife.

DOMESTIC LIFE.

How sweet is it when the heart expands and the mind kindles by reciprocated kindness and knowledge. And sweeter far in domestic life is it to rest the wearied heart and mind on the chastened expression of sympathy, lighting up the well-known and beloved countenance of one who has often treated our sorrows with compassion, returned long-suffering to our tryingsness, and shown enduring fidelity in our burdens—endeared to us like a gallant ship, which, though the gloss of its new paint and rigging may be worn less bright, yet in its very scars marks the tenacity with which its anchors have held, and its rudder answered the helmsman, through many a tempest.—Mrs. Schimmelpenninck

SONG.

BY J. WAKEFIELD.

Had I as a stranger met thee,
Had we parted as we met,
It were easy to forget thee—
Now, I never can forget!

Till my pulse has ceased its beating,
Till my heart lies still and cold,
Memory shall be found repeating
That one name, so dear of old.

But while memory tells me of thee,
Breathes that treacherous name of thine,
I can neither hate nor love thee—
Would that love or hate were mine!

I would love thee had I never Learned the treachery of thy heart;
I could hate thee hadst thou ever
Been to me what now thou art.

Once I loved thee and believed thee,
In my blind idolatry;
But thy serpent-tongue deceived me:
O, 'twas cruel—such from thee!

Then, farewell!—the word is spoken,
And we must forever part;
All the dearest ties are broken
Which should bind thee to my heart.

THE STOLEN GOLD PIECE.

BY ISABELLA BELL.

At twelve years of age Walter Stevens became an orphan, and was thrown homeless, penniless and friendless upon the cold, wicked world. But God never forsakes his children in their hour of need. A friend was raised up for him in the person of Mr. Hall, whose kind heart was moved with compassion at the sight of the sorrowing, destitute boy, and he took him home, and gave him employment in his store. It was an act of pure disinterested benevolence, for he did not need his services; he was a man in moderate circumstances, doing a small business, and he and his clerk could perform with ease all that there was to do. But the boy was penniless, with no place to lay his head, and acting upon the basis of a broad Christian love, he brought the child to his own house, and made him a member of his family; and this was not all, he sent him to school a portion of the year, instructed him evenings, and gave him all the advantages his limited income would allow. Mrs. Hall, too, like a true woman as she was, entered into all her husband's views, and seconded all his plans for the benefit of the young orphan.

Walter Stevens had been with Mr. Hall two years at the time our story commences, and had proved himself a smart, active, hard-working lad, thoroughly devoted to the interests of his benefactors; for Mr. and Mrs. Hall, his affections and gratitude were unbounded, and they in their turn reposed in him the highest confidence and regard.

"Walter," said Mr. Hall, as he stood with his hat in hand, ready to leave for his place of business—"you need not come to the store for two hours. It is so stormy this morning there will be but few customers in, and Henry and I can attend to them well enough without you, so you may have the time to devote to your studies." And then turning to his wife who was just then passing through the room with some books in her hand, which she was going up stairs to deposit—he added: "Mr. Williams, the tailor will call here this morning, to bring some clothes he has been making for me, and I should like to have you pay him—here is the money;" saying this, he laid down a twenty dollar gold piece on the table.

"Very well, I will attend to it," she answered, and went on. A bright, shining gold piece, just from the mint; what a pretty plaything for a child? No wonder it pleased the eye of Ella, Mr. Hall's little daughter, over whose head three summers only had passed, and in an instant when her mother's back was turned, she ran to the table and seized it with her little hand, screaming with delight as she did so, quite unobserved by any one.

"Here, papa, let me do too. Ella want to do out with you," she cried, seeing her father open the door into the hall, and gliding past him, still keeping tight hold of her treasure, she scampered off into the kitchen. Her mother was up stairs, and she had the room all to herself. She threw the gold piece up and down for some time, catching it in her hands, then she rolled it backwards and forwards on the floor, calling it her wheel, and finally becoming weary of that, and espying a large coffee-pot in the closet, she said, "she would make b'lieve it was coffee, and make some for papa's dinner." Accordingly she raised the lid of the coffee-pot, and dropped into it the gold piece. Just then, her mother called from the room above:

"Ella, come up here. I want you to put on a clean apron."

"Ella tuming, ma'am, Ella tuming," she cried, and leaving her "make believe coffee," she began scrambling up the stairway.

"Mary," said Mr. Hall, to his wife at the dinner-table, "I suppose Mr. Williams has called in my absence? Did you think to take a receipt for the money you paid him?"

"O, yes, he called," she answered, "but you forgot to leave me the money, Edward."

"No, I did not forget. I left you a twenty dollar gold piece on the table."

"I know you said you did, but I could not find it, and supposed you'd forgotten to leave it."

"You must have overlooked it," said her husband.

Upon going into the sitting-room, both began searching for the missing gold piece. The lamp and books were removed from the table, the cloth taken off and shaken, and every part of the carpet was examined, but no money could be found.

"Are you certain you left it here—didn't you carry it down to the store?" asked Mrs. Hall.

"No. I am confident I did not. I recollect perfectly laying it down right here," he said, placing his hand on the exact spot. "You saw me, Walter?"

"Yes, sir," answered the boy.

"And was it there when you came down to the store at eleven?"

"I don't know, sir. I saw you leave it, but I was so busy studying, that I did not notice anything about it afterwards."

"You don't suppose there has been any one in the house to steal it, do you, Mary?" asked Mr. Hall.

"No, it cannot have been stolen, for there has been no one in the room but Walter, and after he went away, I came down and locked both the doors."

"It is perfectly unaccountable," said Mr. Hall, "where that money has gone to. I declare, if it were in the days of witchcraft, I should think the witches had got it."

It was evening. Mr. Hall was sitting alone with his wife. "Mary," said he, "that gold piece has disappeared most mysteriously. Walter is good and faithful, and it is hard to believe anything wrong of him, but he was strongly tempted, and has probably yielded to the temptation. In fact, it is my firm belief that he has taken the money."

"O, don't say so," pleaded his wife—"it cannot be, we have had so much confidence in him, it is dreadful to think of his being the thief."

"I know it is, Mary," he answered; "but the circumstances are all against him. Walter," he called, as he heard his step in the hall, "come here. I want to speak to you."

The boy obeyed.

"Walter," said Mr. Hall, sternly, after having regarded him attentively, "tell me the truth, did you take that gold piece?"

The boy stood for a moment almost stupefied with amazement at this unexpected question, then raising his eyes, with a look as bright and fearless as ever, he said:

"I steal!—I steal from you, Mr. Hall, when you have done so much for me? Never."

Mr. Hall again repeated the question.

"Did you ever know me to tell you a lie?" asked Walter, proudly, a rich color mounting to his cheeks as he spoke.

"No, you never have."

"Did you ever know me to deceive you, or to take the least fractional part of a farthing that did not justly belong to me?"

"No, you have been a good and faithful boy thus far, and I have never had occasion before to distrust you; but a bright, twenty dollar gold piece was a strong temptation, and older and wiser people have yielded before you. But if you will confess and tell me what you have done with the money, I will pardon this first offence, and if you do well, you shall in time be reinstated in my confidence."

But the only answer he received was, "I am innocent."

"Walter," said Mr. Hall, still more sternly, "I command you to tell me what you have done with the money; there was no one in the room but you, and no one else could have taken it."

Still the boy's despairing cry was, "I am innocent! O, Mr. Hall, I am innocent."

"How dare you persist in adding falsehood upon falsehood to your theft? I give you your choice, confess your guilt, and tell me what you have done with the money, or to-morrow morning you shall leave my house forever! I will not keep a boy," he said, angrily, "who repays confidence and kindness, with the basest ingratitude and theft."

Walter was silent for a few moments; and then in accents that would have melted a heart of stone, he said:

"You have been to me like a father, Mr. Hall, you took me when a poor destitute orphan, without a friend in the whole wide world, and gave me a home and employment; and I have been happy, O, so very happy. Could you look into my heart, you would see there love and gratitude as enduring as my life; had you placed a whole bag of gold pieces before me, I would have died before taking one from you."

"This is all idle talk," said Mr. Hall, "when this act of yours belies your words. You have heard the only conditions upon which I shall suffer you to remain. Now take your choice."

The face of the boy was colorless as marble, as he said in a voice scarcely above a whisper:

"How can I confess guilt when I have no guilt to confess?"

Truth and innocence were stamped upon the boy's face, but the circumstances all pointed against him.

"How young to be so skilled in artifice," thought Mr. Hall.

At this moment, little Ella came running into the room, and coming up to Walter's side, laid her soft, curly head upon his arm, and said:

"Papa, Wally didn't teal, Wally dood, Ella love Wally."

Thus far the boy had shed no tears; he had borne up like a hero under the charge against him; but Ella's childish words of affection and sympathy were too much for him. Bursting into tears, he sank down upon the sofa and covered his face with his hands.

It was a touching scene. Mrs. Hall raised her eyes beseechingly to her husband as if imploring him to relent. Mr. Hall, too, was moved with compassion at the sight of his distress, but when he thought of the many circumstances against him, he more firmly than ever believed in his guilt; and thought him acting most admirably his part of dissimulation and falsehood, and stifled all the feelings of pity that were beginning to spring up in his heart. Uncertain what course he ought to pursue, he said:

"You may go to your room now, Walter, and in the morning we will settle the question."

The next morning the sun shone into his room as bright and cheerful as ever. Would that the heart of its little occupant were as bright and joyous as were its gladsome rays. Walter had passed a sleepless night, and had arisen at an early hour. The words that Mr. Hall had used the evening before almost drove him to distraction. "He must either confess his guilt, and restore the money, or he should be forever banished from his house." Would it not be better he thought, to say that he had taken the money, but had lost it in the street, for Mr. Hall had promised to pardon him, and in time to reinstate him in his confidence. But a still, small voice within him said: "Keep to the truth, Walter, keep to the truth."

At that moment his eye fell upon his Bible, the dying gift of his mother; he opened it, and read these words: "What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall receive them." Precious words of comfort and promise—and kneeling down by his bedside, he poured forth his soul in prayer, asking that his innocence might be proved, and for a rich blessing to descend upon his benefactors. Was the prayer answered? We shall see.

Mr. and Mrs. Hall had taken their seats at the breakfast-table. The countenances of both wore a troubled expression quite unusual to them, and while her husband was helping to the meat, Mrs. Hall attempted to pour the coffee, but it would not run.

"Why, what is the matter?" she said. "The coffee-pot is full, I know, but there won't a drop come out."

"Shake it," said Mr. Hall, "perhaps the grains have got lodged on the strainer."

She did so, and something hard and heavy like a piece of metal, fell to the bottom of the coffee-pot with a rattling sound.

"I wonder what it can be?" she said, and raising the lid, she inserted a spoon, and drew out upon it something round and hard; "it looks like a large, brass button," she said, wiping it with her napkin.

"Why, Edward," she exclaimed with amazement, "it is that twenty dollar gold piece, you gave me yesterday," and she handed it to her husband.

"Are you sure?" he asked quickly. "Good Heavens! you are right."

"Here, papa," cried Ella, who was seated beside her father at the table, "it's mine, dive it to me, Ella put it in there to make you some coffee with."

The mystery was explained, and hastily dropping his knife and fork, Mr. Hall rushed up stairs to Walter's room.

"Can you ever forgive me?" he exclaimed, "your innocence is proved, clear as daylight;" and he proceeded to tell in what manner the money had been found.

"I knew it would be," said the boy, his face radiant with every emotion of joy. "I knew it would be found, and before this day was out, too."

"How did you know it?" asked Mr. Hall, a good deal surprised at the boy's earnestness.

"Doesn't it say here," and he held up his open Bible and pointed to a particular passage: "That whatsoever things ye desire when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them." I took God at his word, and prayed that he would prove my innocence, believing that he would hear my prayer, and you see he has done it."

Beautiful indeed is a child's implicit faith, in the unfailing promise of the Redeemer. Why so much talk in the world about creeds, doctrines and professions? Why is it not enough to follow the simple teachings of Jesus, and to give to him and the Father the tribute of a loving, trusting, grateful heart.

Christmas came a fortnight after, and the twenty dollar gold piece did go to Mr. Williams, the tailor, after all; but not to pay for Mr. Hall's clothing as was originally intended, for that bill was settled some days ago—but to buy a good, warm, handsome suit, together with a cap, tippet and gloves, for Walter Stevens, a Christmas present from Mr. and Mrs. Hall.

A TOUCHING ANECDOTE.

Hon. A. H. Stephens, of Georgia, in a recent address at a meeting in Alexandria, for the benefit of the Orphan Asylum and free schools of that city, related the following: "A poor little boy, in a cold night in June, with no home or roof to shelter his head, no paternal guardian or guide to protect or direct him on his way, reached at nightfall the house of a rich planter, who took him in, fed, warmed, and sent him on his way with a blessing. These kind attentions cheered his heart, and inspired him with fresh courage to battle with the obstacles of life. Years rolled round; Providence led him on; he had reached the legal profession; his host had died; cormorants that prey on the substance of man had formed a conspiracy to get from the widow her estates. She sent for the nearest counsel to commit her cause to him, and that counsel proved to be the orphan boy years before welcomed and entertained by her deceased husband. The stimulus of a warm and tenacious gratitude was now added to the ordinary motives connected with the profession. He undertook her cause with a will not easy to be resisted, he gained it; the widow's estates were secured to her in perpetuity; and, Mr. Stephens added, with an emphasis of emotion that sent its electric thrill throughout the house, that orphan boy stands before you!"

A FASHIONABLE LADY'S-MAID.

A short time back, the famous French actress, Madame Doche, was in want of a lady's-maid. Amongst others who applied for the "situation," one suited the lady; terms were agreed upon, and all seemed about to be satisfactorily concluded, when the Abigail said: "I forgot to ask what my room is like; is it a comfortable one?" "Very comfortable," was the reply. "With a fire-place?" was then rejoined. "Yes," was the answer; "but for many causes I allow no fire to be lighted, as you sit in a well-warmed room down stairs." The lady's-maid drew up grandly, saying, "Then our agreement is at an end; it is not on account of needle-work that I need a fire, but because I receive my friends every Saturday evening!"—Literary Gazette.

LITTLE FEET.

BY EDWIN S. LISCOMB.

The feet that cross my gloomy path
To-night are pattering lily ones;
They turn aside the long-laid wrath,
And lead where virtue's river runs:
Its placid bosom will I seek,
And for lost love no longer weep.

How love I all these footprints fair
That guide my soul—as on the sea
Some ship sails towards the rough coast bare,
But, warned by beacon light to flee,
Again strikes out the storms to dare—
Thus saved from dangers on the lee.

THE RACE.

BY GEORGE C. LYMAN.

With her face resting on her folded arms, and her dreamy eyes fixed on the blue distant hill-tops, Mattie Forrest knelt upon her chamber-floor, before the open window. The luxurious indolence pervading the warm, fragrant breeze that floated in to her, and the drowsy hum of the bees among the roses below, almost sent her asleep. But there were tears in her brown eyes, and on the long, golden lashes that shaded them; tears on the flushed face and bare, round arms; tears on the cluster of chestnut curls that lay tangled against her soft cheek. Mattie had been weeping. And when the broad, white lids began to droop slowly over the drowsy eyes, a little convulsive sob would break from her lips and startle her back to consciousness again. Then as memory returned, a warm, resentful color would burn hotly on her cheeks, and break into a ring flame of crimson at the pretty mouth. Then would come the fall of tears again, and a few angry, petulant words would disturb the stillness of the little room.

"I wish I could go to sleep and never wake again! I wish I were dead—I do—I do!"

She sprang to her feet, brushing back her rich, dishevelled hair with her little fair hands. As she did so, a miniature fell from her lap to the floor. She picked it up, and holding it before her tearful eyes, looked until the passionate color faded from her face, and the scornful, pouting mouth grew irresolute, like that of a grieved child.

"Robert! Robert!"

She laid the picture against her cheek, and seemed to grow calmer for a moment, but the next instant the storm of passion and grief came back, and she flung herself upon the floor again, in all the careless abandon of grief.

"Why, Mattie, dear Mattie, what's the matter with you?"

Mattie ceased her sobbing and sat quiet and breathless almost, as the sound of her little sister's voice fell upon her startled ear. But she made no answer, and after a moment the child came into the room, and kneeling down by her, put her arms about her neck, and with her little voice tremulous with childish sympathy, said:

"Tell me, Mattie, was it papa that grieved you?"

No answer.

"Did he say that you couldn't go to Boston this fall?"

Mattie shook her head.

"Was it mama, or Aunt Mary that—"

"No."

"Then what is it? Have I—O, Mattie, have I done anything to hurt you?"

"No, dear," Mattie said, resting her face on the slight shoulder of the anxious little creature.

Nine-years-old Sarah was completely nonplussed, and sat silent, holding her sister's drooping head in her arms, and wondering blankly at the cause of her grief. In the whole course of her little lifetime, she had never before seen merry, light-hearted Mattie affected like this, and she looked almost wildly at the swollen, tear-stained face, half hid by the tangled hair.

"Sainty dear," said Mattie, at last, passing her arm about the little waist, "I'll tell you, but you must never tell."

"I never will, truly," was the very earnestly-given answer. And Sarah sat quietly and patiently waiting for the explanation.

But the girl seemed to have some difficulty in commencing her story. She hesitated, then said: "Yesterday,"—then cried a little, then murmured something about Robert, and at last broke down entirely.

"Robert—Robert Graves, Mattie?"

"Yes, and I hate him," sobbed Mattie, very energetically.

"Hate Robert Graves! Why, I thought you were going to marry him. How can you, Mattie?"

"I am not going to marry him. I shall never see him again!"

"O, Mattie!"

"He is going away. We have quarrelled. He spoke to me as he had no right to speak, and I grew angry," Mattie continued, talking hurriedly. "You see the trouble arose in this way. Last week I rode out with Frank Alwynn, and Robert was very grave, but he did not say much about it. The next day I went upon the pond with George and Charlie Foster and their sister to get water-lilies; and yesterday Alfred Lewis called and asked me to go to the party at Squire Foster's this evening, and Robert was very angry about it, and called me coquettish and a flirt. It provoked me, and I told him that I should do as I chose. He stopped a minute and seemed to grow calm. The color all went out of his face, as he said: 'Very well, Mattie, choose your own way, I have no further claim upon you!' My heart leaped into my throat, and I grew so dizzy that I could scarcely see his face. He started as if to go away, but instantly turned back and said: 'We are hardly in the right mood to decide this matter now. I will see you again to-morrow.' Believing that he was trifling with me to make me betray my feelings, my answer escaped from my lips before I knew what I was saying; 'I see no necessity for the delay. I am in full possession of my senses, I believe. There is an old maxim, "There is no time like the present." It is a favorite of mine.' 'But not applicable to every case,' he replied. 'However, be it as you wish. But, Mattie, by-and-by I trust that you will see the folly of this, and then, when you can turn from them to me, I will forget this, and we will be friends again—never before.' Then he said, gently—'God bless you!' and left me standing alone in the garden, feeling like one stunned. That is all, Sainty, only I have since heard that he is going to leave town this evening."

Poor, bewildered, little Sarah! her face was as pale as her sister's. She did not speak, but looked wistfully at Mattie, as she concluded, and sat with her hands clasped in her lap.

"Mattie," she said, at length, with a fixed gravity, "do you care more for these other people than for Robert?"

"Of course not, child!"

"Then, why don't you tell him so?"

"Pshaw! how can I, you foolish little thing? You don't understand the matter at all, Sainty. Go down stairs, and I will be down presently."

Mattie arose, and kissing the child, sent her away. Then for a moment she stood looking wearily through the window. Suddenly the garden gate opened, and Alfred Lewis came hastily up the path, an elegant bouquet of hot-house exotics in his hand. Involuntarily she leaned forward, and at the same instant that she returned his gay salutation (for he glanced up and saw her), she caught sight of Robert Graves, as he rode past on horseback. She drew back hastily, remembering her tearful face and disordered hair, and immediately a sudden revulsion of feeling followed. For an instant she stood in deep thought. Then, with the look of a sudden resolution formed settling upon her face, she commenced preparations to see the visitor who waited for her below.

Half an hour later, little Sarah looked up in astonishment, as Mattie entered the room, her hair falling in rich, glossy curls about a face from which all traces of tears were removed. There was a smile on her lips and a rich blush on her cheeks as she received the flowers the gentleman presented to her, and in a few moments she was talking gaily and apparently with all the light-heartedness natural to her. Young Lewis privately pronounced her the prettiest and most fascinating girl he knew.

He did not go to the party that night, neither did Mattie. When little Sarah was sent to bed, she left them sitting together by the open window, in the shadow of the heavy drapery. But the white moonlight falling in, glanced across Mattie's snowy fingers, as they strayed over the strings of her guitar, and the voice of her companion mingled with her own, as the sweet song of "Annie Laurie" floated out upon the evening air.

The next morning little Sarah told her sister of a strange dream she had dreamed. She thought she wakened in the night, and saw Mattie standing by the bed, all the rosieness gone from her face, which was dark with passion and grief. The room was filled with the sweet fragrance of dying blossoms, for her slender fingers were busied in ruthlessly tearing apart a rich bouquet of crimson and snow-white chrysanthemums which she held. For a moment she stood thus, apparently engrossed in her employment, and then raising her head, she walked toward the window. The blossoms fell to the floor, and as she went she crushed them beneath her feet.

"And," said the child, "I was so sorry at having the beautiful flowers spoiled, that I cried out, and then you came and soothed me with kisses, and I knew nothing more until I awoke this morning, and saw you beside me sound asleep."

Mattie listened to the little girl with a forced smile, and when she had finished, bade her say nothing about her dream to any one. And Sarah, awed by the pallor of her dear sister's face and the sadness of her dark eyes, promised, without asking as usual for a reason. If she had only known that her dream was not all a dream—and if Alfred Lewis had known it, too, he would have been chary of his floral gifts thereafter!

Such a glorious October morning! Everything was gorgeous with rich autumn tints. The sturdy old oaks and maples of the forest wore their rich gala dresses of scarlet and gold, while the low underbrush they shaded, and in part protected from the early frosts, were still attired in their summer robes of green, with here and there a changing leaf that looked like a blood-red ruby in a golden setting.

Mattie was standing on a high hill at the back of her home, where she had paused in her morning walk. The fresh breeze tossed her clustering hair about her face, and fluttered the light silken scarf she wore about her shoulders. But she did not heed it. She was alone, and thinking sadly of Robert. She had not seen him since the sunny afternoon on which he had ridden past her window some three months since. She had grown very quiet and womanly in that short time—less frolicsome and wilful—more gentle and patient with the faults of others. In the first flush of resentment she had encouraged the attentions of Alfred Lewis, but her heart—ever true to her woman's love, let her pride lead her on as it might—soon taught her her wrong, and she told him as soon after as possible, that she had but a friend's regard for him. At her request he ceased his visits, but still treated her with marked deference and courtesy. She occasionally accepted his attendance in company, and enjoyed it, for the young man was both attentive and agreeable. But a serious thought of his ever being more to her—of his ever taking Robert's place in her heart, she never entertained for an instant. As Robert had hoped, she now saw her error, and grew sick at heart when she considered that she might never see him again; or that possibly by-and-by, when she had grown pale and gray waiting for his coming, he might return, acknowledging the claim of some one younger and fairer to his love. Married, perhaps, and happy with his young wife, and perchance, rosy children.

She was roused from her sad thoughts by the sound of her sister's voice calling her, and in a moment more she saw little Sarah come bounding up the hill to meet her.

"O, Mattie!" she cried, "there is to be a horseback ride to the pine woods to-day. Mary and William Morris, Lizzie and Frank Alwynn, the Fosters, and ever so many more are going. Alfred Lewis is here, and wants you to go with him. And he says, O, Mattie, he says that if father will trust me in his care, he will take charge of me, if I would like to go! Papa says I may have Black Becky, and we are to start in an hour."

The child was wild with delight, and ran towards the house again, calling her sister to follow. Hesitating whether or not to join the company, Mattie walked more slowly towards the house. But young Lewis's description of the proposed occasion was so fascinating, that she accepted his invitation, and an hour later stood at the garden gate with her joyous little sister, while her escort led up the handsome, spirited horse he had selected for her use.

"My beauty!" he said, playfully, as she sprang from his arms to the saddle. But the sincere admiration in his dark eyes brought a rich flush to her cheeks, and she bent her head and shook her glossy curls about her face, as he mounted and took his place beside her. Little Sarah, looking almost fairy-like in her close-fitting habit and tiny plumed hat, rode with them, and together they joined the remainder of the party upon the village green. After a few moments' confusion they started, riding at pleasure in little parties of two and three. Suddenly Mattie grew strangely pale, and her horse chafed beneath the convulsive guidance of her hand. Foremost in the cavalcade rode Robert Graves. As she looked at him, he glanced up and caught her eye, and immediately a bow gave token of the recognition. But that was all. She did not see him look at her again during the remainder of the ride.

After some half an hour's brisk canter, they reached the grove, and while some of the party dismounted for a stroll, others prepared for a trial of speed of the horses. For a slight dispute had arisen among some of them on the road. Alfred Lewis declared his horse, in a race of one mile, superior to any there—a challenge which the rest of the party who were ready for a smart trot, accepted.

"To a race! to a race!" was the cry, as the whole number of riders present, some ten or twelve, formed in a line, ready for a start.

"Ready!"

Almost at the same instant, the horses sprang forward. Mattie and Robert were of the company. Both rode fine animals. The slender, jet-black Arabian which bore Robert so easily, was the handsomest horse present, but his speed was hardly equal to his looks, Mattie thought, as several of the company rode swiftly by him, herself included. Gradually she found herself at the head of the party, while Lewis, urging his horse to the utmost, rode a few feet behind her.

"Hurrah! hurrah!" broke from the lips of the excited riders.

Mattie glanced merrily at Alfred Lewis. His face was flushed, and his lips tightly compressed.

He was evidently very much in earnest. A few more yards. Mattie was still on the gain, her horse going over the ground with tremendous bounds, while she maintained her seat composedly, her fearless eyes fixed on the goal. The laughter of the triumphant party seemed to grate harshly on the ear of Lewis. He glanced back to see who rode nearest to him.

"Miss Forrest," he cried, "what will you give the gentleman who catches you?"

Mattie turned her head and gave one swift glance at her pursuers. To her surprise, she saw that Robert was next to Lewis. A sudden bound of her heart made her face flush high.

"My heart, hand and fortune!" was her bold reply.

A shout rose from the company at this daring assertion.

"We accept your terms," they cried.

Mattie turned her head again, and waved her hand. As she did so, she looked straight into the blue eyes of Robert Graves. How much he read in the darkening depths of her own!

Faster, faster—like lightning the three horses sped onward, ever foremost. Mattie's heart with its boundings seemed almost to suffocate her. A hand made a clutch at her rein. With a sudden leap, her horse, almost wild with excitement, and fast becoming unmanageable, evaded it. Again the hand with its buff-colored glove touched her horse's neck. Again the attempt of the owner to detain her was unsuccessful! Her horse gave a frenzied leap to the right!

"Robert, Robert, for Heaven's sake!" The cry broke from her white lips, as she swayed in the saddle.

There was a shock, a pause, and then a blank silence. She opened her eyes. She was not upon the horse, but resting upon the ground beside a stream of water, her head lying upon the bosom of her lover. He was bathing her brow with the water, and pressing passionate kisses upon her cheeks and mouth. An instant more and she realized that they were alone. She put her feeble arms about his neck:

"Forgive me, Robert!"

Her pale, penitent face pleaded for her more than the words. And Robert answered the double prayer of voice and glance, by drawing the dear head closer to his breast, and pressing on the tremulous little mouth a long, sweet, passionate kiss of reconciliation.

DUTIES AND CHARITIES

The primal duties shine aloft, like stars;
The charities, that soothe, and heal, and bless,
Are scattered at the feet of man, like flowers.

WINTER MOONLIGHT.

BY M. LEWIS.

Evening, calm, serene and tender,
From the blue heavens smiling down,
Throws her robe of quiet beauty
Over mountain, vale and town.

Snow-clad, earth is pure and spotless,
Sending upward radiant light;
Stars on high are dimly shining,
Paled by the bright queen of night.

Soft and dreamlike rest the shadows
By the moonbeams earthward cast;
Brilliant, yet subdued, reflections
With the softened shades contrast.

Yet more deeply on the spirit
May the sweet impression rest,
Shadowing, though but dim and faintly,
Harmonies forever blest.

THE MINISTER'S COAT.

BY J. C. MERRIAM.

It was a cold afternoon in February, and not only cold, but extremely disagreeable; for the wind came in fierce gusts, and made one's teeth to chatter in spite of the extra amount of clothing with which all sensible people were provided. Slowly and wearily a stage-coach crawled up the hill, and having attained the summit, was about descending at a faster rate, when there was a sudden jerk, the horses were brought to a standstill, and the twelve cold, hungry and sleepy passengers looked out with a show of interest, to discover the cause of the delay.

"What's the row now?" muttered a stout, red-faced man, who, buried in a great-coat, an enormous red comforter and a fur cap, was endeavoring to get a nap.

The question was speedily answered, by the opening of the coach-door and the entrance of another passenger, at sight of whom the twelve sat petrified. It was an old but time-honored rule that the interior of the coach should accommodate but twelve, and never was this rule violated, but that there were murmurs deep if not loud. Upon this occasion, the unlucky thirteenth was greeted with a fearful shower of ill-natured murmurs, among which could be detected a few feminine "O dears!"

There he stood in the middle of the coach, stooping over in a most uncomfortable position, to avoid coming in contact with the roof, and there he might have stood during the remainder of the journey, if a lady, whose features no one could see—for she wore a thick brown veil—had not made room for him, with the words:

"I think there is a seat for you here, sir."

As number thirteen took his seat and thanked the lady, the murmurs grew a little louder, and became perfectly audible to the young man's ear.

"It does seem strange to me, that people should be willing to discommode others; it's a mark of a selfish mind."

"Anybody and everybody, that's the trouble of travelling in public conveyances."

"I wish I had waited for the next coach—I hate to be crowded," interposed a third.

"Small pox! Yes, I shouldn't wonder. We risk a great deal travelling in this way."

On hearing this last remark, an ancient maiden lady, who sat at the right hand of the last comer, suddenly drew her dress from contact with her neighbor, as if the dreaded disease were actually in the vehicle, and as if there were the possibility of her catching it. A giggling from two young ladies upon the opposite side of the coach, attracted everybody's attention.

"I'm sure it came out of the ark," said the elder of the two. "I never saw anything yet to equal its beautiful gloss. How much nicer they made broadcloth in those days."

"It's a beautiful fit, Arabella, isn't it? what a comfort that must be!"

"To be sure," said Arabella. "What a pity we cannot have a bit of it to keep as a venerable and venerated relic."

There was no mistaking the subject of this witty conversation, and not a few eyes were speedily turned to inspect the coat of the new-comer. It was rather antiquated in style, but nevertheless well-preserved and even glossy. The beautiful stitching about the cuffs showed that it had been carefully made, and there were also evidences of its having been carefully mended. It was the only coat the stranger wore, though the thermometer, if it had been consulted, would have recorded two above zero only; it was consequently a most unpardonable piece of carelessness for the stranger to leave his great coat at home.

It is not to be supposed that the young man bore this scrutiny from so many eyes with perfect calmness. At the first allusion to his coat, his face, though but a moment before it was very pale, flushed crimson, and when he observed that all eyes were upon him, he was upon the point of resenting the insult. But just at this critical moment, the lady with the brown veil uttered the word "Shame!" in such an indignant tone, that everybody hastily turned away, and a conversation upon indifferent subjects speedily commenced. It was not long before the stage arrived at the village of S—, where most of the passengers alighted. Among them was a tall, conceited-looking, elegantly-dressed young man, who had amused himself very much during the latter part of the journey with various witty remarks to the young ladies before-mentioned. As he helped them from the coach, his words fell upon the ears of two people who had not yet alighted.

"By the way, I have come to the conclusion, the old gentleman must have mortgaged his farm to pay for that coat, and no one knows how many days the old lady was in making it."

This speech was greeted with bursts of laughter, and the three walked gaily on.

There was a kindness in the manner of the mysterious lady, as she accepted the aid of her companion, which the young man felt very grateful for. There were a few formal words spoken, and then they had parted forever—perhaps. So thought the young man, as he lingered a moment to gaze after her.

The next day was Saturday, and Arabella and Clara Temple were seated in their somewhat gaudily furnished parlor, when a visitor was announced in the person of Miss Pry.

"O, girls, such a piece of news!" was her exclamation, as she tripped into the room. "You know our dear, good minister, Mr. Loring, talked of taking two young gentlemen to study for the ministry. Well, they've come, for I had it from good authority, as my brother John's wife's sister's adopted daughter is cutting dresses for Mrs. Loring. And she says one of them dresses beautifully, and has such a deep voice, and she expects he is very talented. But we shall know to-morrow, for they are to supply Mr. Loring's pulpit, as that dear good man has got such a cold he can't speak above a whisper. One of them will preach in the forenoon and one in the afternoon, so you can make up your minds to set your caps for them; and as there are two of them you needn't quarrel."

"Well, but, Miss Pry—" now commenced Arabella.

"O, I can't stop to say a word more, girls, I am in such a hurry. Put on your prettiest dresses to-morrow, that's all." And then Miss Pry was off in an instant.

Never had a larger congregation assembled in the village church, than appeared there the next morning. Many a fair young face looked eagerly round for the first glimpse of the young preachers, and not the least curious of the congregation were the sisters Arabella and Clara Temple. At length the preacher for the morning arrived, and accompanied Mr. Loring into the pulpit. There was no mistaking that tall, elegant, daintily-dressed gentleman, who gave out and read the hymn with such a sweet voice. Arabella and Clara exchanged glances, for their acquaintance with the preacher had commenced two days before, and they had already enjoyed the privilege of hearing from him some very witty remarks. The hymn being sung, there was a hush, in the midst of which the young preacher arose, folded his hands and laid them gracefully upon the desk, shut his eyes, and leaning over, breathed a long prayer in his softest and most melodious tone of voice. The prayer was elaborate and finely-phrased, but nevertheless it struck coldly upon the ears of many of the elderly people, who had been used to a less elegant but more earnest form of prayer. It seemed to them like lip-service.

There was great delight expressed among a portion of the young people, for any change was refreshing. The fact was, as they told each other in confidence, Mr. Loring was getting old and prosy, and consequently rather tiresome; here was something delightfully new.

The text was given out, and then, as a matter of course, came the sermon. It was beautiful to see the ease and coolness with which this dainty gentleman settled those knotty doctrinal points which had been disputed from time immemorial, and which even Mr. Loring hardly thought himself worthy of arguing.

Although plentifully garnished with figures of speech and abounding in high-sounding words, the sermon was declared decidedly shallow by more than one person whose judgment was not to be disputed. One young lady with a pretty, sparkling face, was observed to exhibit some contempt when the preacher launched off into a studied, and what was intended to be an irresistible appeal to the hearts of his hearers—an appeal that they should show all possible kindness to their fellow-men, and deal gently with the erring. There was a flush upon the face of the young lady, which might have been interpreted as one of indignation, and the gleam of the clear eye boded no good to the preacher.

But the preacher had his admirers also, and among them were Arabella and Clara Temple, who by dint of some management, contrived to obtain the escort of the young gentleman as far as their dwelling. What Mr. Loring thought of the sermon, no one knew. Some of the young people asserted somewhat maliciously, that the good old man was fast asleep the whole time, and heard not a word; there were others who chose to doubt this statement.

There was no diminution of the numbers in the afternoon, for public curiosity in the village of S— was yet to be gratified by a sight of the other and younger student, who was to officiate as preacher. The young people anticipated as much pleasure as they had received in the morning, and the elders dreaded a similar sermon.

At the appointed hour came the young preacher, accompanied as before by Mr. Loring. Arabella and Clara Temple again exchanged significant glances, for if the preacher was not, the preacher's coat was at least well known to them. It was the identical coat of antiquated make, which had a day or two ago been a subject of amusement to them.

Everybody felt disappointed with the young preacher at first. His voice was low, his manner diffident, and—and—his coat was dreadfully old-fashioned. Such was the verdict pronounced upon him by the people of S—, who, like many others I could mention, had a great reverence for externals. But when the young man rose to deliver his sermon, not a few forgot his outward garb, and saw only his pale, intellectual face. Avoiding all doctrinal points, he addressed the congregation only upon those subjects which were familiar to them; his religion was brought down "to the level of every day's most common needs." Deficient in theoretical figures, the sermon was clear, earnest and sensible, and found an echo in many hearts which had been untouched by the fine words heard in the morning. At first, the preacher's voice was low and his manner hurried, but as he progressed in his sermon, his diffidence vanished, he became eloquent, and lost in the sublimity of his subject, he even forgot where he stood. Once or twice his eyes fell upon the animated face of a young lady, who, among all the congregation, seemed to have most interest for him. But the sermon was finished, and the congregation were leaving the church, and only a few lingered from curiosity.

"How long have you had that?" asked Mr. Loring, sharply, of the young preacher, who had sunk back exhausted from a fit of coughing.

"About two months," was the answer.

"Humph!" muttered Mr. Loring, as the reply reached him.

From that day there were two distinct parties in the village of S—. One party, including the majority of the elder and a portion of the younger members of the congregation, were unanimous in favor of Mr. Loring and his poorly-dressed assistant; the other party were firm adherents of the elegant and always nicely-dressed person, who, it was rumored, Mr. Loring looked upon with a very favorable eye.

It was a pleasant, but blustering day in March, and Arabella Temple was consulting with her sister as to whom they should invite to a very select party, which they intended to give.

"You know, Clara, that Mr. Loring never goes, so it is of no use to invite him. But I was thinking we had better invite—"

"Mr. Ellis, of course," said Clara, looking significantly at Arabella. "Well, I have no objection to that, but one thing I must insist upon, and that is, that that horrid old coat shall not be seen here. Mr. — I've forgotten his name, if I ever heard it, can remain at home with Mr. Loring."

"Of course," said Arabella, drawing herself up in a stately manner. "I had no idea of asking him. Miss Snow would be so disgusted, she would never come here again, and as she is so rich, her society would be a great loss to us."

"Girls," said quiet Mrs. Temple, from her corner, "hadn't you better invite the young man? It is not best to slight people if you can help it."

"Invite him!" said Clara, contemptuously; "why, mother, neither in his dress nor his manners, is he fitted to appear in genteel society. No, I should go crazy if I saw that old coat here."

Mrs. Temple dropped the subject, and left Arabella to direct her notes to whom she pleased. It was an especially dainty document, which she despatched to Mr. Ellis, whom she had determined to fascinate, and for whom, in the homely language of Miss Pry, she had already "set her cap," and not without success.

If Arabella or Clara had taken the trouble to inquire, they would have discovered that the owner of the venerable coat also answered to the name of Ellis, being in fact a relative of his fellow-student. Never had the two met, until they came beneath Mr. Loring's roof, for their homes had been far apart. The elder of the two was the son of a rich merchant, and the younger the only child of a poor farmer. Both were anxious to qualify themselves for the ministry, and had consequently been received by Mr. Loring, who also claimed some distant relationship to them. But neither of them knew how closely they were watched by the keen-sighted old man, who had evidently some project in his mind concerning them.

We can imagine what Arabella's anger would have been, if she had known that her perfumed note found its way into the pocket of that "horrid old coat," for by the merest chance in the world, the missive, which was directed simply to Mr. Ellis, was handed to the younger student who bore the name.

Long did the document lay in "durance vile," and when at length Mr. Paul Ellis condescended to remember its existence, it was opened in a very careless manner, and hurriedly run through. But when he read the name of the writer, and recalled to mind under what circumstances he had seen her, he cast the note down and crushed it beneath his heel, whilst the flush of indignation mounted into his pale face. But a moment afterwards he lifted the paper and carefully smoothed it.

"What am I doing?" said he, to himself. "Am I a minister of the gospel, or am I not? If I am, I ought surely to forgive and forget all unkindness—even scornful remarks upon this dear old coat of mine, which was mother's handiwork, can be borne, I think. And besides that, I fancy my coat does not make me. When I can earn a better, I shall have a right to wear it, and not before." And he looked up with a quiet smile. "Now to punish myself, I will accept this invitation, and parade my old coat before these fine ladies. They shall find I am not ashamed of it."

Accordingly, at the appointed time, Mr. Ellis the younger very innocently wended his way to the Temple mansion and rang the bell. The new-comer was very late, even in the opinion of the fashionables of S—; "but better late than never," thought Arabella, who had been anxiously expecting Mr. Ellis the whole evening.

"O, O, O!" shrieked Arabella, as she caught a glimpse of the hateful coat, as the owner of it very coolly made his way through the crowded room towards her.

"What's the matter?" said Miss Snow, sharply. To tell the truth, this latter young lady was getting somewhat weary of Arabella's fashionable airs, and was at that very moment longing for something different.

"There, there," said Arabella, pointing angrily at our hero; "to think he should come here without an invitation, and in that detestable old coat, too."

"I'm sure I sha'n't speak to him," said Clara.

"I would," said Miss Snow, turning her clear eye upon the Temples. "I'm going to; shall I ask him if his coat came out of the ark, and suggest that you would like a bit of it as a relic?" And without waiting for an answer, away went Miss Snow, and the next moment was seen shaking hands with the person in the "detestable old coat."

"Miss Snow has the queerest notions," said Clara, looking after her, and as she did so, wondering how in the world she should know their conversation in the coach.

"Yes, Miss Snow can do just what she pleases, because she is rich and independent."

Thus thought Arabella, and so thought nearly all the young people in the village of S—, among whom Miss Snow reigned pre-eminent, though certainly by no efforts of her own.

Never had Mr. Ellis spent a pleasanter evening. To be sure, he heard more than one whispered allusion to "the minister's coat," and more than one gay laugh upon the subject, but true to his vow, he bore all this bravely. More than one came forward and greeted him as a friend, and there sat Miss Snow joining in the conversation with that bright, animated face, which he had noted so well upon a previous occasion.

"I am sorry to see that you haven't got well of that cough yet," remarked a lady, who had observed with some concern, that the young minister now and then was overtaken in a fit of coughing. "How did you get it?"

The question, simple as it was, seemed to embarrass the young man, and the answer was hurried and confused. But one person understood his confusion.

"Poor fellow!" thought Miss Snow, "that coat, or rather the want of another one, will be the death of him yet. No wonder he has that horrid cough; I wish—"

It is impossible to tell what she wished, but everybody observed that she looked very thoughtful the rest of the evening, though she acknowledged that she had had a very delightful time. It was a long time before Miss Snow heard of her friend, the young minister, again. "His coat, or rather the want of another," as Miss Snow had worded it, had very nearly proved the death of him. Immediately after the Temples' party, the obstinate cough had become more serious, and in spite of the care which Mr. and Mrs. Loring lavished upon him, it soon became evident to the medical adviser, as well as to the family, that the only chance of preserving the young man's life, was to remove him to some warmer climate. This was soon effected, and the matter, after having been a nine days' wonder, as is usual in all country places, ceased to be talked about, and was soon forgotten.

The young minister, however, was not entirely forgotten by the village inhabitants. Often were inquiries concerning him addressed to Mr. Loring, but beyond the fact that he was better, nothing could be ascertained in regard to him.

It was a beautiful day in the fall of the year. Miss Snow was walking slowly homeward from the afternoon service, which had been conducted by Mr. Atherton Ellis. Singularly enough, this tall, fine-looking Mr. Atherton Ellis was Miss Snow's especial aversion. She disliked him and she disliked his sermons, and never heard them without wishing she had the power to expel the preacher from the pulpit.

Upon this particular day, she heard steps behind her, and hastily turning, discovered the very object of her thoughts.

"Good afternoon, Miss Snow. I've been wishing to see you," said Mr. Atherton Ellis, blandly.

"Have you?" said Miss Snow, stiffly.

"The fact is, Miss Snow, we have known each other some time, and I—the fact is, I—"

Miss Snow walked on quite calmly, not in the least troubled by the embarrassment of her companion.

"The fact is, Miss Snow, I have a great regard for you."

"Indeed!" was the cool answer.

Miss Snow could be as freezing as her name. The gentleman lost all patience.

"Miss Snow, permit me to offer to your acceptance, myself and my humble fortune. I know you will not despise me because my fortune is humble."

"No, sir, I should not. I only despise those, who, whatever they preach in the pulpit, show a lack of Christian kindness to their fellow-men. I despise him who ridicules his neighbor because, perhaps, his coat is not of the latest make; because it has been paid for by honest labor, and made by a mother's careful hands. Such I do despise, and ever shall."

"But, Miss Snow—" began the crest-fallen Mr. Ellis.

"Good afternoon, Mr. Ellis. I advise you to return to Miss Arabella Temple, who believes you the soul of honor." And with the dignity of a queen, Miss Snow walked on, and left her companion to the sad reflection that the wealth he had coveted was not to be his after all.

In the course of that week there were two pieces of news circulating in the village of S—. The first was, that Miss Arabella Temple had married Mr. Atherton Ellis and that the two had left the village forever. The second was, that Mr. Loring, being fully empowered to do so, had chosen a colleague, who would enter upon his duties on the following Sabbath. Great was the excitement caused by both these rumors, but especially the latter. Old and young assembled at church upon the next Sunday, and great was the curiosity to know who the new minister was. But greater still was the excitement, when from the pulpit looked forth that well-known intellectual but now healthy face, which looked so like and yet so unlike a face they had seen before—that of Mr. Paul Ellis. Clad in a coat of the latest style, but as modest as ever in his manner, the new minister was no longer objectionable to any member of the congregation. In fact, as Mr. Loring's colleague, and in his new coat, he soon became decidedly popular among the young as well as the old.

In spite of her first refusal, Miss Snow being asked a second time to become Mrs. Ellis, did not say no; though, lest you should think her very inconsistent, I will state that it was not Mrs. Atherton Ellis, but Mrs. Paul Ellis that she became. She often declared that her heart had been won by that "detestable old coat," when she first saw it from behind her brown veil in the coach. And her husband laughingly declares that his heart was won by the brown veil.

OUR PET MONKEY'S TRICKS.

I remember very distinctly one bright summer's morning, when, with a house full of guests, we missed two young ladies at the breakfast-table. Thinking they had overslept themselves, we took no pains to disturb them until the meal was nearly over, when I went up stairs and tapped at their door. I was answered by a smothered cry of distress, when I opened the door, and saw the two unhappy creatures struggling under the bedclothes, with our monkey perched upon their knees, grinning and chattering in the most malignant manner, and even making now and then a most furious rush at them when a hand or a nose happened for a moment to be exposed. It was well I had gone to their rescue, for their horror was beyond description, and so long as they screamed and struggled the monkey was not likely to give them up. They said they had first heard some unusual sound upon the dressing-table, when looking out of bed, they perceived to their dismay that the monkey had entered by the open window, and was busily examining the curiosities of their toilet. Had they been quiet, he would most likely have returned as he came; but so soon as they betrayed their fear, he sprang upon the bed, threatening and defying them to the teeth and keeping them prisoners.—Once a Week.

BROTHERS AND SISTERS.

Brothers love their daughters better than sons, and fathers love their sons better than daughters, so do sisters feel towards brothers a more constant sentiment of attachment than towards each other. None of the little vanities, heart-burnings, and jealousies that, alas for poor human nature! are but too apt to spring up in female hearts, can (or, at all events, should) arise between brother and sister; each is proud of the success of the other, because it cannot interfere with self—nay, on the contrary is flattering to self. Hence, if there be a bond of family union more free from the selfish blot that interrupt all others, it is that which exists between an affectionate sister and her brother.—Lady Blessington.

BY CLARA AUGUSTA.

Laggard, thou'rt sitting idly,
 With useless, folded hands,
 Unmindful of the desert spots,
 And waste of barren lands.
 Up! rouse from this dead stupor,
 And gird thine armor on!
 When once a firm resolve is made,
 Full half the battle's won.

What right hast thou to squander
 The talents God has lent?
 What right in rust to bury
 The powers he has sent?
 They're yours to battle bravely
 In strong defence of right;
 They're yours to carve your shining way
 Up to the hills of light!

The whole world calls for labor;
 There is a thirsty dearth
 Of earnest, working, Christian souls
 O'er all this wide-spread earth;
 A lack of strong-armed pioneers
 To break the ranks of sin;
 And woo, with words of heavenly peace,
 The footsore wanderer in.

Up from this dull supineness!
 Up, with a righteous trust!
 An idle life surely conducts
 To shame and carnal lust.
 Work while the day endureth,
 Work ere the night shall come—
 At evening, when the shadows fall,
 God calls his servants home.

BURIED ALIVE :

—OR,—

THE GOLD DIGGER.

BY JOHN H. UNDERWOOD.

JABEZ DAYTON, the hero of our narrative, was, at one period of his life, a New England farmer—honest, industrious, tolerably intelligent, and withal, in comfortable circumstances. Several years prior to the discovery of the "root of all evil" in California, he wooed and won the belle of his native village, the pretty Jenny Wayland, whose beauty, amiability and many virtues had gained her the respect and esteem of all who knew her, albeit, she was but the daughter of a poor and hard-working mechanic.

For a whole year the newly-married pair lived in perfect harmony, not a cloud having arisen in the matrimonial horizon to mar their happiness, or lessen the confidence which existed between them. Jabez, who was now in his twenty-fifth year, continued to manage his farm with his usual skill, and, mindful of the old proverb,

"He who by the plough would thrive, Himself must either hold or drive," labored early and late himself, doing far more work than his hired man. There was now a fair prospect that if he should live to the average age of mankind, he would die a rich man.

About this time, however, one of those unaccountable manias which sometimes seize the most sensible of men, took possession of his mind. He became suddenly possessed with a desire of making money faster and easier than he had ever done before, and by brooding over this dangerous fancy in secret, increased it to a complete monomania. This morbid greed of gain could not be satisfied with the comparatively small but constant and certain receipts of the farm, and Jabez began to look around him for some shorter avenue to wealth.

While his mind was in this unhealthy state, he chanced to gain possession of an old volume which purported to give an authentic history of Captain Kidd, and other pirates of his time; and also a plausible theory in regard to the immense treasures of gold and precious stones which those freebooters were said to have concealed upon the sandy beaches of Cape Cod, and all along the coast of Massachusetts.

Jabez perused the volume with intense interest, and long before he had finished it, had become fully converted to its theory in regard to the buried treasures. That gold in immense quantities was concealed somewhere, had been proved beyond question; but where? Perhaps in that very town, perhaps on his own farm. It was very probable that it was, and by devoting time and money to a faithful search, he could, doubtless, find it. An adventurer who dared to risk something in the pursuit, would certainly reap a rich reward, and the thought was mother of the deed.

In spite of the remonstrances of his wife, and the sneers of his neighbors, the monomaniac (for such we must call him) immediately hired a competent man to take the entire charge of his farm, while he prepared to give his undivided personal attention to a systematic search for the buried treasures. Since the perusal of the volume which we have just mentioned, he had dreamed several times of finding vast quantities of gold in various parts of his farm, and these dreams had driven from his mind every lingering doubt of the propriety of his scheme.

By the assistance of clairvoyants and divining rods, various spots were designated as the proper place to dig, and shafts were immediately sunk, without regard to labor or expense.

Of course no glittering treasures rewarded the adventurer, and it was not long before the condition of his farm and finances began to show the sad results of neglecting a legitimate business for the pursuit of a vain chimera.

The overseer whom Jabez had entrusted with the charge of his affairs, proved to be an accomplished swindler. Observing that his employer was completely absorbed in his insane pursuit, he managed matters as he pleased, and after defrauding Jabez of several thousand dollars, suddenly absconded.

The discovery of his losses, however, had no other effect upon Jabez than to increase his disgust of farming, and incite him to redoubled exertion in quest of imaginary treasures. Shaft after shaft was sunk until the influx of water prevented further operations, and then abandoned. At length a new locality was marked out by a swindling clairvoyant as the "right spot this time and no mistake," and Jabez commenced sinking a large pit, intending, should water again put a stop to his downward progress, to bore tunnels, which should radiate horizontally in every direction, from the central shaft.

This pit had scarcely been commenced, when the failure of a banking institution in a neighboring town, in which Jabez had invested all his funds, brought him to comparative poverty. Nothing was now left him but his farm, which had been sadly exhausted by the mismanagement of his runaway overseer.

This catastrophe quite disheartened the poor treasure hunter; but instead of looking his situation fully in the face, and seeking, by well-directed labor upon his farm, to retrieve his fallen fortunes, he discharged his single laborer, mortgaged his estate, and continued his labors in the bowels of the earth. And worst of all, while following the treacherous Will-o'-the-wisp which had already led him into the bog, he resorted to the stimulus of ardent spirits to drive away care.

From this time matters grew rapidly worse, and when the next autumn came, the family of Jabez Dayton, once so happy and prosperous, were in absolute want, for the neglected farm had produced no harvest. Jabez had become a confirmed inebriate, but still labored at intervals in his pit, and had excavated tunnels in every direction. His suffering but ever-gentle and patient wife did not reproach him, but rather strove, by appealing to his affection for herself and their children, to draw him back from the precipice which yawned before him.

It was in vain. The drunken, fanatical treasure hunter had lost all honorable ambition, and was now content to burrow, like a mole, in the ground, consoling himself with the illusive picture of future wealth and ease, or drowning regrets in the drunkard's bowl. A second mortgage on the farm provided means for the sustenance of the family through the coming winter, and enabled Jabez to continue his excavations. It had now become his invariable custom to leave his bed at daybreak, and labor for an hour or more in his pit before breakfast. The forenoon was then spent in alternate tipping and digging, and by afternoon the unfortunate monomaniac would be usually too far intoxicated to pursue his labor.

One morning, as usual, he left his bed at dawn of day and hastened to his pit. An hour later, his wife arose, and having prepared their humble breakfast, sat down by the cradle of her child to await her husband's return. Half an hour passed, and he did not come; still his wife patiently rocked the cradle, and waited, supposing that he had become so deeply absorbed in his labor as to be unmindful of the lapse of time; but when a whole hour had passed, and he had not yet appeared, she began to fear that some accident had befallen him. She was about to leave the house for the purpose of seeking him, when a little boy, the son of a neighbor, passed by, and calling him to the door, she bade him go to the pit and tell Mr. Dayton that breakfast was ready.

The boy promptly obeyed, but had been absent scarcely five minutes when he returned, breathless with excitement, and rushing into the house, exclaimed:

"O, Mrs. Dayton, the dirt has all tumbled into the hole and filled it up!"

He had scarcely uttered the words, when Mrs. Dayton cried in an agony of despair:

"My husband, O, my husband!" and fell fainting upon the floor.

The boy was now terribly alarmed, for he thought she was dead, and ran home at the top of his speed. As soon as his parents were able to comprehend his incoherent story, the mother hastened to the assistance of Mrs. Dayton, while the father, with several other neighbors, ran to the pit. The sides had caved in, filling the pit nearly to the top, and if Jabez had been in at the time of the catastrophe, of which there was little doubt, he must have been instantly crushed to death.

For a few moments the horror-stricken neighbors looked upon the ruins of the excavation in silence, then followed exclamations of sorrow for the sad fate of the unfortunate man, for notwithstanding his faults, he had yet many friends who had not forgotten his former virtues. The news of the accident spread like wildfire through the village, and in a few minutes a crowd of people had collected about the pit, among whom were several persons whom Jabez had always regarded as his best friends.

"Poor fellow," said one, "he has been suddenly cut down in the prime of life."

"Small loss to his family, or the community, I reckon," replied the tavern-keeper, who had first tempted Jabez to drown his sorrows in the "flaming bowl."

"You should not say it, if it were true, for you have helped to make him what he was," replied another, disgusted at this unfeeling remark.

"Does his wife know of this?" asked one who had just arrived at the spot.

"Yes," replied another, "I have just been in to see her."

"How does she appear?" asked several.

"Well, I don't think she will die of grief at the loss of such a good-for-nothing fellow," was the sarcastic reply.

"Then she does not take it very hard, eh?"

"Not at all; she is perfectly calm, and it is my opinion that she will be easily consoled." And the speaker, who had been one of Jenny's rejected suitors, laughed in a scornful manner.

"Do you think it best to dig him up, now that he is so comfortably buried?" asked one of Jabez's friends.

"I, for one, think that would be a useless expense," replied another.

"I should wish that the body might be recovered, if possible, that we might give it Christian burial," replied the village physician; "but it would require many days' labor to remove the earth from the pit, and before we could reach the body, it would doubtless be too far decomposed to admit of removal."

This view of the matter appeared so reasonable that it was soon decided not to attempt exhuming the body, unless the relations of the unfortunate man should insist upon it; but that the usual burial services should be performed over the mouth of the pit, which should then be levelled off, and marked with an appropriate grave-stone.

The village minister assumed the task of gaining the widow's consent to this proposal; but upon entering the house he found her still insensible. She was at length restored to animation, but not to a consciousness of her situation, for the sudden shock had induced a brain fever, and caused a delirium of many days' duration. The other relatives made no objection to the plan which had been proposed, and accordingly the pit was covered with earth, while a plain tablet of marble, bearing a suitable inscription, was erected to mark the last resting-place of the unfortunate treasure-seeker.

The circumstances attending his death proved a nine-days' wonder in the village, and formed the chief subject of conversation for many weeks; but, as some one has said, "You might as well stick your finger in the water, and pulling it out, look for a hole, as to think that, whatever the station you may occupy, the world will long miss you after your death," and in time even the name of Jabez Dayton was almost forgotten.

After a severe and dangerous illness of several weeks, the widow of Jabez Dayton awoke to a painful realization of her situation. Before she had fully recovered, the village store-keeper, the man of whom we have heretofore spoken as a rejected suitor, foreclosed the mortgages which he held upon the farm, and seized the estate.

No resource was now left her but to return to her father's house, and this she was compelled to do, accompanied by her two children, one a boy scarcely two years old, and the other an infant. She received a cordial welcome, notwithstanding the straitened circumstances of the family; but the thought of becoming a dependant upon her father, who was already compelled to labor early and late for the support of his family, caused her an additional grief.

It was obvious that she must do something for the support of herself and children, and the necessity for earnest action had a good effect in deadening the violence of her grief. After mature deliberation, she decided that the best plan for her to pursue would be to open a private school for small children. Such a school was greatly needed in that neighborhood, and she was eminently qualified, both by nature and education, for a teacher.

This plan was no sooner proposed than put in practice, and the beautiful young widow was soon engaged in teaching some twenty young ideas, of both sexes, how to shoot. For a year, the school was very successful, and the fair instructress gained the affection of her pupils as well as the unqualified respect of their parents.

She had become deeply interested in her occupation, and might have been, if not joyous and happy as before her marriage, at least cheerful and contented with her lot, had it not been for one person, who caused her no little annoyance. This was the village store-keeper, who, now that the first year of her widowhood had expired, had renewed his attentions to her.

Her father's business had been for some time past greatly depressed, and he had become indebted to Mr. Moreton the store-keeper, for a large amount, which there was no prospect of his being able to pay at present; and from this cause she dared not reject his suit with scorn, as she gladly would have done, lest he should revenge himself upon her father, who was now so completely in his power.

Moreton appreciated his advantage, and resolved to win the hand of the fair widow by any means in his power, no matter how dishonorable. He continued to persecute her with his hateful attentions for months without, however, presuming to ask in so many words, the honor of her hand in marriage. His time had not yet come, but as difficulties thickened around her father, and misfortune followed misfortune, he grew bolder in proposition as he felt that his grasp upon his victim was more and more secure. At length the house, which constituted the entire property of Mr. Wayland, was mortgaged for its full value to Mr. Moreton.

As the time at which this mortgage must be redeemed or foreclosed approached, Moreton grew more marked in his attentions to Jenny, and at length made her a proposal of marriage, hinting at the same time that in case of a refusal he should not scruple to use his power to ruin her father. This implied threat was more than Jenny could bear, and regardless of the consequences, she answered him with just indignation, rejecting his suit with scorn, and spurning him as she would a loathsome reptile.

The result of her refusal was that the mortgage was immediately foreclosed, and her parents left houseless and penniless in their old age. Mr. Wayland was, however, offered the privilege of remaining in the house as a tenant, an offer which he gladly accepted, hoping that he should be able to pay the rent promptly, and thus retain the home in which he had spent so many happy years. For a brief space of time he was enabled to do this by the assistance of his widowed daughter, whose school now afforded the chief income of the family; but suddenly, and without any apparent cause, the number of her pupils began to decrease. At length only four or five remained, and when Jenny asked an explanation from the parents of those who had been taken from her school, she received only cold and evasive answers.

And now she began to observe that her former friends and acquaintances seemed to shun and avoid her; or, if they chanced to meet her in the street, cast glances of scorn and suspicion upon her which brought a flush of indignation to her cheek. At length the cause of all this became apparent. Various slanders tending greatly to injure her reputation, had been whispered in the village, and were universally believed, although no one could tell whence they originated. Jenny at once decided in her own mind that Moreton was the author of these lying reports, for she well remembered his parting words: "You shall live to repent this conduct, madam."

There was no proof of his agency in the matter, however, and the innocent victim of slander could obtain no redress. Her few remaining pupils soon left her, and thus the principal support of the family was lost.

To add to the grief of the unfortunate family, Mr. Wayland was one day severely injured by an accident in his workshop, and brought home in a state of insensibility. At first it was feared that his injuries were mortal; but after several days of terrible suffering, he began slowly to recover. He would, however, be a cripple for life, and unable to labor as formerly at his trade. Of course the family were now in a destitute condition, unable to pay the rent, and scarcely able to procure the necessities of life.

Their extremity was Moreton's opportunity for which he had been long and patiently waiting; but he had grown wise by experience, and did not again attempt to gain the widow's hand by threats. Instead of this he proffered his assistance to the family, gave them a receipt for the unpaid rent, provided everything which could add to the comfort of the sick man; and, in brief, assumed the role of a disinterested benefactor.

Jenny was both surprised and pleased at this change in his manner, and naturally of an unsuspicious disposition, reproached herself for the manner in which she had formerly treated him. In her zeal to atone for this she once more admitted him to her friendship, and it was not long before he had again assumed the attitude of a suitor. Although she shrank with horror from the bare idea of becoming his wife, she did not again repulse him with contempt; but passively suffered his attentions, cherishing a hope that some means of escape might be opened for her.

In the meantime, Moreton, confident of gaining the coveted prize, commenced building a magnificent dwelling-house nearly opposite the farmhouse once owned and occupied by Jabez Dayton. To make a long story short, he pursued his purpose with untiring energy until, between duty to her parents, whom she could thus relieve from want, and gratitude to Moreton, poor Jenny yielded to his importunities and consented to become his wife.

The new and splendid mansion of Philip Moreton was brilliantly illuminated, and a large number of invited guests had assembled to witness the marriage of their host and the still lovely Jenny Dayton. Every face was radiant with happiness save that of the bride. Even her mother, and her father, who had recovered sufficiently to be present at the wedding, could not conceal the pleasure which they felt at the thought of the brilliant future which awaited their daughter, as the wife of a rich and influential man.

The very persons who had recently regarded Jenny with scorn and suspicion, were now the most anxious to offer her their congratulations, and to do her honor; for she was about to become the wife of the richest man in town, and even if the stories which had been circulated were true, it mattered not now, for her husband's wealth would cover all her sins.

The hour appointed for the wedding arrived all too soon for the self-sacrificing woman who was about to immolate all her hopes of future happiness upon the altar of filial duty. The officiating clergyman prepared to commence the ceremony; the sorrowful bride and the happy bridegroom placed themselves before him, and the voices of the guests were instantly hushed.

At this moment the door-bell rang violently, then followed the sound of an angry dispute with the servants in the lower hall, and immediately after hasty footsteps were heard approaching the room in which the wedding party had assembled. Then the door was flung violently open, and a roughly-dressed man, whose face was nearly concealed by a luxuriant growth of beard and moustache, rushed in.

"What means this intrusion?" demanded Moreton, angrily.

But without deigning to reply to the question, the stranger rapidly advanced to the bride, and exclaimed:

"Jenny, you are not yet the wife of that man? O, say you are not yet married!"

As that well-remembered voice fell upon her ears, Jenny tottered toward the stranger, and fervently murmuring, "Not yet, thank God!" fell fainting in her husband's arms!

By this time the assembled company had recognized the stranger, who was no other than Jabez Dayton the treasure-hunter, who had been dead and was alive again.

The scene which ensued is beyond our power of description. When Jenny again opened her eyes, she was still clasped in the embrace of her husband, to whom she murmured:

"Let us leave this place at once."

"Not yet, Jenny," replied Jabez. And placing his wife upon a sofa, he advanced toward Philip Moreton. "Not until I have branded this miscreant as a liar and a scoundrel!"

Then seizing the merchant by the collar he held him with a vice-like grasp until he had exposed the villany of which he had been guilty, calling in witnesses who had been waiting outside the door, to prove the truth of his assertions.

It appeared that Moreton had not only originated the slanderous reports which had so injured the reputation of the widow, but that he had known for a long time Jabez Dayton was still alive. He had intercepted all the letters which Jabez had mailed to his wife from California, many of them containing remittances of large amount, thus becoming a felon, and rendering himself liable to several legal penalties. Before Jabez had finished the recital, Moreton fell upon his knees, crying:

"I confess it all—I have done all this and more—but spare me for the love of God, and you shall never see me again. Take all my property, but let me escape the penalties of the law."

"Not so," replied Jabez, "I would not take a penny from you; but I have no desire to give you up to the officers of justice. I will purchase your property this moment at a fair price, and then you may go in peace."

Moreton joyfully accepted this generous proposal, and stated the sum of money which he would consider a fair equivalent for the estate which he must leave behind him. A lawyer who chanced to be among the guests, immediately drew up the proper documents; the transfer was made, and Moreton having received a bag of gold in payment for his houses and lands, hastened from the room. Before daybreak he was beyond the reach of pursuit, and the next European steamer bore him away from the shores of his native land, never to return. After Moreton had left the house, the lawyer advanced to Jabez, and said:

"This is now your house, Mr. Dayton, and we are your guests. In the name of the company present, I congratulate you upon your good fortune; and now, if the request is not unreasonable, will you gratify our curiosity in regard to your unprecedented escape from death, and your subsequent adventures?"

"Willingly," replied Jabez. And seating himself by the side of his Jenny, he related his adventures as follows:

"At the moment when the pit, which my folly had led me to dig, caved in, I was at the further end of one of the tunnels. I heard the crash of the falling earth, and at the same instant found myself in total darkness. I soon comprehended the true state of the case, and realized that I was buried alive! Words cannot describe my sufferings for the few minutes (which seemed like interminable ages) following the catastrophe.

"I then for the first time became conscious of the folly of my conduct. I saw then how foolishly, yes, criminally, I had wasted time and money in an insane pursuit, thereby bringing sorrow and want upon my family. And then I reflected upon the ruinous vice of intoxication which I had acquired. Presently I experienced a feeling of suffocation, for I had exhausted the limited supply of air contained in the small space in which I stood. I felt that I was dying, and I knelt and prayed, first for my injured wife, and then that I might escape from the horrible death which threatened me. I made a solemn vow, that if I should ever again be permitted to behold the light of day, I would forever abstain from intoxicating drinks, and devote my energies henceforth to some legitimate occupation.

"As I rose to my feet, I staggered from weakness, and clutched at the earth for support. Instead of the crumbling sand which formed the end of my prison cell, I grasped the fibrous root of a shrub which had found its way into my cave. It yielded to the tension, and as I drew it toward me, a portion of earth came with it, leaving an opening of a foot or more diameter into the glorious, blessed, heavenly light of day. Although I had excavated my tunnel horizontally, I had bored through the brow of a hill, until another foot or two would have brought me out once more into the open air upon the hillside. In a moment more I had enlarged the hole with my hands sufficiently to allow me to pass out.

"I hastened back to the mouth of my pit to view the ruins, and then, as it was already past my usual breakfast hour, I felt a sudden impulse to conceal myself behind a clump of bushes near at hand, to hear what my friends would say when they should discover the accident.

"I had scarcely crouched behind the bushes, when a boy came to the mouth of the pit, and ran away again in great alarm. In a few minutes more a crowd had collected about the spot, and I was able to overhear everything that was said. But when I heard Moreton say that Jenny did not appear grieved at my death, but rather to rejoice over it, I swore to leave her forever. As soon as possible, I left my place of concealment, carefully closed the opening through which I had obtained egress from my cave, and left my native village, as I then thought, never to return.

"I wandered on, in an agony of mind bordering on madness, until I reached the seashore. A ship was lying at one of the wharves, and the crew were just casting off the hawser, preparatory to getting underway. I sprang aboard, and begged the captain to take me with him. I told him that I was a sailor, but would do what I could, and would try to learn seamanship as fast as possible. At length he consented to take me, without wages.

"The ship was bound to California, and after a tedious passage we arrived there to find everybody in great excitement in consequence of the recent discovery of gold. The entire crew, including myself, immediately deserted and hastened to the mines. For six months I labored indefatigably, merely to drive away sorrow, for I had no object in amassing wealth, until the arrival in the mines of an old friend and fellow-townsmen, who informed me that my wife had truly and deeply mourned my death, inspired me with new energy.

"I immediately wrote home, enclosing a large remittance to Jenny. Receiving no answer, I wrote again and again, but still no answer came, and I began to fear that she was dead. As I had already collected many thousand dollars' worth of gold, I resolved to return home at the first opportunity. Before the sailing of the next ship for the New England States, I made a lucky 'hit,' and in three days had quadrupled my store of the precious metal.

"I arrived at Boston three weeks ago, and immediately despatched a trusty messenger to this village, to bring me intelligence of my wife. He soon returned, and informed me that she was about to be married, and also that she still supposed me dead. It is not necessary that I should inform you of the course which I have since pursued, and which has resulted in the detection of that scoundrel Moreton. And now I have regained my darling wife, whom I prize more highly than all the gold of California.

"The ways of Providence are past finding out. As you well know, I was once a drunkard, and a poor, fanatical treasure-hunter; I am now a reformed and wealthy man, and this change is due to the circumstance of my being buried alive."

After bestowing the most hearty congratulations upon the returned Californian and his wife, the company dispersed, leaving the happy pair to the enjoyment of each other's society in their new and luxurious home.

Many institutions are properly called seminaries, for they do not half teach anything.

DESPAIR.

BY EDWIN S. LISCOMB.

How vague and like a wilderness
That heart becomes with care oppressed;
With fearful storms of mental woe
It sadly rocks, like ships that go,
In hope, far from the smiling shore,
Alas, to greet its scenes no more!
Such, swaying wildly mid the storm,
Upheaves its breast—then, then is gone;
The noble life that bore a charm
Through many a former tempest's strife,
At last, when Fate uplifts her arm
With powers of sad destruction rife,
Sinks walling, shivering, 'neath the wave,
No more the storms of earth to brave.

A COUNTRY VISIT.

BY MRS. M. A. DENISON.

"DEAR UNCLE:—May Carry come and stay with you from May to August? The doctor recommends her to go into the country, for a few months; and as urgent duties make it imperative for us to stay in town, I can think of no better protector for Carry than you. She will not, I am sure, disturb you in the least. She is very orderly in her habits, and does not require much company, etc., etc."

Wallace Hastings dropped the paper as if it had been hot lead. Perhaps it is too much for me to say that he was a woman hater, but certainly he was very near becoming one. He had been "hazed about," as he expressed it, all his youth by an energetic, well-meaning, but unsympathizing step-mother; he had been jilted, when scarcely over his boyhood, by a little pink-and-white-faced girl, and since then, he had vowed something like eternal enmity against all woman-kind. Consequently he took time to attend fully to his own affairs, and at the age of thirty-six was a comfortably rich man, living in his own house with an oddity of a housekeeper and a still greater oddity of a hired man. He was a particular young-old bachelor. All his habits were fixed and nailed. He carried a little, round pin-cushion with him, in which were always exactly twenty-six pins; and if one had been missing when he lay down at night, it would surely have pricked his conscience so that he could not sleep. He had, moreover, a wee little box in which upon the most delicate of reels was wound silk and cotton and thread, and in which he kept his needles and scissors and shirt buttons, and whatever else goes to make up that tidy receptacle, a bachelor's work-box. Every chair had its place, and knew it too. There were little balls of twine tucked away in particular little places, and, in fact, everything about looked quite too prim and nice for common mortals to touch. You may imagine what an annoyance to a quiet, particular person, such a note as this must have been.

Again and again he said to himself that it was impossible, and he couldn't think of it. What! have a chit of a girl rummaging about his precise premises, laughing when he didn't want to laugh, squalling—yes, that's what he called it!—squalling out opera-airs and thumping his elegant rosewood piano, till it screamed in agony—inviting young men and young women to call, turning his parlors topsy turvy, and giving him no rest or peace from morning till night! Gigantic accumulation of evils, Pelion upon Ossa of woman troubles! What could he do to avoid it? His niece had been too kind to him to deny her—she had nursed him in a severe illness, her attention had saved his life, and he felt grateful; but it takes something more than feeling to testify one's gratitude.

"Perhaps," thought he, "I can board at Badger's (a hotel), and leave her the house for her to ransack. Then she might talk, come, go, act as she pleased, and he would not be there to groan in spirit. But would not this look too cynical? would it be treating his guest or his aunt with respect? He came to the conclusion that it would not. Girls! how he detested them! Vain, giggling, flirting, nervous things, all the time expecting presents and ice creams, talking without sense, wise without experience—he most devoutly wished for a world minus the feminize gender, in which he might reflect at his ease, have no nieces to send him perplexing notes and more perplexing girls to turn his ideas and his household into confusion."

After this sort of reflection, it is hardly to be wondered at that his hand trembled with vexation when he replied that his niece was welcome (?) to send her niece—or rather her husband's—and that he should be happy (?) to receive her. O, the polite lies that are told every day, and every hour in the day!

It was on one of the balmiest and most beautiful of bright spring mornings. Our bachelor—but hold! we have not yet described him for the benefit of our thousands of readers. Have you on a table, devoted especially to that purpose, some scores of daguerreotypes? And among them is there one in particular—a Cousin Ned, or Mr. Somebody, a particular friend of the family, who visits not often, but always finds it difficult to tear himself away—whom you always select to show to visitors, from whom you may be sure to hear the most enthusiastic praises? And does not your own cheek tingle a little, when some rapturous voice exclaims—"what noble breadth of forehead! what splendid hair! such magnificent eyes! has he so sweet a dimple in his chin? O, isn't he a beauty!"

Well, that particular picture resembles—in a measure—the hero of our sketch. He was not only exceedingly fine looking, but he was handsome—a man to be proud of, as far as appearances went—and really, in all but his dreadful indifference to the pretty young girls who walked the streets of Sudbury, a noble fellow every way. Nobody could say a word against his morals. He went to church three times on the Sabbath, gave liberally, had the minister to tea once a month, and was highly thought of in the community—except by the women, who voted him down because he would not take to himself a wife.

As I began to say, our bachelor sat at his breakfast table, leisurely eating, sipping and reading, when he saw at some distance the coach turning a particular angle that it never turned except when it was coming towards his house.

"There's that girl!"

It is of course impossible to express by pen, the intense and withering disgust conveyed from his lips to the current of air blowing towards the coming coach. He sprang from the table, upsetting his coffee-cup over one of the whitest and finest of linen cloths, and by some strange instinct caught his hat and cane, and made for an opposite door to that one at which the coach was now standing, when he was arrested by the house-keeper, who said, rather pertinently:

"I guess there's somebody waiting for you to help her out."

This carried him to the front door, upon the steps of which stood already three detestable bandboxes and a formidable trunk, and he caught a glimpse of a face looking directly towards him.

"Thank Heaven, she's homely!" was his first mental ejaculation. And he then went forward to assist her to alight.

It was not a beautiful face that sat in his sunny home not a half an hour afterwards, to be sure, but it was a lovable face, there was no denying that. The fair, well-proportioned brow, with its soft ringlets of glossy brown falling around it—the clear, dark eyes, the deep, deep dimples that showed every time she spoke, and even the tiny, white, projecting teeth—yes, the teeth were ever visible—made an impression upon all who saw her. Wallace Hastings had deliberately decided to be off early, but somehow he lingered longer than he intended, to hear the news from the family of his young niece.

In spite of his prejudices, he admired her calm, quiet manner; even her plain, gray-cloth dress, with its modest collar of white, pleased his eye, though he still persisted in being intensely thankful she was not beautiful. The next morning at breakfast she had a bloom on her cheek.

"Let me pour the coffee," she said, suiting the action to the word, and gracefully doing the duties of a hostess. "What a charming place this is," she continued. "I never saw a more beautiful prospect than from the top of the hill yonder."

"That hill! why, it is nearly two miles from here," said Wallace.

"So I supposed," she replied. "I started very early, so as to have the benefit of the sunrise. It was a most delightful walk."

"You rise early then?" he said, blushing as he thought of his own laziness.

"Always," was her reply. "My duties as a teacher would leave me no time otherwise. One can get through a great deal of reading and study by devoting two early hours to them, the mind is so fresh in the morning."

"You keep school then."

"O yes. My mother and father have been dead for many years."

There was an unconsciously mournful cadence in this reply, like a sad wail through a summer's wind. This young and graceful girl toiled hard for a living. He had not known this before. It made him more hospitably inclined. As he went away, he said:

"My pianoforte and music are at your command, Miss May," (Carry May—that was her name.)

"Thank you," she replied gently.

"I,"—he hesitated—"I am not much given to visiting, Miss May, but if I can be of service to you, command me. There are a great many fine young ladies in our vicinity."

He could not look her in the face as he repeated these choking words.

"Thank you very much, I am sure," she said, with her face all dimples—"but I am so little accustomed to visiting myself, that I fear I should not be good company. Besides, I am advised not to be given to night rambles, by my physician, and I believe while my health is not quite good, home is the best place for me."

"Admirable conclusion!" said Wallace in his heart. "Most certainly this is an extraordinary young woman!" And with much emphasis, he repeated these words to the minister that same day, inviting the latter to stop and take tea. The minister, be it known, was also a bachelor, and was not as old by five years as Wallace Hastings.

He was a pleasing, gentlemanly man, not at all superior in talent, mild and amiable in manners and deportment, refined, courteous and good-looking. He came soon after Carry May had installed herself in this pleasant country house, and appeared so much delighted with her, that Wallace rubbed his hands gleefully for the first time in his life over such a thing, and said :

"There's a match—and he needs a wife."

So it continued that Carry May took long rambles in the mornings, often joined by Wallace Hastings, sometimes by the minister, and the good people of the village were noways backward in forming their conclusions, though they were a little puzzled to know which suitor was the most favored by the pleasant-faced young girl.

For a long time, Carry May had not been prevailed upon to sing. Brave in everything else, she was always timid when her vocal powers were concerned. One day Wallace Hastings came home much earlier than was his wont. He entered the house and was astonished to hear a clear, sweet, bird-like voice, trilling and warbling in perfect abandonment of melodious sound. He paused astonished, chained, captivated. If he had a weakness, it was a passionate love of music, and he himself was no mean amateur. Going towards the door of the music-room, he found his housekeeper and hired man both listening intently. They started and essayed to move when they saw him.

"Hush!" he said, in a low whisper, "who is it?"

"The young lady," replied his housekeeper. "That's the way she sings every day, like an angel, and Mike and I stand and listen."

"Is it possible?" exclaimed Wallace. And musingly he entered the parlor.

Presently Miss May came in, quite astonished to see him there, and blushing so, that for once he thought her beautiful.

"So it seems you do sing, Miss May?" he said, a little pique in his voice, as he thought how often he had urged her to favor him.

"O, yes, for my own pleasure; it is a relaxation from severe duties."

"Must I think you are selfish, Miss May?"

"I hope I am not; I do not think it is selfishness so much as great timidity, which, so far, I have found it impossible to conquer. I wish I could. I have taken every pains to do so."

Why was it that at that moment the perverse heart of this bachelor, who had resisted all the beauties he had seen for so many years, went from him forever? Her modest, earnest manner, glowing cheeks and beautiful eyes completed his enslavement. When the minister told him on the evening of that same day that he never saw a young lady so well calculated to make a pastor's wife, he fell almost tempted to commit some act of personal violence upon him; and when further, the minister with his pleasant, smiling face appeared at his supper-table twice where before he came but once, he was inclined almost to outrage politeness and tell him his room was better than his company.

It happened one day that the poor minister, in strictest confidence, told him that he intended to propose to Miss May. If an earthquake had struck him, or a ball of lightning transfixed him, he could not have been more astounded. In fact he almost turned his back upon the poor man.

For nearly a week following, poor Wallace Hastings spent his evenings from home. He was sure he had seen her eye light up with pleasure when the reverend gentleman called, she always spoke of him in admiring terms, therefore he concluded that it was all over, the two loved each other, so he would leave them to themselves. Consequently, for the sake of his own peace of mind, though it certainly made him wretched, he avoided Miss Carry May, while she, strange to say, seemed to lose her genial flow of spirits, and to look somewhat depressed and unhappy.

One day she sat in her room, writing to her aunt and uncle in the city. Suddenly she gathered the paper in her hands, and crushed it, saying :

"This will not do. Instead of writing, I must go home. I will not be a love-sick, desponding creature. There are claims upon my time, and even upon my heart, that I may call upon to aid me in overcoming my first wild dream. I will go home."

When she announced her intention to Wallace, he said, almost coldly :

"Ah, I am sorry you are going, but I suppose we shall be having a wedding soon, then I shall see you sometimes."

Having uttered these words in a very constrained manner, he went out, leaving the astonished girl surprised, indignant and wondering.

It was some two months after Carry May had returned. Wallace Hastings had been on a brief journey. It was not so much to finish the important business which called him away, as to forget the image that had been too indelibly stamped upon his heart. The minister took tea with him in the old-fashioned way, and he, too, came with a purpose, he was determined to know what had altered the manners of his old friend toward himself.

"Well, I suppose you are nearly ready for that interesting ceremony?" said Wallace, attempting a ghastly smile.

"I really do not know to what you refer," replied the young pastor.

• "Why, to your engagement with Miss May," replied the other, speaking the name with an effort.

"My engagement to Miss May?" replied the minister, with equal effort. "I am sorry to say," he continued, in a lower and sadder tone, "I am not and never was engaged to Miss May."

"What, did you not tell me—"

"I told you that I should propose to her, and so I did," replied the other. "She, however, did not love me," he added, frankly.

"What a fool I have been!" exclaimed Wallace Hastings, striking his forehead.

"She would have made so sweet a pastor's wife," said the minister, entirely pre-occupied with his own thoughts. "By the way, I wonder you could have seen her so much without loving her."

Wallace finished his supper almost in silence, the minister meantime expatiating on the beauty and the many virtues of Miss May.

The next day our bachelor wrote a note to his niece in the city, and on the following morning he walked into the hall of her residence, just as Carry May was walking out. The blush, the start, the quick, earnest welcome with which she met him, were worth everything to him. Even the slight pressure of her hand—he could not have counted its value by any sum in arithmetic. His niece's welcomes were more demonstrative.

"I never expected to see you in my house," she cried. "You have almost made Carry a confirmed anchorite. She was bad enough before, but she has been a perfect recluse since she returned. I think so much study will kill her. Isn't she a sweet girl? Since nothing has come of it, I'll tell you frankly that I did secretly hope in my own heart that she would charm you out of your celibacy. But, O, dear, nothing short of an angel would move you, I believe."

"I have an idea that Miss May is only little short of an angel," said Wallace, gravely.

"Dear me, have you? Well, I declare, I didn't think it was in you to speak so highly of any woman. She is a dear, charming girl, that is a fact, the most engaging creature I ever knew—altogether a treasure. And it passes my comprehension why she isn't engaged, or hasn't been, long before this time."

"Perhaps she is," suggested Wallace Hastings.

"O, no, it isn't so, I'm very sure," replied his niece, "because, although there are plenty would be glad to come, yet no young gentleman waits upon her; and I'm sure unless she could get one of the very best of husbands, I shouldn't want her to get any, for she has splendid talents and can well support herself."

"What kind of a husband do you think I should make?" queried Wallace Hastings.

After a moment of extreme surprise, the pretty woman clapped her hands as she exclaimed:

"O, I wish it might be! I know she likes you better—" She paused, quite confused.

Wallace had been walking the floor—he turned hastily, gave his niece one searching glance, and walked from the room, smiling to himself.

"I know she likes you better—" he soliloquized, "that's what I want; I want to be liked better—better than most men are liked."

"I declare!" exclaimed his niece, "I do believe Wallace likes our Carry. Well, to be sure if it isn't just the match for them both! He's as particular as any old bachelor, and she's as careful as any old maid. There will be a wedding as sure as the world!"

That evening the great question of his life was proposed by Wallace Hastings, and answered according to his heart's desire. Wallace had the cruelty to engage his friend and companion the pastor, who had enjoyed so many social evenings with his bride elect, to perform the ceremony. But he knew his disappointment was not as keen as some men's would have been. So that's what came of a COUNTRY VISIT.

SLEEP.

There is no fact more clearly established in the physiology of man than this, that the brain expends its energies and itself during the hours of wakefulness, and that these are recuperated during sleep; if the recuperation does not equal the expenditure, the brain withers—this is insanity. Thus it is, that in early English history, persons who were condemned to death by being prevented from sleeping always died raving maniacs; thus it is, also, that those who are starved to death become insane; the brain is not nourished, and they cannot sleep. The practical inferences are these: 1. Those that think most, who do most brain-work, require most sleep. 2. That time saved from necessary sleep is infallibly destructive to mind, body and estate. 3. Give yourself, your children, your servants—give all that are under you the fullest amount of sleep they will take, by compelling them to go to bed at some regular early hour, and to rise in the morning the moment they awake; and within a fortnight, nature, with almost the regularity of the rising sun, will unloose the bonds of sleep the moment enough repose has been secured for the wants of the system. This is the only safe and sufficient rule; and as to the question how much sleep any one requires, each must be a rule for himself; great Nature will never fail to write it out to the observer under the regulations just given.—Dr. Spicer.

"THIS LIFE'S A DREAM."

BY MARY PERCIVAL.

O, tell me not that life's a dream; .
That all are doomed to know
The hopes we cherish, joys we seek,
Must end in sorrow, woe!

O, tell me not there's nought on earth
Can bring us peace of mind;
That no pure joys can emanate
From any earthly shrine!

O, tell me not 'tis a dreary void,
A sea of toil and strife,
Where we meet and part with those we love,
And hate the cares of life!

O, life is not a vale of tears,
Without a smile to cheer;
Where nought is heard but a funeral dirge,
And all is dark and drear.

Go wipe the tear from sorrow's eye,
And ease the sufferer's pain;
Or soothe the lonely orphan's moan:
Then, hast thou lived in vain?

Seek ye the prisoner in his cell,
Where, fettered and confined,
Hopeless, alone, he meets his fate:
Go soothe and calm his mind.

Seek the poor slave in distant climes,
Whose dearest hope is death;
Bartered and sold in cruel sport,
E'en from his earliest breath.

Tell him of God, of love and truth,
And of that better land;
Seek to illumine his darkened mind,
And break the heavy band.

Each has a mission to fulfil,
Seek out some work of love;
'Twill lead to happiness on earth,
To higher bliss above.

THE MIDNIGHT EPISODE.

BY HARRY HAREWOOD LEECH.

THE beautiful home of Philip Montague, but a short distance from Hayre de Grace, in Maryland, lies upon the sloping banks of the lovely Susquehanna. No description of ours could do justice to the antique-looking cottage nestling amidst the shade of those waving lindens at the end of the beautiful green lane; the fine orchard at its side, rich with its ruddy, blushing fruit; and the wealth of all flowers which grew in the spacious gardens, exhaling their heavy perfumes into the opened casements as each breeze kissed their velvet cheeks; the old porch whose staunch columns were smothered in rose blossoms, the creeping honeysuckle clinging tenderly to its projecting roof, before the doors its plat of grass snowed over with daisies, and standing in its midst the old carved fountain, now dried up and broken, but still with the peacocks who strut around the gravel walks, adding to the picture and its quaint beauty; behind, the rows of stately poplars darkly rising, around whose tops and the old-fashioned vanes the white pigeons are constantly flitting. Yes, it was a beautiful, home-like spot, and although no architect with curious skill had erected a majestic pile of carved marble, rare wood or porphyry, with stately columns and sumptuous chimney-pieces of shining stone, there was the picturesque gables, substantial frames, rough porticos, and high, old-fashioned, hospitable fire-places, and from the genial warmth afforded in winter by the latter, a stranger or wanderer never had been turned.

Paul Montague, his sweet wife, and an orphaned nephew, lived together at Meadowvale, the name of this pretty spot, and so quietly glided their lives, so many joys were centred in each other, that they felt the world had no pleasures to bestow, save what sprang from the little circle of home, which with them all was but another word for happiness.

A serpent once entered Eden, then why should Meadowvale remain unvisited? The arch-tempter sought our mother's bower, and a temptress entered this elysium and assailed its master with a power which nature could not triumph over. We shall see how this came about.

A pleasant evening in June, Paul Montague arrived home from Baltimore; he had scarcely dismounted from his horse, and thrown the bridle to his boy, before he was folded in the arms of his fond wife, who met him upon the steps of the porch with a greeting as warm as ten years before, when she became his blushing, happy wife.

"Dear Paul, I am so glad you have returned," she said.

"How do you do, dear wife?" And he kissed her tenderly.

"Come in, come in," she continued, merrily, "I have a pleasant surprise for you. You recollect Leonora Raymond? O, yes, I know you do, for gossips said she was fond of my dear husband before we married. Well, I have such a sweet letter from her, I have not heard from her, you know, for over five years; her father lost all his property before he died, and at last Nora has taken a situation at the Marlborough Seminary, near here, and she wishes to know if she can procure board with us."

"What a fall for proud Nora Raymond," interrupted Paul. "But, dear Annie, we cannot have our little circle broken into by a stranger."

"O, now, husband, you are selfish, you do not think how much company she will be for me when you are away; but I will go and get you her letter." And she bounded from the room, soon returning with the letter, which Montague read, then he laid it down, and said:

"Do as you please, Annie. I do not like to have a stranger with us; but here comes Perry, he shall decide." And as a tall, pale youth entered the room, Montague addressed him, "How do you do, Perry, my boy? Paler than ever—you study too hard; but let us submit a question to you: shall Miss Nora Raymond be admitted to our home?"

"Is she poor and friendless?" was the question, in a grave voice.

"So she says," replied his uncle.

"Then I should say let her come, uncle, if—"

"No ifs, dear Perry." And the lady jumped towards him, laughing, and placed her plump white hand upon his mouth. "Yes, dear husband, she shall come. I must have my way in this; but recollect, you must not make love to her as of yore."

"Faugh, I expect she is yellow and withered," was the laughing reply. "As for me, I shall take care to be as much out of her company as possible."

"O, I am so glad, I shall write immediately." And clapping her hands in delight, Mrs. Montague ran up stairs to indite the promised letter, for there is no errand executed by woman with such alacrity as one of sympathy and love.

Paul soon followed his wife, to refresh himself after his long ride, previous to the evening meal, and Perry Miller wandered abstractedly to his study.

Paul Montague was a fine-looking man of about thirty-seven years of age, with brown, curling hair falling in a heavy mass from his white temples, and shading his ruddy cheeks, and his deep blue eyes were the index of a warm, generous heart. He had a poetic soul, and was keenly alive to beauties, both in nature and art. He had, besides, an impressible heart; his 'fine attainments' had advanced him to high positions in the political world, and like many men in his condition, he was possessed of considerable vanity and self-love; but he was a devoted husband, and his greatest pride and joy was in his blooming wife, who returned his affection with all the warmth and strength of her beautiful nature.

But the singular being in this household was Perry Miller—he was about twenty-two years of age. Soon after the marriage of Annie to Paul Montague, her sister died in the East Indies, and her husband returned to this country with their only son, then about twelve years old. The father soon after died, leaving the boy to the care of his aunt. She had received him to her heart, and he soon was beloved for his good qualities very dearly by Paul—he had been a son to them.

He was a strange youth: he never had play-mates like other boys, and amid the eternal hum of the world, he grew into a shy and solitary youth, with strange joys and sorrows. He knew not why, yet he was moved often to tears when he stood amongst the lengthened evening shadows, and felt the night gather gloom around him, and the bright stars fix themselves in the great vault above. His chief friends were books, he read in them of those great spirits who went down like suns and left upon the mountain tops of death a light that made them lovely. His own heart made him a poet, and imagination like a subtle alchemist turned all his thoughts to gold, and opened on his life all the treasures of her richest vaults; but when from his grave studies he unbent, and joined his aunt and uncle in their evening pleasures, he had ever a pleasing anecdote or rare jest to enliven them, so no face was missed more than Perry's from the drawing-room.

One day there was a great bustle at Meadowvale, a tall lady had alighted from a carriage, so veiled that Paul and Perry could not see her face except just for the instant when the veil was raised to kiss Annie Montague, and then a large pair of dark eyes were disclosed, and before they shone upon the gentlemen the veil was dropped.

"Why, Nora, I am glad to see you! Come in, come in! Welcome, Miss Raymond, to Meadowvale."

"Thank you, O, thank you!" And amidst these hurried expressions Lenora Raymond entered the house.

They formed an agreeable party at tea that night—the sprightly and happy wife, the glowing, handsome husband, the pale student, and the magnificent Nora Raymond. Yes, she was really beautiful, for her lips and cheeks, her wonderfully lustrous eyes, her shape and features seemed to be drawn by Love's own hand, and when she gazed, as she did often upon Perry, he thought of the deep midnight stars whose light is at once so darkly beautiful, so deeply bright, and whole veins of diamonds which could furnish crowns for all the queens of earth.

She seemed to be about thirty years of age (if the reader will pardon us for judging it), her figure was full and luxuriant, she was easy and graceful in conversation, and would have been brilliant if there had not appeared a certain subdued air, which seemed to tell of many troubles, and which of itself was interesting. She had one of those beautifully chiselled mouths which at once seem to invite love or wreath words of scorn.

The conversation was sustained mainly by Mrs. Montague, Perry, and Nora Raymond, Paul seeming abstracted, careless or pre-occupied, in truth he was bewildered. He had expected to see the Nora of other days appear as the faded, weary woman; he was not prepared to have her burst into his view matured in fascinations, in all the warm, ripe luxuriance of her charms, and as he listened to the conversation, the gay, sweet warble of his wife's words, the deep and finely modulated tones as Perry spoke, then the rich, full tones of Nora's voice, like the master's touch upon the sweet keys of a powerful organ, all these made him gaze from one to the other, and at last his looks rested upon his own dear wife, and if she could have seen his beaming smile, she would have known that she did not suffer from the comparison. Old days were conjured up, old joys were discussed, old friends remembered, as they sat around the board, and when they separated, after spending the evening in singing and playing, in both of which accomplishments Nora excelled, it was felt that she, instead of breaking in upon their social, home pleasures, was a great acquisition. When Paul and his wife were alone together, she threw her arms about her husband, and said:

"Dear Paul, was I not right in bringing Nora here? is she not beautiful? Now answer me, I won't be jealous."

"Yes, beautiful indeed, dearest wife." And he folded his arms around her shoulders. "But my own little dove is far sweeter than all the glossy ravens in the world."

"Hush, you shall not say so. But do you think our Perry will fall in love with her? Did you not see how softly his eyes beamed, how tender his voice became as he spoke to her?"

"No, no," was Paul's answer, I do not think our young eaglet will find an eyrie sufficient in Nora's love to perch his hopes upon. His books are his best mistress, I think, at present."

But Paul Montague did not examine his own heart properly when he spoke these words, for somehow the idea of Perry's marrying Leonora was disagreeable to him. He did not question why; better if he had.

The month of July flew by, attended by the sultry noons, the fragrant, breezy evenings, the rich sunsets, the smiling verdure, and heavy beds of flowers; all at Meadowvale was beautiful as ever, and much more happy. The advent of Nora Raymond had inaugurated gayer changes in the household; in the mornings she walked to Marlborough, which was only a short distance, then when she came back, there were rides, and drives, sailing upon the broad Susquehanna, visits to be paid, or visitors received; all were pleased with the stranger at Meadowvale, and many gentlemen, attracted by her charms, had become quite constant visitors; but none received so much encouragement as Perry, the student, the grave youth who was beginning to love Nora as only a poet can love, with the love that can thrive upon such dainty food as sweet words showering from a dainty lip, and he was but too happy when she dowered him with rich looks, her arch head half aside, and her liquid eyes called all the wild blood up to his pale cheeks in pleasant tumults, as they drooped softly upon his passion-lit orbs from beneath their silken-fringed lids. O, she bewitched him then, did Nora Raymond!

One evening, 'twas in the latter part of August, the day had been very sultry, and after Leonora had returned from the seminary, she had at Perry's invitation taken a sail with him down towards the bay; she was in the best possible spirits, and she looked lovelier than ever, her face wreathed in smiles and beaming out all aglow from her night of hair, which the evening breezes toyed with wantonly, throwing her tiny curls over her cheeks in careless beauty.

Perry was sad and silent—it seemed as though he was content only to drink in love from her voice, learn its lessons from her soul-lit eyes, and felt as though he was almost in some strange and pleasing enchantment, from which a sound would rescue him.

It was getting quite dark when they returned, and he fastened his little sail boat to the stakes upon the shore, and they strolled on towards the house, she leaning heavily upon his willing arm, and her mass of curls almost brushing his own locks—he was happy almost to delirium.

"Perry," said she, "do not let us return so quickly to the house; we will stroll to the left, behind the old poplars, there are seats, you know, and we can sit awhile watching the beautiful moonrise."

"I would have suggested the same, Miss Raymond," replied Perry, "but I feared to fatigue you."

"You must not call me Miss Raymond any more," said she, looking up at him smilingly.

"Its coldness rebukes me for addressing you familiarly, Perry." And she laughed merrily.

"I will not," said he, "so here I recant, my dear friend, Leonora."

They seated themselves upon a bench beneath the tall poplar trees.

"Ah, friendship," sighed Nora, "how often have I heard it sworn to me, and often thus as we are, Perry, beneath the glances of the same pale prophetess, the moon, and before she had walked in lonely triumph through the heavens, those friends were false and forsworn."

"I will swear friendship to you, dear Nora—shall I call you so?—and such a vow may my God deny me if I ever break it!" he cried, passionately.

"No, no, you shall not!" She rose up hastily. "You are young, dear Perry; 'twere a hard and thankless task to be the friend of Nora Raymond." She had sank down to the seat again, and was sad and trembling.

"Yes, Nora, more than friendship, more than mortal's usual love, will I pledge to you." And he continued impetuously, "Nora, dear Nora, I must, I will speak to you, now; I have sought you in dim, sweet dreams, on the restless sea, when the breathless midnight beat to the same lovetune as my heart, and when the brown autumn had shed its leaves over the great oak-roots, and winters moaned through the lindens drearily, and my soul was an empty, lorn and hungry space, a wide and hollow fane; when you appeared at Meadowvale, you seemed to leap into it like a new-born star, and my heart at once overflowed with melody and bliss—I have declared to you my passion a thousand times as our glances have met—say, Nora, is this sweet dream to pass?" And he knelt down upon the damp grass before her.

He had taken her unresisting hands in his, and she leaned over towards him in the moonlight, the old poplars rustling above them, and whispered to his eager ears:

"Dear Perry, I love you!" And with her eyes beaming into his, and while the melting heart softened every feature, she kissed him!

At that moment Perry could have scattered kingdoms like halfpence, he was drunk with joy, it was the royal hour, and as the midnight of her tresses floated around his face, the freed ringlets almost reeling down to the dewy grass, and her white arms imprisoning his neck, their cheeks close together, and their breath mixing like their souls, it was indeed Love's banquet spread. A strange incident indeed—a poet's love requited. All was embraced in that sentence, "Dear Perry, I love you!"

Since the arrival of Leonora Raymond at Meadowvale, a strange change had come over Paul Montague; instead of his fresh, hearty laugh echoing over the lawns, and his full voice sounding in song, as he wandered over his estate, he had been abstracted and silent, and had taken greater pleasure in rambling through the old woods, sailing upon the broad river, and taking long, lonely rides; it seemed as if he wished to work off feelings which were oppressive, and it was so.

When Nora had first arrived she had surprised him into admiration for her, and that feeling had been gradually growing ever since, and it was only when he beheld the loving attentions of Perry to her, and her pleased acceptance of them, that it dawned upon his mind that he was actually feeling jealous of the youth, and when he had clearly defined his thoughts, he was angry from his soul that such feelings could find a place in his heart; he therefore tried by every means in his power to avoid the being who was the cause of this unhappy tumult in his breast. It was in vain he thought of the injury he was doing his wife, in vain all the feelings of honor were marshalled; no power it seemed was able to overcome that of his daily growing and dishonest love; but there is no doubt this conflict in his mind would have resulted in his complete victory over himself, but for feelings which were sharply wounded—self-love and vanity.

He thought of by-gone days, when he believed Nora Raymond had loved him; he beheld her now cold and calm as a statue to him—she heeded him no more than politeness exacted from her—she seemed entirely to ignore the past, and cast all her bewildering glances towards Perry, as if throwing defiance in Paul's very teeth. Yes, he was piqued, his vanity suffered terribly, and with the natural selfishness of man he determined to conquer this impregnable citadel. His passion had entirely got the reins of duty, honor and reason, his heart was in a glow like heated steel, and his weakness taught him imperatively to follow his own mad will; he would not think of coming griefs, or what sorrow his course might entail upon many suffering hearts. No, he banished all thoughts save those which fed his guilty passion.

Nora Raymond saw a great change in Paul Montague; he who had been the courteous host, coldly polite, kindly indifferent, now bent over her tenderly as she played upon the piano in the evening, his voice was modulated by the passion which was raging in his heart, his eyes grew darker, softer, as they gazed on her; it was his care that now enveloped her form in warm coverings when she ventured out into the chill air of the August nights, while his wife would thank him so much in her heart for his attentions to her lovely friend, and stand by, a busy, laughing spirit of joy, uttering playful remarks. O, how Paul Montague was insulting her by his admiration of Nora!

She had thawed considerably towards her host, and often would they ride and stroll together. Perry engaged still in his hard studies, but often snatching an hour from these for Nora and happiness, and upon these occasions the vows were exchanged as warmly and sealed as sweetly as upon that first evening beneath the dark poplars. Perry Miller would have staked his life upon the truth of Leonora Raymond, as he remembered the kiss which trembled on his cheek that night, with touch lighter than a roseleaf, and her joyful tears and blushes were buried in his heart, while the sound of her silver voice rippled towards him, "I love you." O, yes, he had sweet faith.

Perry was seated in his study on a pleasant evening in September, the casement thrown open, with the moon's slant beams silvering the old statues in the corners, and the zephyrs wafting in the sweetest garden odors; he looked out at the great sailing clouds, which now and then obscured pale Cynthia's light, and as her glory again burst forth unobscured, he conjured up dusk figures starting from the shades, and fantastic shapes dancing in the gloom; he was indulging in one of those pleasant reveries, feeling as though the sweetest pleasure on earth was to think, at least when one could think such happy thoughts.

He heard voices in the garden, he looked out and beheld his Uncle Paul coming down to the little recess almost beneath his window, and Nora was hanging on his arm. He smiled, and his thoughts again ranged to futurity, and this time a loved home sprang up, painted in all the beauties of vine-clad doors, jessamine covered casements, and she its mistress; but he heard the voice of Paul addressing Nora, and he was about to put his head from the window and speak to them, when words were uttered which caused the blood to rush back from his heart, and kept him rooted there stiff and cold like a being of flesh and blood transformed to granite.

"No, Nora, it is not so," spoke Paul, "these long, long years I have never forgotten you. I thought of you, it is true, as one dead—at least to me. I thought time had conquered, but when you appeared here, all the memories rushed back to my heart, I knew then the fire had never died."

"I say again, I cannot trust to Paul Montague; every pretty face impresses him, every bright eye bewilders him, and brings him a slave to the feet of thousands."

"By Heaven I swear, Leonora, that I have never loved but you. I was mad when I thought so." And his voice was full of emotion.

"You were fickle to me, Paul," and her voice was more tender than when she spoke before, "and now you are false to her, how should I trust you?"

"More than ever," he answered, passionately. "O, Nora, if you could only have known the feelings which flashed like fire through my heart the first night you came, when I expiated by those quick pangs all the fickleness of those former years. I knew not that it was love even then, until I saw your eyes flashing upon Perry, and wooing the boy, drawing his soul to yours by your glance of magnetism—"

"Stop, you must not speak more of this, Paul. I am weak; God knows how weak!" And her voice trembled, and was as low as the cooing of a wounded dove. "You know Perry has declared his love to me, I will not be false to him. I will not leave the gash across his heart which for years has been bleeding in mine. We two have again met like ships upon the sea; yours sails into port, I am content that mine may speed away on lonely paths, through mists and cloud, and foam. I will not marry Perry. I will not allow you to become a guilty wretch for my sake. I loved you always, I will tell you this now that we must part forever; I would to God that you had never known this secret, or else had known it years before. I bear a heavy doom; my rich heart has been like a palace shattered, but I shall stand up amidst its ruins calmly, when I think I have not dragged you down with me."

While she had been speaking, Paul was moved to the soul, and when Nora in that hour of trial proved herself the strongest, he felt as though he could not, would not, give her up. He interrupted her with burning words which came tripping from his tongue, as his thoughts were stirred by his love.

The statue still stood on the window above them, immovable, stupefied, and as the moon struck upon Perry's pale, rigid features, he looked almost petrified. There was the evidence, however, of a struggling smile, when he saw Nora so much the stronger, nobler being.

Paul still urged. Nora was becoming less firm; her words were mingled freely with her tears. Ah, mortals are ever weak when love is a prompter. She made an attempt to go to the house. Paul urged her to hear him but a moment. She gave him that moment. Ah, that fatal indecision! His insidious, gilded arguments glided like delicious music into her soul, her head drooped upon his shoulder, their words were lower and more tender, their breaths mingled with their sighs, and in the intoxication of the moment the words were uttered which the night breezes wafted up to the casement:

"Dearest, I yield—I am yours—I consent to fly with you."

These words smote upon the statue's ears. No longer granite, nor immovable, was that form, but a shudder ran through the whole frame like a strong electric shock, a feeling of intense pain convulsed the features, a faint groan escaped from the bloodless lips, and the form staggered, then fell to the floor like a corpse.

Who shall attempt to describe the feelings of the student? Let all the anguish which hearts have experienced in years of misery be condensed into one brief instant, and that to make a millionth part of the sorrow of that bitter stroke, and we can nearly understand it.

The next day Perry did not appear amongst the family, he pleaded illness. How ill he was none guessed. None ever knew what a conflict he had with love, reason and duty, but his was one of those strong, conscientious natures that to learn the right was but to practise it.

Another beautiful night at Meadowvale; no winds to stir the trees, and leaves, and bowers; the pale moon again riding in the heavens, and her lambent beams searching lovers out to soften eyes, to play upon sweet features, and with her slant beams often interposing between kisses, sharing half their sweetness. Nine, ten o'clock had passed, the quiet and regular household had settled down to that stillness which speaks of the general reign of Morpheus. Eleven o'clock, and a stealthy figure emerged from the bushes behind the arbor near the poplars, and crept silently towards the house, a window was quietly opened and a head was thrust cautiously forth; perhaps it was the moon, but O, the face was deadly pale. A light still glimmered in the room of Annie Montague the wife, at the other wing.

The figure comes from out the bushes, he treads lightly, but the gravel still creaks loudly under his feet; but the household slumbers on. He bears a light ladder to the opened window, puts one end down, then another, then carefully rests it against the house, crushing all the honey-suckles beneath it. What cares he? He would crush hearts as well.

The lady steps out upon the topmost round, a murmur, then she slowly descends, each round seeming to creak warningly, till she reaches the bottom and is folded in the figure's arms. Now back to the bushes, lightly towards the old poplars, cross through the wood to the old road, they are now in the lane leading to the gate, the entrance to the shore, where a carriage is awaiting them, and the impatient horses are pawing holes in the sand. Still advancing to the gate, the man's strong arms around the woman's almost fainting form, he was about to open the gate and pass through, onward to their fate. A figure started out from the shades of the lindens, and the tall form of Perry Miller stood before Paul Montague and Nora Raymond. Had an apparition darted out before them they would have been startled no more; a faint shriek from Nora, as she fell almost fainting back upon Paul, who confronted Perry, as he said:

"Ha, you here—"

"Yes, Paul Montague, I am here; here to stop one of the most terrible crimes ever contemplated. I overheard all in the garden last night. I do not seek to save Nora Raymond for myself, that is all over, I know; but I will save Nora by saving your wife, for 'tis she who now claims my pity. I will repay her all the gratitude I owe her for her kindness to the orphan, by saving her from such shame and misery as this, and then I leave your house forever."

His glance was scorching, and Nora almost felt the lightning from his eyes blast her where she stood. Montague at first was surprised almost out of speech, he felt Nora shiver in his arms, he still was determined to go on, in spite of all.

"Out of my path," he cried, striding forward. "I will go on. I have chosen my road, 'tis not in the power of a boy to drive me back."

"For shame, Paul Montague!" replied Perry, but he did not stir. "Will not the thought of her, who for years has been your faithful wife, drive you back? Will you forfeit at one instant your years of toil for fame—your honor and your good name—and drag down that weak woman to perdition with you beside? Will you crush forever the happiness of her who now watches for your coming, and all for a few hours of guilty joy? O, Paul Montague! Uncle, for heaven's sake, go back, go back! 'tis yet time! Retrieve all your crimes by that one act of mercy!" And he leaned forward, clasping his hands, towards Paul, supplicating him to return.

Nora stepped from the side of Paul, and said, while her tears and sobs would let her speak:

"He is right, Paul. I will go back. I can save all. I never saw the horror of my crime till now—"

"By all my hopes, I swear you shall not go back! Out of my way, boy, or I will strike you to the earth!" And he stepped forward to open the gate.

Perry grasped the fainting woman by the arm, and drew her quickly behind him; then, quick as thought, he pulled two heavy pistols from his bosom, and as Paul stepped towards him, the two ominous muzzles pointed at his head, and the stern eyes of that pale man gave guarantee that he would not hesitate to pull the triggers which his fingers pressed upon.

"Since you scoff at moral laws, I will try this persuasion; and I will shoot you dead at my feet, rather than your infamous plan should be carried out."

But now Nora was in front of him, and grasped his uplifted arm.

"Spare him! spare him, Perry, if you ever loved me!" she almost shrieked.

His arms dropped; through his stern purpose those words came as oil into smarting wounds.

Montague's head had fallen upon his breast—the arms of Perry encircled and supported Nora. What a picture in the moonlight!

Perry walked with his charge unmolested towards the house; the humble, guilty man followed. He had in that brief, awful moment seen, as in a panorama before him, the dreadful horror of his crime, souls perishing in the maelstrom of his dishonor. He could have wept at the feet of Nora, and would have given his life to have wiped out the record of his insults to his faithful wife; and in his deep humiliation, he could have embraced Perry as his saviour.

The next day, Nora Raymond left Meadowvale in haste; the sorrowful Annie Montague had taken her plausible letters and fair excuses as the cause, and when the carriage rattled away, Paul's and Perry's glances met, dreadful, sad meaning in the first, awful lifetime sorrow in the last.

Years, many years, had passed over Meadowvale. None, save the actors, knew of The Midnight Episode; but Perry Miller travelled, a lonely, famous man known to the world as a poet and scholar, over nearly all the earth. He had come back, from over the seas, to greet Paul Montague and his wife again at the old home. He passed through New York, from Boston, on his way to Maryland, when he stopped in the former city and visited a certain famous hospital. As he passed through one of the wards, a sister of charity raised up from the bedside of one of the patients, and when she gazed on Miller, the crimson flush mounted clear up to the snowy white band which confined her hair. Heavens! he recognized the features, still fresh, pure and fair, of her whom he had known as Leonora Raymond!

ORIGIN OF SILK HATS.

The "Nouvelliste" of Rouen, narrates the following curious anecdote: "M. Botta, son of one of the professors at the Academy of Caen, an intrepid traveller and confirmed archaeologist, one of the discoverers of the ruins of Nineveh, undertook a journey to China, and lived some time at Canton. This was prior to 1830. He used to wear there a beaver hat in the European fashion, which suited him so well that he was unwilling to change it. However, when it was worn out, he applied to a Chinese hatter, and giving him all sorts of directions, told him to make another like it. The man went to work, and in a few days brought a hat of the required shape, not of beaver, but of some stuff very soft and glossy. M. Botta on his return to France, preserved this curious specimen of Chinese workmanship, and wishing to have it repaired, entrusted it to a hatter, who examined it carefully, and was much struck with its mode of fabrication, which was altogether new to him. He examined the article with the greatest attention, and a short time after the present fashion of silk hats came in. The inventor patented his discovery and made a fortune, but held his tongue about his debt to the Chinese tradesman, who, seeking a substitute for the beaver, which he could not procure, devised the plan of replacing it by the light tissue of silk, which, at present almost universally constitutes the outward covering of the modern hat. We beg to restore to the Chinaman, although somewhat late, the honor due to him."

FABLE.

A gourd had wound itself around a lofty palm, and in a few weeks climbed to its very top.

"How old mayest thou be?" asked the new-comer.

"About a hundred years!"

"About a hundred years, and no taller! Only look; I have grown as tall as you in fewer days than you can count years!"

"I know that well," replied the palm. "Every year of my life a gourd has climbed up round me, as proud as thou art, and as short-lived as thou wilt be."—The Modern Esop.

THE FIGHTING TAILORS.

In the time of George the Second, when a British army was on the Continent of Europe fighting the French, a regiment of light cavalry was ordered to be raised in a hurry, and a strike among the London tailors occurring at the time, the said regiment was immediately filled up with journey-men tailors, and, when thought fit for the battlefield, they were sent to Germany, and under the famous Marquis of Granby these tailors fought on all occasions with such gallantry as not only to draw forth eulogiums from their general, but to become a positive terror to the enemy.—*Sat. ## THE HOUSE OPPOSITE.

BY FANNIE DENNETT HALL.

WE lived in the suburbs of the city; in fact, our neighborhood had more of the city than the country element in it, being a prim, dignified plain, whose inhabitants were little given to gossiping or to similar sins. In spite of some disadvantages, it was altogether the loveliest spot, in the summer time, that we had ever seen. By we, I mean Harry and myself, who were, with the exception of our little maid-of-all-work, the only inhabitants of Hawthorn Cottage, a delightful little mushroom of a house, springing up in the midst of hawthorns and barberry-bushes and all sorts of untamed vegetation.

The cottage had the advantage over some dwellings of being deliciously cool in summer, and in winter—well, that was a slight drawback, to be sure—it was damp and disagreeably cold. Harry did not seem to mind this, however, and neither did I, except when I was attacked with a fever and ague, which lasted till summer time. However, that's neither here nor there.

Directly opposite us was a stately mansion, with a sloping lawn and flower-beds in the shape of hearts and rounds; in these latter grew all kinds of tame flowers, which arrogantly wafted their fragrance into our humble nook.

Never ending were the speculations in which Harry and I indulged, when, in the cool of the evening, seated upon our piazza, we gazed at the mansion opposite. Numerous were the romances we composed, Harry and I; and if all these had been written down and sent to some appreciating publisher, we might have been rich by this time.

At this time, the house was vacant; indeed, it had not been occupied since we had been in the neighborhood. We had heard, though, through one channel and another, curious stories about the mansion. One rumor ran that it was haunted; another was, that no family had ever inhabited it, but that it had lost while there one or more of its members by death. Another story, and very absurd, both Harry and I voted it, was, that no one could enter this wonderful house without being chilled through and through, in such a manner that it required weeks to remove the disagreeable feeling.

It was the second summer of our residence at Hawthorn Cottage. One morning, just after Harry had started for town, I took my sewing and seated myself at a window which commanded a view of the mysterious house, as we had got into the habit of calling it. The noise of wheels attracted my attention, and, looking up, I saw that a carriage was drawn up at the opposite entrance, and that a gentleman and two ladies were descending from it. I am not much in the habit of watching people, but so many had been our conversations about the haunted mansion, that I was really curious to know what was about to happen.

The gentleman, an elderly man, with long white hair, which was singularly inconsistent with his active movements, led the way; the two ladies, one elderly, the other young, followed, and in a moment more the door of the mysterious house had closed upon all three. Half an hour afterwards, they came out, and I had a good view of the faces of the strangers. Never shall I forget the face of the younger lady, as I first saw it that summer morning. We read of such, but seldom, if ever, do we meet with them in real life. Fair and saintlike, it seemed to have caught its expression from the contemplation of diviner objects than mortals usually behold.

As she stood waiting to enter the carriage, I fancied I saw her shudder; and immediately after she drew her light shawl more closely about her. The story of the fatal chill came into my mind, and from that moment I was a believer in it. Not even was I to be laughed out of this belief by Harry, to whom I broached the subject at our evening meal. He laughed, also, at my enthusiastic description of the younger lady, refused to believe her a creature less earthly than ordinary mortals, and ended the matter by hinting at the impropriety of Mrs. Harry Dole's watching people from the window. This put an end for the present, to all talk on the subject.

Two days after, several loads of elegant furniture came to the house opposite, I could not resist the temptation—although I was the wife of Mr. Harry Dole, merchant—of casting a look now and then across the way. As long as Harry did not know it, it did not matter much.

A week after I had first seen them, our neighbors were settled in their new dwelling, and everything went on as quietly, seemingly, as if there was no such thing in the world as a mysterious house. Once or twice I saw the young lady in the garden, but as a general thing, we seldom saw our neighbors from one week's end to another. After a while, I began to think it was our duty to call upon them; but as often as I made the proposal, Harry was sure to have a headache, or there was some other excuse, and as I myself have a horror of making calls, the matter was indefinitely postponed.

The summer passed, and autumn came on unusually chilly. I remember it well, for, early as it was, we began to have a little fire of an evening; and to draw the curtains to make it look cosy. Sometimes the wind whistled about the house, and sometimes it came in low, wailing sounds, like some person in distress. Never shall I forget that autumn; every circumstance that happened then, is impressed upon my mind too deeply ever to be effaced.

It was the saddest and the dreariest season I had ever known; and it was only when I had drawn the curtains to shut out the desolate world outside, and we were gathered about the bright, coal fire, that I was really happy.

It was nine o'clock in the evening; we had gradually dropped into silence and were listening, or at least I was, to the wind outside. Suddenly there came upon the blast a shriek so inexpressibly mournful and startling, that both Harry and I started to our feet and stood looking at each other in consternation. Once again, even while we stood spell-bound, it came mingling with the wind, and gradually dying out in such low, melancholy wailings, that our very blood seemed frozen.

Harry ran to the front door, and opening it, peered into the darkness; with the exception of the wind, all was quiet. There were a few stray lights in the house of our opposite neighbors, but nothing that betokened confusion or commotion; and yet the sound seemed to have come from that direction, and must have been more audible to them than to us.

We stood at the door for five minutes, waiting for a repetition of the sound. For the third time we heard it, now more like a howl than a shriek; more frightful than ever from its intensity, and dying out, as before, by degrees. There was no mistaking the direction this time; the shriek or howl proceeded from the mysterious mansion opposite, now, indeed, doubly mysterious.

I shivered and drew back. Harry closed the door, and with a thoughtful face, seated himself by the fire in our cosy little parlor.

The silence of fifteen minutes was at length broken by Harry.

"You are right; there is something strange about our neighbors opposite. I wonder who and what they are!"

"Do you think," I ventured to suggest, "that a murder has been committed?"

Harry looked grave. "We ought not childishly to imagine all sorts of terrible things; if there is any mystery about the matter, be sure that time will reveal it. I really hope there will be no further disturbance."

The next morning I saw the young lady in the garden, gathering a few of the fall flowers. It was impossible to connect the idea of crime with such a sweet, Madonna-like face, but still I was firm in the belief that some mystery hung over the house and its inhabitants.

It might have been a week after the above occurrence, that Harry and I were sitting up unusually late; singularly enough, our conversation had been very doleful upon this particular evening. We had gone back to the deaths of our parents, to the melancholy fate of Harry's only sister, a subject to which he very seldom referred. With a strange pertinacity, he spoke of it again and again, recapitulated the train of horrors that preceded the catastrophe, and lingered upon the frightful details in a manner that made me unusually nervous.

The fire had died out, and the room was getting chilly; both of us had now relapsed into a gloomy silence, which ill prepared us for what was to follow. With awful distinctness there came again that well remembered shriek, still ever new in its horror. That night there was no wind, and every stage of the sound, from its first fullness to the last dying wail, smote upon our ears in a manner that is never to be forgotten while I live.

"This is frightful!" said Harry, starting up and dashing across the room.

As for me, I sank back upon the sofa, and closing my eyes, awaited with nervous shudders, which I could not prevent, whatever fresh horrors were in store for us.

Perhaps the groans that followed were more frightful than the shrieks. Groans that I should have thought possible to have been wrung only from the lips of those who die amidst exquisite tortures; fell upon our ears without cessation.

Harry seized his hat and rushed to the door, and I followed him. Just then, the side door of the mansion closed with a bang, and a moment after, a carriage with side lights passed out of the gateway and went at a furious pace down the road.

The groans had ceased; all was now as still as the grave, and not even a light could be seen in the mysterious house. We had nothing else left us to do but to close our own door, and, retreating to the parlor, to stare at each other in horror and perplexity.

"If this disturbance ever happens again," said Harry, solemnly, "I shall feel it my duty to investigate the mystery, at whatever cost. It is very strange."

I was in no humor for making any answer; my old enemy, the ague, had fast hold of me, for such had been the effect of the sudden shock, that it had brought back what, as I thought, I had long ago got rid of.

An hour after, during which time I had not moved from the sofa, I heard—indeed, we both heard—the sound of returning wheels, and once again the side lights flashed, as the carriage re-entered the gateway; then all was quiet again. That was truly a night of horrors; how we lived through it, I cannot tell.

The next day I had some callers, people that lived in our neighborhood. They had, as I supposed likely, heard the sounds that had so disturbed us the night before.

"It's clear to my mind that the house is haunted," said Mrs. Ball, a very genteel and prim, middle-aged lady. "Such groans and shrieks no mortal ever could have uttered. I really don't know what to do in the matter."

"They do say," chimed in number two, "that that beautiful young lady is dying by inches. Every day she grows thinner and thinner, for do all she may, she cannot escape the doom that hangs over her."

"Nonsense!" was the polite rejoinder of number three; "I don't believe a word about the house being haunted. It's my opinion that some crime has been, or is being committed in the house, and that the young lady is an unwilling accomplice to it; no wonder, poor thing, she is dying. Well, it's none of my business."

That night, when Harry came home, he informed me that he had made all possible inquiries concerning our opposite neighbors, but no one seemed to know anything about them. As the matter still continued as mysterious as ever, and we could gain no new light upon the subject, we ceased to speak about it; but every night we dreaded a repetition of the sound.

It was the last Sunday in October; I remember it well, for Harry and I took a longer stroll than usual after the afternoon service. We lost our way, and were obliged to come through a long lane, which in summer was just the greenest and the loveliest country road that I ever saw. Now, everywhere it was strewn with bright-colored leaves, through which we trampled with the keenest sense of enjoyment of what might be considered very childish by some.

We met only one person; we very seldom meet any one in such roads. I don't think Harry took much notice of this man—and I didn't, at first; but when I saw him glare at me as if he wished to annihilate me, I walked on a little faster—though I laughed at myself, a minute after, for being such a coward.

When we came to Hawthorn Cottage, there seemed to be a great commotion in and about the house opposite. The hired man was saddling a horse in the stable, and the elderly gentleman whom we supposed the head of the family, was running from one place to another with great activity. The young lady whom I have so often spoken of, was standing at the gateway, looking down the road and wringing her hands. There was upon her face an expression of anguish which at once awakened my sympathy, and I was upon the point of running to her and speaking, when she turned away, without perceiving us, and walked slowly up the carriage road. Something had happened to alarm and distress our neighbors, but what it was, we could not even guess; and circumstances forbade our offering them sympathy and aid. All through that peaceful Sunday afternoon, even till night, strangers were coming and going, with faces upon which was clearly expressed anxiety.

I confess that Harry and I were somewhat curious to know what was going on in that mansion of mystery; but we were not destined to be gratified. As before, we heard about midnight the noise of returning wheels, and then the sound of many voices; then all was quiet again.

On Monday morning the haunted house, which had figured in my dreams the night previously, wore, externally at least, as peaceful a look as ever. I half fancied that I had dreamed the events of the afternoon before; but that idea vanished, when Harry spoke of the matter at the breakfast table.

We came to the conclusion, Harry and I, that the house opposite contained some dreadful mystery which it behooved us to know, if we expected to enjoy any more peace and quietness. But the question was—how were we to know?

Harry insisted upon it, and nearly convinced me of the same thing, that the matter was so suspicious in its aspects, that he or any other person was justified in informing the proper authorities of the circumstances, and requiring them to give an explanation of the mystery.

For a long time I objected to such a summary mode of proceeding; but I was not proof against Harry's argument, and in the end was obliged to confess that such a course was no more than justice to the whole neighborhood.

It is singular how events turn out sometimes; just before Harry went down town, that morning, we had a letter come, by which I learned that my sister and her husband had just arrived from India, and wished us to meet them in the city. That circumstance drove our previous conversation from my mind, and I think from Harry's mind also, for he made no allusion to it during that day or the next.

We remained two days in the city, and during that time Hawthorn Cottage was shut up. The meeting with my sister after an interval of several years, the sense of relief from the knowledge that in our temporary abode we should not be subjected to the terrors of the haunted house, made an entirely different person of me; and when, towards night, we arrived at Hawthorn Cottage, I was in the gayest of spirits. I had many pleasant things to think of, not the least of which was that, in a few days, my sister was coming to make our little mansion a long visit.

It was near ten, that same evening, and I had put my work away and was meditating the propriety of retiring for the night, when suddenly, as ever, there came to our ears a succession of those shrieks which had chilled us with horror twice before.

Harry sprang to his feet with the determination of discovering the origin of those frightful sounds, if such a thing were possible; for the repetition of them was almost beyond endurance. At the piazza of our cottage, he came to a full stop; there was something singular about the appearance of the house opposite. From the side windows flashed a long, lurid gleam of light, which lit up all objects on that side of the house. The shrieks still continued, but in contemplating the mansion, we almost forgot them.

"Good heavens! the house is on fire!" was Harry's vehement exclamation, as he dashed down the steps, leaving me spell-bound at his announcement.

The next moment I rushed into the hall, seized a woolen shawl, and then sped after Harry, who had by this time gained the side door of the mansion. As I passed up the carriage road, tongues of fire leaped from the upper windows, and a hideous "ha, ha, ha!" uttered from above, rang in my ears. Harry opened the door and passed in without ceremony, I following him.

There was no one in the room into which we entered but the elderly lady whom we had once or twice seen. She was running from one place to another, gathering up stray articles, but evidently without much idea of what she was doing. Leaving her in my charge, Harry rushed up stairs to the immediate scene of the fire.

It was piteous to see the old lady moving fruitlessly about the room, every now and then stopping to wring her hands. It was no time for ceremony, so I tried to make her understand that if she had valuables to save, she had better secure them at once. Acting upon my suggestion, she went to work actively, and by the time a half a score of the other neighbors had arrived, we had contrived to save many things.

Then followed a scene of confusion that it is almost impossible to describe. Harry was here, there and everywhere; sometimes directing those who were attempting to extinguish the fire, sometimes handing up the buckets of water, and again helping to remove the furniture. Above all the noise and confusion, I, and all of us who were down stairs, heard those awful groans and shrieks, doubly awful from the circumstances, and proceeding apparently from the very room where the fire had originated.

It soon became evident that no effort could save the house, and the attention of all was now turned to the furniture. I looked round for Harry, but he was no where to be found. The greater part of us had retreated to the garden, driven thither by the intense heat, and it was while standing there, that I saw Harry re-appear at the door, bearing in his arms the inanimate form of the young lady, whom until that moment, strange to say, I had forgotten. I ran forward and received her, and with a little help, I had soon conveyed her across the street to Hawthorn Cottage. The moment she was somewhat recovered, I hurried back to the scene of the fire, although my aid was no longer needed.

It was a grand but awful sight. I had never had such a near view of a fire before, and I pray that I may never have another. The flames leaped up and roared as if they had human voices, and we stood breathless, almost overpowered by the grandeur of the scene.

Fortunately Hawthorn Cottage was not endangered, for the wind bore the flames in an entirely opposite direction. I was thinking how I should have felt if our home had gone too, enveloped in those awful tongues of flame, when a movement of the crowd about me attracted my attention. The crowd nearest the building parted, and two men, whom I recognized as Harry and our neighbor with the venerable white hair, came slowly along, bearing between them the dead body of a man; I knew he was dead by the peculiarly listless manner in which his arms hung down.

They came nearer, and impelled by a fascination which I could not resist, I retained my place while the others fell back. O, shocking sight! disfigured and begrimed with smoke as it was, I nevertheless recognized that peculiar face that had glared upon me in the country road not many Sundays ago. They passed on mournfully with their burden of senseless clay, and I never saw it again.

The next morning, when we looked out, we saw only a smouldering heap of ruins where once stood the haunted house. I heard a physician once say that it would be a lucky thing, if all such consumption-breeding houses could be destroyed by fire; and as he spoke, he shrugged his shoulders and glanced at Hawthorn Cottage. I suppose he meant that the situation was rather damp—and indeed we found it so, after living there a couple of years. Fever and ague isn't the pleasantest disease that ever was, and I found that Hawthorn Cottage was peculiarly favorable to such diseases. I never wholly recovered until we moved to a home of our own, located in a particularly healthy spot.

The homeless family, father, mother and daughter, remained with us a few days, at our urgent invitation, and when they went away, we had formed an acquaintance with them which will last through life. We count them now among our best friends.

A week after the fire, I said to Harry :

"There is one thing that troubles me, Harry. I am certain you know, and yet you have never told me the mystery of that house opposite."

"Haven't I?" said Harry. "Well, it is a sad subject; let that be my excuse for not telling you."

"What was it?" I persisted; and one more question—"who was it that you bore from the house that awful night?"

"The only son of our neighbor, a raving maniac; he was the author of the fire, and perished in it. That is the whole mystery of the house opposite, and I am thankful that was the only mystery. I hope we shall never be troubled by it any more." I hoped so too.

AROTIC PALATES.

Bills of fare vary very much, even in Greenland. I have inquired of Petersen, and he tells me that the Greenland Esquimaux (there are many Greenlanders of Danish origin) are not agreed as to which of their animals affords the most delicious food; some of them prefer reindeer venison, others think more favorably of the young dog, the flesh of which he asserts, is "just like the beef of sheep." He says a Danish captain who had acquired the taste, provided some for his guests, and they praised his mutton. After dinner he sent for the skin of the animal, which was no other than a large red dog. This occurred in Greenland, where his Danish guests had resided for many years, far removed from European mutton. Baked puppy is a real delicacy all over Polynesia. At the Sandwich Islands I was once invited to a feast, and had to feign disappointment as well as I could, when told that puppy was so extremely scarce it could not be procured in time, and therefore sucking-pig was substituted.—Mr. Clintock's Voyage of the Fox.

[ORIGINAL.] SOUP, ETC.

BY MARGARET VERNE.

Mrs. PUTNAM, John Martin's portly, bustling housekeeper, made delicious soups. Not black, greasy compounds, which look as if manufactured out of stale dish-water and burnt crusts, and taste just as they look; not weak, frothy mixtures, genteelly diluted, peppered and salted reminders of the time of Noah and the ark, when water was, according to historical accounts, quite plenty, and beef-shanks couldn't have been had for love or money; not thick porridges of stewed vegetables, enough to make one's head ache just to think of, for pitying the poor potatoes and cabbages and turnips at losing their individuality in such a melange. Not any of these, but rich, sweet, savory messes, such as would make an epicure's mouth water—the liquid part like amber jelly, and the different vegetables floating about in distinct but harmonious companies—the crimson and white and yellow slices of beet and carrot and potato, to say nothing of parsnips and onions, mingling like rubies and gold and pearls. That may be a little extravagant—but never mind! Why, it actually used to seem to me as though some good old cow (Mr. Martin never ate mutton or pork), I mean, rather, some good young cow, had made it the direct aim of her life to see what a nice specimen of a marrow-bone she could manufacture for Mrs. Putnam's especial benefit in soup making; and as though, moreover, she must have been proud of giving up the ghost if she could but have foreseen the good lady's success. The cow that could have tasted or even smelled of Mrs. Putnam's soups, and then begrudged her a shank, would deserve to be put to the rack.

But I am spending too much time with my preface. If anybody thinks me a gormandizer, from the above eulogy, I just wish they were obliged to sit down before a brimming tureen of soup such as I have described, and then get up and go away without so much as a taste. That is all.

You see it was in this way that I happened to know anything about it. Father's house in the city was undergoing repairs, and we, that is, mother and I, (for are not the women-people the "we" of every establishment?) had decided that it would be quite impossible to inhabit it while they were going on. To be sure, the library, back parlor and sleeping rooms were to be kept safe from the despoiling hands of the carpenters, painters and paperers; but then, what with the noise and rubbish and general confusion and disarrangement of affairs, we solemnly declared in the face of all papa's remonstrances that we never could stand it in the world—our nerves could never endure the shock. Now mother might not have been whimsical or foolish in her opinion, for she was in reality a delicate, sickly woman, subject to all manner of neuralgias and nervous headaches, and the dear knows what all—bless her heart! But as for me, a miss of seventeen, talking about her nerves! I ought to have had my ears boxed.

Now anything like a hubbub and uproar was my especial delight, and it is a wonder that I ever thought of evacuating the premises at any rate. Indeed, I don't think the idea would ever have grown to a wish if it hadn't been for the curiosity of knowing where we should go to if we did. If it had been a little earlier in the year we could have retreated to Newport or Saratoga, but in the early autumn as it was, there was no such thing possible. Father had a perfect horror of hotel lodgings, and the idea of hiring a tenement seemed so extremely funny that I determined at once, as recorded above, that my nervous system would never pass unshattered through so much din as the workmen would make. I had heard and read so many absurd house-hunting adventures, that my mirth-loving spirit caught the cue at once. I determined, if papa would not listen to my mother's importunities, I would make the house uninhabitable to him with my teasings.

Alas for human expectations! I succeeded in so far that the house was to be deserted as soon as we could find a suitable tenement to remove to, and the repairs were to be postponed until then. I had volunteered for the house-hunting business, and with my head full of anticipated curious adventures, was smilingly tying on my bonnet one sunny morning, preparatory to sallying out for my first trial, when papa came in, looking pleased and flurried, and announced that my services could be dispensed with, as John Martin, his junior partner, had offered him rooms in his house for the short time we were to be homeless.

Be it known that this same Mr. Martin was a nice young bachelor, handsome, intelligent, and while I am about it I may as well add mighty proud and dignified in his ways. He was a frequent visitor at our house, and I should have been charmed with him, only that proper people were my abomination, and he was always so grave and quiet that I soon learned to stand in a very wholesome but not very agreeable awe of him. I was forever afraid of shocking him by my reckless gayety, though to be sure he never gave me any reason to entertain such a fear. His manner towards me was rather that of a staid elder brother to a spoiled and wilful child.

But I was quite enraged at him (innocent as he was of any intention to displease me) for spoiling my fun. The idea of spending one, and possibly two months, under the same roof with him, was perfectly horrifying to me. What with my laughing (I had a voice like a young savage's for clearness), romping, singing, dancing, piano playing and guitar thrumming, I should quite shock him out of his senses I felt sure. Not, of course, that I cared particularly for that—only, you see, didn't I tell you he was young and handsome, and a bachelor? Well, then.

Papa's look of blank wonder at the indignant way in which I snatched my bonnet from my head and marched from the parlor at his announcement, made me laugh in spite of myself, though I was careful not to indulge the propensity until I was out of sight.

Of course it was of no use opposing this new arrangement; I knew that to begin with, and that my best way was to submit as graciously as possible. If there wasn't a malicious intention away down in the bottom of my wicked little heart to have my revenge on Mr. John Martin before our stay was over, why then my name never was Bessie Wheatly.

We changed habitations immediately. Our new residence was a large, elegant mansion, in the suburbs of the city. The grounds about it were magnificent, and under any other circumstances I should have gone into most extravagant rhapsodies of delight and admiration. As it was, I had a decided objection to being gratified or pleased with anything, so I very haughtily turned up my capacious nose to the whole concern, house, garden and all. As for my behaviour, if my heroine wasn't in the first person, which would render the declaration excessively impolite, you see, I should say it was abominable. I overheard Mrs. Putnam telling Mr. Martin, the second evening after our arrival, that I made "noise enough for a regiment of Hottentots." Where the good lady ever saw or heard a regiment of Hottentots is beyond my guessing.

"Well, well, she's nothing but a child yet," was the answer, for which I was breathlessly listening. "You mustn't fret at her. Let her make as much noise as she pleases, so long as she leaves the roof on over our heads."

Leave the roof on indeed! I would have performed the feat of lifting it that blessed minute, if there had been strength in chagrin and mortification.

Though Mr. Martin was the most courteous and attentive of landlords, and quite won upon the hearts of both my parents, he and I made no headway whatever in the way of becoming friends. If the fault had not been altogether mine, I should have been sorry. Sometimes he brought me his favorite books to read, marking passages for my particular notice. They would invariably get mislaid or forgotten—did he understand that it was not always by chance? If he did, he never signified so much; for when he would question me about them, and I would tell him I had not read them, he would smile in his peculiar, quiet way, say "Ah, indeed," and bring me another straightway. Presuming, wasn't he? He offered me flowers, too, sometimes (for though we had the range of the garden, we never felt at liberty to make free with his floral treasures). Most commonly his bouquets would get thrown down carelessly, a moment after presentation (at which he never looked annoyed or resentful in the least)—sometimes torn up or mutilated before his very eyes, or twisted into pellets to pelt my canary with; though I believe I was once (only once, I assure you) guilty of carrying one to my room, preserving it in a vase of water for nearly a week, and then putting it away carefully to dry between the leaves of my Bible. It spoiled the book, and of course it was that I cried about for nearly three hours one evening a week afterward. It wasn't because Mr. Martin had invited me to accompany him to a concert, and I had refused him in a rude, unladylike way. O, no indeed!

When we had been in the house a month, I arrived at the wonderful conclusion that I hated Mr. John Martin most vigorously. I was helped to this understanding by a report that he was engaged to a beautiful young lady in a neighboring city. Mrs. Putnam told me it in confidence. I hated him so much that I couldn't endure the thought of there being any such happiness in store for him—really I couldn't!

But about the soup. After Mr. Martin's injunction not to "fret at me," the good housekeeper had taken a decided and almost childish liking to my noisy self; in fact, she took me under her especial guardianship, and petted and humored me as if I had been her own daughter. This was how I became acquainted with the most delicate, sedulously-guarded secret of her life—to wit, namely—that she always made Mr. Martin's soups herself.

"There wasn't a woman in the world—she didn't care if it was the Queen of Bungay (her historical and geographical knowledge wasn't of the highest order), who could hold a candle to her in making soup," she used to tell me, with a glow of satisfaction and pride on her comely face. "Though there didn't anybody mistrust," she invariably added, with an alarmed look; "and she wouldn't have me tell for the world, that she ever meddled with the cooking. She was Mr. Martin's housekeeper, and she hoped she knew her place."

Not knowing any one who would be over and above interested in this revelation, I was not particularly tempted to betray her secret, and so kept it—a circumstance which ought to go a little way certainly toward refuting the hateful calumnies about women, to the effect that none of us can keep a secret. I could and did. One day, after romping through the garden until I was as wild with exercise as an untamed hawk, I went into the house most particularly and voraciously hungry. I never was one of those delicate damsels who have a romantic faculty of living on air and moonshine—that my plump waist and red cheeks would have testified. But still I think and always shall think, that my appetite that day was somehow an unnatural one.

It lacked an hour of our dinner-time, but Mr. Martin always dined earlier, and as I ran into the back hall, my olfactories were greeted with the savory smell that, floating from the half-open door of the large dining-room, betrayed Mrs. Putnam to have been engaged outside of her own legitimate sphere again. I repeat it, I was hungry. I thought of the lunch I should get at home—nothing more than cake and cheese and cold coffee, for a whole hour, and my mouth watered for a taste of the warm, delicious soup. I had half a mind to run in and ask Mrs. Putnam for some, but that would seem so much like the action of a greedy child, I was ashamed to do it. So I crossed the hall with lingering, reluctant steps. I knew that Mr. Martin had not yet arrived, and as I passed the dining-room door I saw that the apartment was empty. Mrs. Putnam was probably in the kitchen.

For a moment I wrestled with a most unromantic temptation. There, before my eyes, on the elegantly laid table, smoked the tureen of soup, by some forgetfulness of the housekeeper's, left uncovered. Couldn't I just run in, snatch a taste, and run out again? I suppose I ought to be ashamed of acknowledging such a very disgraceful and shockingly unlady-like yielding to the tempter. I record it for your benefit, reader.

I tiptoed swiftly and silently into the room, and up to the table. Never since the fall of Adam was there anything so tantalizing to a hungry person's appetite as that first spoonful of soup. It was followed by another and another and another, until I had quite forgotten to keep count of them. The dish which contained the liquid temptation was a dainty, exquisite little china affair, scarcely capable of holding a quart, and all at once I discovered, to my unexpected dismay, that I had made a most suspicious lowering of its contents. Alas, who can tell how far the first wrong step may lead one into difficulty. What was to be done? There wasn't a cat or a dog on the premises to shoulder the mischief. I should certainly be found out, and O, that that dignified, grave John Martin (whom I hated so that I couldn't endure to have him engaged, you know!) should ever hear of me as a soup-stealer! Dear, dear, and he would hear of it!

As this distracting thought flew through my mind, and while my face was still hot with the shame of anticipated discovery, I suddenly became conscious of the presence of some one besides myself in the room. I dared not look up—I hoped it was only Mrs. Putnam—but I felt that it was Mr. Martin! My head swam—I turned sick and giddy with the quick thrill of anger and humiliation, and then with the insane idea of escaping from the consequences of my disgraceful action, and taking the evidence of my guilt with me, I snatched the tureen (what could I have been thinking of?) and started forward into the back hall, (that invisible presence had made its entrance at another door), pausing there an instant, with my heart throbbing so fast and loud with fear, that its swift beats were audible, and then rushing headlong out of doors into the garden—never stopping again in my precipitate flight, till I had crouched down half hidden in the vines of a summer-house at the very farthest extremity of the extensive grounds.

I set the soup dish on the low arbor seat, and looked at it. Yes, I think I did look at it! Eve, after eating her apple, might have looked at the innocent core much in the same way. Heavens! how I loathed soup just then! I believe to have swallowed the tenth part of a teaspoonful would have strangled me.

"Quite fond of soup, are you not, Miss Bessie? I hope you found it nice!"

My heart sprang to my throat. Paralyzed with horror, I could scarcely turn my eyes toward the speaker. There in the door of the summer-house, handsome and proud-looking as ever, only that there was a wicked light in his dark eyes, stood Mr. Martin.

"If you have completed your meal, as you seem to have done, I would respectfully remind you that I haven't been to dinner yet."

He reached out his hand in a way so wonderfully suggestive, that I never shall forget it till I die. What could I do but hand him the half-emptied dish. Did he see the tears of mortification in my eyes, and the fire that burned in scarlet flashes over my face, as I did so? O, what a cruel John he was!

"Do not let me rob you. Are you sure you have had quite enough?"

"Yes—yes, sir,—a great plenty," I managed to gasp out in reply, making a movement to go past him.

He anticipated me. His tall, stalwart figure blocked up the doorway so completely, that I might as well have contemplated escaping through a key-hole. I did not comprehend the whole of the punishment and torture he intended me to suffer, however, until he deliberately commenced eating—alternating the very leisurely employment of lifting the spoon to his mouth by glancing at me!

"Mrs. Putnam has outdone herself to-day," he said, at last. "This is really delicious! Don't you think so?"

I didn't answer him. How could I?

"You are sure you had a plenty?"

I bowed mechanically. It was the only way in which to rid myself for a single instant of the quizzical glance of his saucy eyes.

"And so have I—a plenty." (Here the spoon, rattling against the bottom of the dish, announced to me that it was empty.) "Mrs. Putnam never takes soup herself, and as she usually cooks more than enough for one dinner, what do you say to eating soup with me always in the future?"

There was a strange emphasis on the always. Would he show no mercy?

"Please, please let me go, Mr. Martin. I am ashamed, and very sorry. Forgive me, dear, dear Mr. Martin."

I spoke through gushing tears. My distress had risen to its climax, I was hardly aware what I said, but I was very earnest to escape.

"Tell me, first, Bessie, what you think of my proposal?"

"Don't—don't tease me any longer," I cried, imploringly. "You are not a generous victor. You have punished me enough."

He hesitated a moment, and then stepped back a pace or two. Like a caged bird, suddenly let loose, I sprang eagerly forward, but as I was flying past him, with a laugh and a rapid movement, he circled my waist with his arm, and—

Mrs. Putnam says I am the flightiest little minx, for a married woman, that she ever saw.

We had soup for dinner. It is the anniversary of our wedding. John says it is almost as nice as that we had in the arbor, for he insists upon it to this day that I helped him eat it. I didn't, though.

TO MARTIE.

BY H. L. ALLEN.

Come home to me!
 I've watched for thee,
 And my heart is weary with waiting long;
 The moonlight falls
 On our cottage walls,
 But I hear not, as erst, thy familiar song.

Have I watched in vain?
 Shall I never again
 Hear thy light, quick step on our cottage floor?
 Will thy soft, low voice
 Make our hearts rejoice,
 And thy presence cheer us, nevermore?

Will thy footsteps free
 Never stray with me,
 To gather bright flowers to wreath thy brow?
 Loop up thy hair,
 With its ringlets fair,
 For thou art a wife and a mother now.

Let thy baby rest
 As now on thy breast,
 Thou mayst look on her with a mother's pride;
 And thy fond eyes gaze
 On the loved one's face,
 Who now walks proudly by thy side.

He is good and true,
 O, joy to you!
 Though you have left us, our sister-band:
 We may never tell,
 For we loved thee well,
 How we miss at home thy busy hand.

Let the little bird,
 Who thy glad voice heard,
 And flew from heaven to cheer our home:
 Let her leave a place,
 For each loved one's face,
 In thy heart when the olden memories come.

Let no care-cloud now
 Hover over thy brow
 (For care makes wrinkles, so people say),
 But sunshine shed
 Around Joshua's head,
 For thy smiles will brighten the darkest day.

TRUTH WITH CHILDREN.

BY S. P. BRIGHAM.

LITTLE Willie Atkins had been suffering intensely with the toothache all day. His mother had done all in her power to alleviate the pain. She had put creosote, camphor and other applications on the tooth, poulticed and bathed his cheek, but all to no purpose.

"O, mother!" said Willie, "it does ache so. I cannot bear it," and he held his face in his hands, with such a low moan, and looked so imploringly into his mother's face for relief. "It aches so hard." He sat down on his little stool beside her, and laid his head in her lap. She soothed and pitied, but could not help him. She knew of but one way of relief, and that was to have the tooth extracted immediately. How could it be accomplished? was the thought that occupied her mind.

"Willie," said his mother, "I think we had better go down and let Doctor Loomis look at it; he may give you something that will cure it."

"I'm afraid he will pull it," said Willie.

Now the tooth had troubled him many times, but had never pained him so long and so severely before, and his mother knew that decayed as it was, the only permanent remedy lay in its extraction, yet she answered:

"O, no he wont, I know. I don't believe he will even think it necessary. It wont do any harm to have him look at it, you know, and he may do something to help it at once."

Still Willie demurred; he had a great horror of the doctor. Moreover, he had an instinctive feeling that something more was meant than the mere looking at his tooth. Just then a sharp pain shot through his face and he wavered no longer. He put on his cap and tippet, took his mother's hand, and went to the doctor's office.

"Doctor," whispered Mrs. Atkins, aside, "Willie is such a timid little fellow, can't you contrive to pull his tooth without his knowing it?"

"Trust me," said the doctor, "I know just how to manage such cases," and he nodded significantly to Mrs. Atkins.

Willie, as he heard the whispering, again doubted. He imagined his mother and the doctor somehow were leagued together against him, and he shut his mouth, compressed his little lips and resolutely prepared himself for resistance.

"And this is the little boy who has suffered so severely with the toothache," said the doctor, coaxingly, as he laid his hand on Willie's head. "That needn't be. I'll try and see what I can do to help it. Which tooth is it?"

Still Willie's mouth remained firmly shut as ever, and no promise of relief which the doctor could make, would induce him to open it.

"Willie has such beautiful teeth, doctor—such as you don't often see in a boy of his age," said his mother. "Why wont you show them to the doctor, Willie?"

"Has he?" said the doctor. "I should like to see them."

Willie, flattered by their words, opened his mouth and displayed two rows of little white teeth for the doctor's inspection. Yet feeling a little suspicious, he kept a guard on his lips.

"Upon my word," said the doctor, "those are fine teeth. I wonder if the back ones look as well as the front?"

Stimulated by praise, Willie quite forgot his suspicions, and opened his mouth widely.

"And this is the naughty tooth, is it?" he said, as Willie, reassured by the doctor's manner, pointed out the offending tooth. "I've something here in my handkerchief which I'll put on, and it will be cured forever."

Willie looked suspiciously at the handkerchief, and seeing what he supposed to be the doctor's finger, covered with one end of the handkerchief, all ready to make the promised application, offered no further objections and allowed the doctor to hold his head. In a second the tooth was out and in the doctor's hand, almost before he knew it! He had put on something that would prevent that tooth from ever aching again—something which would cure, when nothing else would. He had put on the instrument concealed in the treacherous handkerchief, and the tooth was out and before him!

But what was it that made Willie spring upon his feet, clench his little fists and grow red in the face, while he stamped his feet upon the floor? It was not pain. No, Willie was a courageous little fellow, and had he known it, he would have made up his mind to bear it like a man. Besides, there hadn't been much pain; it was a hard tooth to ache, but easy enough to pull. Children's first teeth always come easily. What was it, then, that made him seize his cap and rush madly into the street? He was not mad with pain but anger. He felt that gross injustice had been done him. His suspicions had been lulled by the soft words of the doctor, his vanity had been flattered by praises, and lured on by promises of immediate relief, he had pointed out, with his own finger, the aching tooth. He had been cheated, in fact fooled, and angry with himself, above all with others, he departed without ceremony. A little time sufficed to restore his equanimity, the pain was entirely gone, his toothache was cured forever, and on the whole, he was glad, though he never forgot the way it was done.

A few days after, Mrs. Atkins was sewing at the table in her parlor. Her husband was going away on the morrow, and it was necessary that the garment she was making should be finished as speedily as possible. She had scarcely raised her eyes the last half hour, so engrossed was she in her work, and had not noticed that Willie, who had been playing with his blocks and marbles at her feet all the afternoon, had disappeared from the room. Suddenly missing him, she looked up just in time to see him retracing his steps from the store-room, casting shy glances from right to left, to see if he had been discovered. Now in this store-room was a box of remarkably fine oranges, which Mrs. Atkins's brother had sent from New Orleans. They had rapidly disappeared of late, and seeing Willie's frightened and guilty looks, her suspicions naturally fell on him. She was right; he had been in the store-room and had eaten two large, fine oranges.

"Willie," said she, angrily, "you've been stealing my oranges. Aren't you ashamed?"

"Indeed I haven't, mother. I haven't seen an orange this week. I have been down in the garden playing with Juno."

"Now, Willie," said his mother, "you know you are telling a lie; you haven't been in the garden; you've been eating my oranges."

"Indeed, mother, I haven't."

"But I saw you. I looked in at the keyhole and saw you eating them."

Now this was proof positive. Willie, finding he had been seen, acknowledged his fault, and his mother punished him for the falsehood he told; while she had told two herself to make him confess one! She had not seen him eat the oranges, neither had she looked through the keyhole. She had not even arisen from her seat!

The next day they were all in the garden, and Willie, who had been watching his opportunity, thought it a capital chance to get another taste of the oranges. He quickly repaired to the store-room, but he had grown wiser from yesterday's experience, and was determined that the tell-tale keyhole should reveal no more secrets, so he shut the door and quickly filled it with paper on the inside. He commenced eating as composedly and with as keen a relish as if eating his dinner.

Is there no still voice to speak to him and tell him what a wicked act he is committing? Hasn't his mother ever taught him how wrong it is to lie and steal? Yes, she has told him often. Why is it, then, that her words have made no impression on the boy, and he acts deliberately and in direct violation of her instruction? Ah, her own example is wanting to seal them.

After he had finished his feast, he pulled the paper from the keyhole and ventured boldly forth, for this time he knew nobody had seen him. He had gone only as far as the hall, when, unfortunately, he met his mother, who just coming in from the garden.

"Willie," said she, sternly, "you've been again at my oranges."

"What makes you always accuse me of doing a thing, when you don't know whether I've done it or not?" asked Willie, when a new thought occurred to him.

"I don't," said his mother; "I do know."

"Did you see me?"

"Yes, I saw you."

"How? Did you look through the keyhole again to-day?"

"Yes," said his mother, "I looked through the keyhole and saw you."

"No, you didn't," said Willie, triumphantly; "you didn't, I stopped it up on the inside!" And he laughed loud and long, and capered about the room in perfect joy.

He had been upon the point of denying the charge, but seeing his mother was going to get caught in her own trap, he willingly confessed, for the sake of having the satisfaction of detecting her in a falsehood.

"Wasn't that capitally done?" thought he. "She couldn't come it over me that time, not she. I've got learned!"

What had he learned? He had learned not to trust his mother; he had learned that she would deceive him whenever it suited her purpose. She had lost a few oranges, it is true, but she had lost what was infinitely greater—her son's confidence in her word. Poor, weak, misguided woman! Are these the principles you instill into his young, susceptible mind? Is this the way you train that immortal soul God has given you to fit for heaven? If your son grows up undutiful and rebellious; if your hair turns white with anxiety and sorrow; if he meets with a miserable end, you cannot absolve yourself. God forbid there should be many such mothers!

But let us present the opposite picture, and see if a more truthful mode of managing children is not more efficacious.

Willie Atkins had not been gone from the doctor's office an hour, when Harry Gordon and his mother came in. He, too, had come to have a tooth extracted, not an aching one, but a strong, sound, well tooth, which was growing directly inside another, what the doctors call a "tusk." It was necessary that it should be immediately extracted, to allow the other to grow in its proper place. Harry's mother had explained all this to him before he came. She had shown him how his mouth would be disfigured if the tooth were allowed to grow; that although the pain would be considerable, yet it would not last long; and if he resolutely made up his mind he could bear it. Harry came fully prepared to stand the trying ordeal like a man.

Determined as he was to be courageous, his heart did flutter so it could almost be seen to beat under his jacket as he saw the doctor with the dreaded instrument in his hand. In a tremulous voice he asked the doctor: "Will it hurt much?"

"O, no, not in the least! I never hurt good little boys like you, do I, Mrs. Gordon?" he replied, appealing to that lady.

"I did not know teeth could ever be extracted without pain. Yes, Harry, I should think it must hurt you, perhaps a good deal; but I think you can bear pain, can't you?" said his mother.

The doctor looked surprised; it was n't the way he was in the habit of managing children. He had had many difficult cases, but had always practised deception of this kind. Harry shut his eyes, kept tightly hold of his mother's hand, and moved not or groaned, as the tooth, with a jerk which nearly took his head with it, came out of his mouth. It was a bad tooth to pull, and had two long prongs.

"Did I stand it well, mother?" said Harry.

"Nobly, bravely, my son!" And Mrs. Gordon kissed him tenderly, and stroked his curly hair with all a mother's fondness.

Harry stepped high and proudly as he walked home, and felt that he had undergone a difficult surgical operation. The pleasure he experienced far more than counterbalanced the pain he had suffered.

"Did it hurt you much?" said his father, as he listened to an account of the morning's transactions when he came home to dinner.

"Yes, it did a great deal; but mother told me it would before I went, and I made up my mind to bear it well."

"Harry," said his mother, in the evening, "was it my ball of red yarn you were playing with yesterday in the garden?"

"O, no, mother, it was a red leather ball Eddie Pratt lent me."

His mother believed him. Harry had never told her a lie, and why should he? his mother had never told or acted a falsehood to him.

Dear little Harry Gordon; you'll never go far astray with such a mother as you have to guide you! You dwell in the sunshine of love and truth. Mothers, if you wish to be honored and respected by your children, deal honestly with them by word and act.

THE EUTHANASIA OF NATURE.

Said a distinguished foreigner from continental Europe, when shown a sketch of our autumnal scenery, before he had seen it in nature, "This is a caricature;" but when he had witnessed it, "The drawing," said he, "does not come up to nature." "What a strange country must America be," once said the simple minded Nestorians of Persia, when looking at the same drawing, "what a strange country must America be, where the people live in wooden houses and the trees are painted."—Dr. Hitchcock.

A LOYAL HUNGARIAN LADY.

On the death of King Albert, of Hungary, a powerful party desired to offer the throne to the King of Poland, while Queen Elizabeth (the widow of King Albert) naturally wished to retain it for the son whose birth she confidently anticipated, and as one step towards this end she resolved to get possession of the mysterious "golden round," from which a consecrating influence was supposed to emanate. Helena Kottanner, a lady-in-waiting, and a kind of instructor to the young princess, her daughter, consented to assist her in this undertaking, though fully aware that she thereby incurred deadly peril. It would take too much space to recount the various difficulties that occurred, and the patience and courage by which they were surmounted, until the final moment when the three locked doors, by which the crown was guarded, had all been broken through, and Helena sat alone in the middle of the night listening, while her accomplice in the innocent theft fastened on the other locks prepared for the purpose, that the loss might not be immediately discovered. The sacred crown was then sewn up in a crimson velvet cushion, but it had still various adventures to pass through before it got to Komorn and was delivered to the queen. One of these was the narrowly escaping being sunk along with its guardians, and a party of noble ladies, in the Danube.

"When we got to the place where we were to dine," writes Helena, "my trusty companion took the cushion containing the crown, and carried it into the chamber and laid it on a table opposite me, so that it remained all the time under my eyes; and when we had dined he took it and laid it on the sledge as before, and we drove on till it was quite dark at night when we got to the Danube. This was still covered with ice, but the ice was thin in some places, and when we got to the middle of the river the carriage that held the young ladies broke in and upset, and they could not see one another, and raised a great screaming. I was very much frightened, too, for I thought nothing but that we and the sacred crown were going to the bottom of the river. But God was our helper, so that no one got under the ice, but some of the things that were in the carriage fell in and were lost. And I took the Duchess of Silesia, and the first of the young ladies, with me on the sledge, and so with God's help we got across, and so did the others."

The sacred crown arrived at Komorn almost in the same hour in which the head on which it was to be placed made its appearance in the world, but Helena's cares were not yet over. It is, or was, considered indispensable to a Hungarian sovereign, not only that he should wear this particular corona regni, but that he should be crowned by the Archbishop of Grau, and at Weissenburg; and as, three months after his birth, it was deemed fitting that the young Ladislaus should go through this ceremony, another perilous journey had to be undertaken, through a country mostly indisposed to the royal party. The crown, wrapped carefully in cloths, was placed in the straw at the bottom of the young king's cradle, "for his grace did not yet lie upon feeders, and we put by the side of it a long spoon, such as is used to make pap, so that if anybody put his hand into the cradle he would think there were only the things for making the noble king's pap."

The cradle was carried by four men in armor—Helena and the nurse riding by the side of it, but sometimes it rained, so that the "noble king" got wet, and Helena had to take off her own mantle to cover him; sometimes the dust blew into his grace's eyes so that he could not see, and sometimes his grace roared so lustily that Helena was obliged to dismount and take him out of his cradle and carry him on foot through the marshes. In this manner they made their entrance into Weissenburg, the knights having also alighted, and formed in a circle, with drawn swords, round the tiny monarch and the crown, which appears the most important personality of the two.

Here we must leave the faithful Helena, who, we are glad to find, had the honor of holding the "noble king" at his coronation at St. Stephen's altar, and, moreover, of receiving on her arm the blow of the sword given when his grace was dubbed a knight, and subsequently holding him up in a cloth of gold to the admiration of all beholders. His grace himself, as she naively remarks, "had little joy in his coronation, for he wept with a loud voice, so that he could be heard through the whole church;" but, at least, his subjects could loyally remark, "that they should have taken it for the voice of a child a year old."—Lady's Newspaper.

ANECDOTES OF DOGS.

A certain cattle dealer in Irvine is frequently in the habit, when visiting Ayr market on Tuesdays, of leaving his dog behind him. On these occasions, upon missing his master, the animal has been frequently known to take the next train to Ayr, visit the cattle market, and, not finding the object of his search, return again to Irvine. His conduct has often attracted the notice of the guards on the line, and his movements have been watched. But we have not heard by what class he is accustomed to travel, and at what rate he is charged.—A gentleman's dog having been convicted of sheep stealing, he told a man to shoot him the following morning. The dog was lying in the room at the time, and apparently listening to the conversation. Whether he understood it or not, I will not pretend to determine; but the very first time the door was open he bolted out, and never again came within reach of his old master.—Morris.

WINE IN SPAIN.

In the "Blue Book," just published, on wine-producing countries and the vine disease, we read that a "proprietor of vineyards on the Huesca, in Arragon, assured Mr. Lumley that the drought of the preceding summer was so great and the vintage so plentiful, that it would have been easier for him to irrigate his vineyards with wine than with water. Again, unable to find room for his new stock of wine, or to get rid of it at even one real per cantaro (about a half-cent per gallon), and there being a scarcity of earth, jars or vats, he was obliged to throw away the whole of that year's vintage. Many of the districts of Old Castile are equally prolific. Wine, in fact, is cheaper than water, and it is not unusual for bricklayers to mix their mortar with wine instead of water."—Traveller.

The Florist.

Without is neither gold nor green;
Within, for birds, the birch-logs sing;
Yet, summer-like, we sit beneath
The autumn and the spring.—J. G. WHITTIER.

Moisture in Plant-Houses.

It is a great mistake, which even gardeners make, in keeping their greenhouses far too dry in the winter. A little reflection will easily show this. From the time the plants are housed till the time they go out, there is almost always a very great difference in the outside and inside temperature. So long as this is the case, the glass being much colder than the inside, condensation is perpetually going on; besides the heated air and moisture are constantly passing out through every nook and cranny, taking away an immense volume of moisture. Whenever your fires are strong, or a great difference exists between the external and internal temperature, see that there is no lack of moisture. If the house is low and small, by well damping the floor all over whenever dry, no harm will come; but if the houses are large and lofty, then evaporating pans should be placed on the flues and pipes, in addition to wetting the floor. One great benefit of shutters to houses consists in their preventing excessive condensation taking place during cold clear nights.

A Hint to Lovers of Flowers.

A most beautiful and easily-attained show of evergreens may be had by a very simple plan, which has been found to answer remarkably well on a small scale. If geranium branches, taken from luxuriant and healthy trees just before the winter sets in, be cut as for slips and immersed in soap-water, they will, after drooping for a few days, shed their leaves, put forth fresh ones, and continue in the finest vigor all the winter. By placing a number of bottles thus filled in a flower-basket, with moss to conceal the bottles, a show of evergreens is easily ensured for the whole season. They require no fresh water.

Begonia Incarnata.

This is another plant which should be mentioned here, it now being the season when calls are constantly made for bouquets and cut flowers. The begonia produces through the winter months a profusion of flowers, the color of which is good by artificial light. Its real color, as its name implies, is a beautiful flesh, inclining to pink; while it is sometimes found nearly white. It is very easily struck from cuttings at any season of the year, but is best done in February or March. When struck, pot off into small pots, and stop any growth likely to take the lead.

Petunia Imperialis.

This novelty first became known here in 1854, being sent from the Royal Nursery, Slough, England. It has now become a great favorite, though not at all common. It is as double as a fine carnation; and as it is disposed to bloom abundantly, with a short, stout, vigorous habit, it will become a great favorite for "pot culture." The specimen we saw was white, very double and sweet-scented. Its fragrance partakes something of the ten-week stock. They are very suitable for parlor plants, and if properly treated, will bloom abundantly all winter.

Sinieruba.

The false quassa. Stove plants with showy flowers, natives of the West Indies, nearly allied to quassa.

The Polyanthus.

As a greenhouse plant, to arrange and give variety with Chinese primulas, pansies, daisies, etc., the beautiful polyanthus is well adapted. There are several double kinds, with white, yellow, copper, salmon, lilac, purple and variegated flowers, all of which would do well, besides many single kinds with exquisite markings. This plant, it is well known, forms one of the number of plants usually termed by Europeans, "Florists' Flowers," all of which are single, and somewhat too tender for general cultivation. The only difficulty lies in summer, and which nearly vanishes, if the old roots are parted in the spring. For soil, use good turfy loam, slightly sandy; if destitute of vegetable matter, add a little well rotted leaf mould or rotten manure. In this the plant will grow to perfection, and afford an abundance of flowers.

Common flowering Plants.

There is nothing too common, or betokening stinginess, want of taste or poverty, in having the oldest and simplest plant well grown and bloomed in a pot; everybody loves to see them. Look in almost any extensive greenhouse, and you will see a fair proportion of the plants are those common to almost any garden. Not one of them but the poorest man in the next village might have at his window, and yet everybody admires them. Fashion, as in all other things, devotes most care to costly plants; but will anybody say that a window filled with verbenas, violets, mignonettes, convolvuli and asters does not look as bright and pleasant as one in which we see Japan lilies, Cape jasmines, isopogon, hibbertia, and other rare and expensive flowers?

Roses.

We will give here the names of a few roses, which have been thoroughly tested:—Chipetowalkoff, a large deep crimson blossom; Jules Margottin, one of the hardiest roses under cultivation, bearing a bright crimson flower; Rosini Margottini, a very fragrant blossom, deep carmine, which opens best in showery weather; Madame Rigeaux, dark pink tinged with white, a moderate grower, but should find a place in every garden or greenhouse; Lord Raglan, this is one of the darkest crimson roses known, as in some parts it approaches a black—it is a hardy and vigorous grower.

Ximineaia.

Annual and perennial flowers, natives of Mexico, with brilliant yellow flowers, which will grow in any common garden soil. They are coarse growing but very showy. There are two biennial species, which should be kept in a frame during winter, and transplanted to the open border in the spring.

Volcanaria.

Nearly all the plants formerly included in this genus have been removed to clatodendrum, and it now contains only two species—one stove-shrub, with white flower from the West Indies, and the other a half-hardy tree, with beautiful purple flowers, from Nepal.

Eucalyptus.

Australian trees of enormous size, some species of which are grown in England as greenhouse shrubs. They should be grown in loam and peat, and are propagated by cuttings which are very difficult to strike.

Symphoricarpos.

Mitcham's name for the common snowberry—a name very slightly known and rarely used.

Curious Matters.

Singular Suffering.

Theodore Rougeot recently died in Bangor, Maine, after a life of singular suffering. When thirteen years of age he was taken with inflammatory rheumatism, and was almost helpless for two years; he then recovered, but in two years thereafter was attacked again, and continued entirely helpless and confined to his bed for eighteen years! There was but one joint (that of one thumb) that he could move. He was obliged to be bolstered up in bed in one position, partly in a sitting posture, for the eighteen years; he could talk and read well, but could not otherwise stir or move; his food was made very fine, and sucked up or mumbled over in his mouth, as his jaws were immovable; he was nothing but skin and bone, yet his appetite and general health were good. His mind was clear, his memory good, and he was a person of considerable intelligence and quite a reader. He lived with his parents a couple of miles from Bangor, and was kindly cared for by a patient and attentive mother and other relatives during his long and tedious illness.

Wonderful.

The Charleston Courier publishes an account of a remarkable African boy, living in Savannah, blind, and in feature resembling an idiot. His only wonderful gift is the power of musical composition and execution, and this is entirely natural. He plays upon the piano forte, and has only to hear a piece once to re-produce it, not only accurately, but with the same shades of expression which the performer gave to it. His touch is said to be wonderfully delicate, while at the same time it has great force. That the boy's talent is not alone a development of the faculty of memory and the power of imitation, is shown by his improvisations, which the paper alluded to commends as of exceeding beauty. The countenance of the child when he is not under the influence of music is said to be almost repulsive, vacant and ugly. But the moment his fingers call the sound from his instrument, his face lights up with inspiration, and becomes absolutely beautiful.

Kitten reared by a Ferret.

A laborer some years since having a female ferret, with four young ones about a week old, and requiring food for them, robbed a cat of a kitten of about the same age, and threw it into the hutch, expecting it to be immediately killed. To his surprise, as soon as it began to cry the ferret placed it with its young, suckled it, and it thrived, and became a fine cat. After it grew up it was always partial to the ferrets, and they were often seen at play together. Another laborer informed us that he had a cat which, being deprived of its kittens, suckled a young rabbit that he had brought it about a fortnight old, and that the rabbit and its foster mother gambolled together, to the great amusement of his children and others.

The Robin.

In one of Mary Russell Mitford's fairylike notes, written within three weeks of her death, she says:—"I am sometimes wheeled from my bedside to the window; and about a month ago a redbreast came to that window and tapped. Of course we answered the appeal by fixing a little tray outside the window-sill, and keeping it well supplied with bread and crumbs; and now he not only comes himself, but has introduced his kinsfolk and friends. Think how great a pleasure!"

Fickleness of Fortune.

The Albany Standard relates the following instance of vicissitude of fortune:—"A few years ago one of the most active and successful business men in the city of Hudson was Leonard Wells. Everything he touched turned into money. He once made $10,000 in an hour by a purchase and sale of a piece of real estate. Fifteen years ago Mr. Wells was worth $70,000. Shortly after luck turned against him. He lost $81,000 by buying stock in the Hudson and Berkshire Railroad. This was followed by other losses caused by endorsements. In less than eighteen months Mr. Wells passed from affluence to extreme poverty—from being worth $70,000, to being worth not one cent. Mr. Wells is now a resident of Albany, and earns a living for himself and family by peddling candies, apples and doughnuts. We are happy to say that he bears the decrees of fate with becoming philosophy. He is as cheerful to-day as he was when he was known as a 'man of fortune.' He earns an honest living, and is determined to enjoy it."

Curious Casualty.

A singular and truly afflicting casualty occurred in Oimstead, Cuyahoga county, New York, lately. A bright little lad of three or four years of age, son of Mr. Briggs, wishing to see the men dress hogs, his mother put on his cloak, and the father placed him in the branches of an apple tree, where he could look on and be out of the way. The child was perched near by his father, and directly over where persons frequently passed to bring hot water, etc. Nothing unusual was observed, but when, after some time, the father lifted down his little son, to his horror he found him dead! The cloak had caught on a limb and strangled the child.

Effects of Chicory upon the Eyes.

It has been observed in Vienna, that those employed in chicory-grinding are much troubled with affections of the eyes; and J. W. Slater, in a lecture delivered at the Mechanics' Institution, Sheffield, England, has stated that a young man of that town, by trade a coffee-roaster, was in the habit of reading for two hours at night, after concluding his work. Whenever he has been roasting chicory he finds himself unable to read—not from an outward irritation of the eye, but, as he phrases it, from a feeling of "deadness" in that organ. All this serves to prove that chicory has a specifically injurious effect upon the optic nerve.

A malicious Will.

A very odd case of petty malice in will-making was that of a man who, not having a penny in the world, left a will, in which he bequeathed to his friends and acquaintances large estates in various parts of England, money in the funds, rings, jewels and plate. His inducement was the prospect of the delight of his friends at first learning about the rich possessions which were to be theirs, and then the bitter disappointment at finding how they had been hoaxed.

Geological Fact.

An artesian well in Savannah was bored to the depth of 980 feet, a year since, when an obstruction was met it was impossible to penetrate or remove by pressure. Several hundred tons weight were placed on the tubing, and there they rested for nearly a year without any effect. On the day before the shock of earthquake felt in South Carolina and Georgia Dec. 20, however, the weights triumphed, and the tubing sunk thirty feet below the ground.

Curious Discovery.

The Bulletin de l'Institut Egyptian states that Mr. Mariette lately found near a mummy discovered at Thebes various curious articles, amongst which were these:—Ten gold bracelets for the legs, two other bracelets formed of pearls put on gold threads, another of gold, well executed, bearing mythological symbols; a gold diadem ornamented with mosaics and surmounted by two sphynxes, a mirror with gold ornaments, a figure of a king standing in a boat with two divinities pouring water on his head and two birds flying above him; a figure of a boat in gold, containing ten silver figures of sailors rowing and one of a person singing at the prow; a poniard with a gold scabbard, the blade being the finest specimen of Egyptian workmanship yet discovered, and containing encrusted in it a piece of bronze, on which are various ornaments and hieroglyphs; and a hatchet, the blade of which is in gold, and the handle ornamented with gold.

A French Belle a Hundred Years ago.

Madame de Genlis, in her Memoirs, describes the training she underwent to fit her for Parisian society in the last century:—"I had two teeth pulled out; I had whale-bone stays that pinched me terribly; my feet were imprisoned in tight shoes, with which it was impossible for me to walk; I had three or four thousand curl-papers put on my head, and I wore, for the first time in my life, a hoop. In order to get rid of my country attitudes, I had an iron collar put on my neck; and, as I aquiluted a little at times, I was obliged to put on goggles as soon as I awoke in the morning, and these I wore for hours. I was, moreover, not a little surprised when they talked of giving me a master to teach me what I thought I knew well enough already—to walk. Besides all this, I was forbidden to run, to leap, or to ask questions."

Romantic Marriage.

A marriage, which has been brought about in a very romantic manner, was celebrated at St. John's Episcopal Chapel, Greenock, Scotland, lately. Mr. Thomas Pendred, of Dublin, a member of the orchestra of the Theatre Royal, was on board the royal mail steamer-Perzia last summer on a voyage from New York, when a lady passenger, Miss Marie Kohl, of Berne, Switzerland, fell overboard, the ship then being under full steam. Mr. Pendred leaped after her, and was the means of saving her life, and this gallant action led to the happy event which has taken place.

Lightning and Fish.

Throughout the West Indies, on mornings after a display of sheet-lightning, immense quantities of needle-shaped fish are found congregated at the mouths of rivers. The first day after the lightning they are caught and sold in the markets, and are then a delicate food. The second day they are still found, but more developed, having become larger, coarser, and having black heads. They are then but little eaten. The fact is undeniable that these creatures appear after sheet-lightning, and at no other times.

Strange Custom.

A peculiar custom prevails at Norham, Durham, that if the banns of marriage be thrice published, and the marriage does not take place, the refusing party, whether male or female, pays forty shillings to the vicar, as a penalty for "scorning the Church."

Sagacity of the Bear.

That wild beasts of all kinds are scared away by fire is a well known fact; but the hungry bear is of so cunning a nature, that it even sets at defiance the flaming circle, which would at other times afford a secure protection to the sleeping traveller. It is true that the bear does not venture to cross the fiery barrier, but it contrives to avoid the difficulty in a most ingenious manner. Going to the nearest stream, it immerses itself in the water so as to saturate its fur with moisture, and then returning to the spot where the intended prey lies asleep, the animal rolls over the flaming embers, quenches the fire, and then makes its attack upon the sleeper. This curious fact is well known among the natives of Siberia, so that they have good grounds for the respect in which they hold the bear's intellectual powers.

The Bird of the Tolling Bell.

Among the highest woods and deepest glens of Brazil a sound is sometimes heard, so singular that the noise seems quite unnatural; it is like the distant and solemn tolling of a church-bell struck at intervals. This extraordinary noise proceeds from the arawonda. The bird sits at the top of the highest trees in the deepest forests, and though constantly heard in the most desert places, it is very rarely seen. It is impossible to conceive anything of more solitary character than the profound silence of the woods, broken only by the metallic and almost supernatural sound of this invisible bird, coming from the air, and seeming to follow wherever you go. The arawonda is white, with a circle of red round its eyes; its size is about that of a small pigeon.

Somnambulism.

The majority of mankind are inclined to believe that a sleep-walker is guided by a providential instinct, which leads him safely across parapets, along the edges of precipices, and through fordable streams, landing him unhurt on the safe side. Many surprising feats of this kind have, indeed, been accomplished, but they must be regarded as exceptional. Recently, an American editor of high repute took a fatal leap from a precipice whilst in a state of somnambulism; and a young man in London, whilst sleep-walking, raised the window of his room, and leaped into the street, fatally fracturing his skull. Those who behold a sleep-walker should not refrain, either from motives of tenderness or curiosity, from waking the sleeper. It is wrong to do so abruptly; but the unfortunate person should be carefully and gently roused.

A Dog with a wooden Leg.

Mr. Robert Howard, landlord of the Railway Inn, near the Droyloden Railway station, England, has in his possession a Scotch terrier with a wooden leg, which runs about with a scarcely perceptible limp. The dog had its right fore foot amputated by an express train several months ago, and a veterinary surgeon from Manchester being informed that it was a favourite pet, not only dressed its wounds, but shortly afterwards supplied it with an artificial limb, of which it appears somewhat proud.

Remarkable.

Miss Phoebe Newbegin, who died in Nantucket, lately, at the advanced age of 93 years 8 months, leaves a sister nearly 90 years of age, with whom she has slept every night for eighty-eight years, with the exception of three weeks during childhood, when Mary, the surviving sister, went to Newburyport with her mother. The deceased never left the island.

The Housewife.

Clinkers in Stoves.

Persons troubled with clinkers adhering to the lining of their stoves or furnaces, may be interested in knowing, says the Scientific American, that by placing a few oyster shells in the grate, while the fire is ignited, the clinkers will soon become loosened so as to be readily removed without the danger of breaking the lining. We have tried this remedy; and while the chemical action is involved in mystery, it accomplished the result to our satisfaction.

Vermicelli Pudding.

Soak four ounces of vermicelli in cold water for one hour; pour the water off, put on the fire with a quart of sweet milk, shake it till it boils, draw it aside until the milk is all soaked in. Beat up four eggs with two ounces of sugar; mince two ounces of lemon-peel. Mix all together, and bake in a pudding-dish. If boiled, it will require six eggs instead of four. Put in a buttered shape, and boil two hours.

Gingerade.

Take Jamaica ginger-root, two and a half ounces; boiling water, one pint; lump sugar, two and a half pounds; citric acid, two drachms; bruise the ginger-root, infuse it four hours in the water, and to the strained liquor add the sugar, and dissolve it with the aid of heat; remove the scum, and lastly add the citric acid.

A plain Oustard.

Boil a pint of new milk, keeping a little back to mix with a tablespoonful of flour. Thicken the milk with the flour, let it cool a little, and then add one egg well beaten. Sweeten to taste. Set it on the fire again and stir until the egg burns, but do not let it boil. A little lemon or almond may be added.

How to preserve Ladies' Furs.

Fine furs should be kept in a cold place. An experienced dealer will tell, the moment he puts his hand on a piece of fur, if it has been lying in a warm, dry atmosphere; it renders the fur harsh, dry and shabby; entirely destroying the rich, smooth softness which it will have if kept in a cold room.

Mel Broth.

Clean half a pound of small eels, and set them on with three pints of water, some parsley, one slice of onion, a few peppercorns; let them simmer till the eels are broken, and the broth good, or reduced to a pint and a half. Add salt, and strain it off. It is very nutritious.

Beef Tea.

Out one pound of fleshy beef in thin slices; simmer with a quart of water an hour and a half after it has once boiled and been skimmed. Season, if approved; but it wants generally only a little salt.

Essence of Ginger.

Bruise four ounces of Jamaica ginger, and put it into a pint of rectified spirits of wine. Let it remain a fortnight, then press and filter it. A little essence of sage may be added, if wished.

Eggs.

An egg broken into a cup of tea, or beaten and mixed with a basin of milk, makes a breakfast more supporting than tea alone.

To keep Beds well aired.

Nothing more is necessary than to fill a large stone bottle with boiling water, and to put it into the bed, which, with the bolster and pillows, should be pressed round it in a head. It is astonishing the number of hours it will be found warm. By this simple contrivance no one need fear giving a friend a damp bed, even if it is only done once a fortnight. Care must be taken to have the bottle well corked, and, to prevent accidents, it would be as well to tie it down.

Arrowroot.

It is very necessary to be careful not to get the counterfeited sort; if genuine, it is very nourishing, especially for persons with weak bowels. Put into a saucepan half a pint of water, a glass of sherry, or a spoonful of brandy, grated nutmeg, and fine sugar; boil up once, then mix it by degrees into a dessert spoonful of arrowroot, previously rubbed smooth with two spoonful of cold water.

Hair Wash.

Get one ounce of borax, half an ounce of camphor, powder them finely, and dissolve them in one quart of boiling water. When cold the solution will be ready for use. Damp the hair with this frequently. It not only cleanses and beautifies, but strengthens the hair, preserves the color, and prevents early baldness.

Bread Cheesecakes.

Slice a small loaf as thin as possible; pour on it a pint of boiling cream; when well soaked beat it very fine; add eight eggs, half a pound of butter, a grated nutmeg, half a pound of currants, a spoonful of brandy or white wine; beat them up well together, and bake in raised crusts or patty-pans.

To clean Alabaster.

For cleaning alabaster, there is nothing better than soap and water. Stains may be removed by washing with soap and water, then whitewashing the stained part, letting it stand some hours, then rinsing off the whitewash and rubbing the part stained.

Bread Omelet.

Put in a large teaspoon of bread crumbs, a teaspoon of cream, a spoonful of butter, with salt, pepper and nutmeg; when the bread has absorbed the cream, break in the eggs, beat them a little with the mixture, and fry like omelet.

Rhubarb Jam.

To seven pounds of rhubarb add four sweet oranges and five pounds of sugar. Peel and cut up the rhubarb. Put in the thin peel of the oranges and the pulp, after taking out the seeds and all the whites. Boil all together for one hour and a half.

Bluing for Clothes.

Take one ounce of soft Prussian blue, powder it, and put it into a bottle with one quart of clear rain water, and a quarter of an ounce of oxalic acid powdered. A teaspoonful is sufficient for a large washing.

To clean Gold Lace.

Gold lace is easily cleaned and restored to its original brightness by rubbing it with a soft brush dipped in roche alum burnt, sifted to a very fine powder.

Seed Cake.

Beat one pound of butter to a cream, adding gradually a quarter of a pound of sifted sugar, beating both together; have ready the yolks of eighteen eggs, and the whites of ten, beaten separately; mix in the whites first, and then the yolks, and beat the whole for ten minutes; add two grated nutmegs, one pound and a half of flour, and mix them very gradually with the other ingredients; when the oven is ready, beat in three ounces of picked caraway-seeds.

Ginger Cordial.

This is made with the essence of ginger. It is preferred colored, and therefore may be well prepared by simple digestion. One drachm will be found to be enough for two gallons of spirit. The addition of two or three drops each of essence of lemon and orange-peel, with a spoonful of essence of cardamoms to each gallon, will improve it. If wanted dark, it may be colored with burnt sugar. The quantity of sugar is one a half pounds to the gallon.

For a Cough.

Procure a small quantity of Peruvian bark at a chemist's where you have reason to believe a genuine article may be obtained, and, on the very first symptoms of irritation of the throat, and disposition towards what is termed "hacking," chew a piece about the size of a bean. This will at once relieve; and, on recurrence of the symptoms, apply the same remedy. Two or three doses will cure.

Queen Cake.

Mix one pound of dried flour, the same of sifted sugar and washed currants; wash one pound of butter in rose-water, beat it well, then mix with it eight eggs, yolks and whites beaten separately, and put in the dry ingredients by degrees; beat the whole an hour; butter little tins, tinscaps, or saucers, filling them only half full; sift a little fine sugar just as you put them into the oven.

Cranberry Pudding.

Boil one pint and a half of cranberries cleared of the stalks in four ounces of sugar and water, until they are broken, and form a kind of jam; make up a large ball of it; cover it well with rice washed clean and dry; then round each side a floured piece of cloth, which tie as for dumplings. Boil them one hour; sift sugar over when served, and butter in a boat.

Peppermint Cordial.

Take thirteen gallons of rectified spirit, one in five under hydrometer proof, twelve pounds of loaf sugar, one pint of spirit of wine that will fire gunpowder, fifteen pennyweights of oil of peppermint, and as much water as will fill up the cask, which should be set on end after the whole has been well roused. Enough for twenty gallons.

A rich Christmas Pudding.

One pound of raisins stoned, one pound of currants, half a pound of beef-suet, quarter of a pound of sugar, two spoonfuls of flour, three eggs, a cup of sweetmeats, and a wineglass of brandy. Mix well, and boil in a mould eight hours.

Parisian Mode of roasting Apples.

Select the largest apples, scoop out the core without cutting quite through; fill the hollow with butter and fine soft sugar; let them roast in a slow oven, and serve up with the syrup.

Ginger Pudding.

To half a pound of flour add a quarter of a pound of suet shred very fine, a quarter of a pound of moist sugar, and two large teaspoonfuls of grated ginger; mix together, turn dry into a basin either buttered or dipped into cold water; tie the cloth over very tight, and boil three hours. This is a pudding within everybody's reach.

German Puffs.

A quarter of a pound of almonds beaten very fine in a mortar with rose-water, six eggs well beaten, leaving out two of the whites, two spoonfuls of flour, two ounces of butter, a little nutmeg, and six ounces of sugar all well mixed with a pint of cream, baked in buttered patty-pans, served with wine sauce.

Antidote against Poison.

Hundreds of lives might have been saved by a knowledge of this simple receipt:—A large teaspoonful of made mustard mixed in a tumbler of warm water, and swallowed as soon as possible. It acts as an instant emetic, sufficiently powerful to remove all that is lodged in the stomach.

To make Isinglass Size.

This may also be prepared in the manner above directed for the glue, by increasing the proportion of the water for dissolving it, and the same holds good of parchment size. A better sort of the common size may be likewise made by treating cuttings of gloves' leather in the same manner.

Worth Knowing.

Boil three or four onions in a pint of water. Then with a gliding brush do over your glasses and frames, and rest assured that the flies will not light on the articles washed. This may be used without apprehension, as it will not do the least injury to the frames.

Raspberry Vinegar.

To every quart of raspberries put one pint of best vinegar. Stir them twice a day for three days, then strain off the liquor. To each pint put one pound of loaf sugar. Boil it half an hour, and skim it well; then bottle and cork it close.

To season new Earthenware.

Before using, place it in a boiler with cold water, and then heat it gradually, and let it remain in till the water is cool. This will render it less liable to crack, especially if used for baking in.

Lotion for a Sprain.

Take of camphorated spirit, common vinegar, spirits of turpentine, of each one ounce. Or else take compound soap liniment, one ounce and a half; laudanum, half an ounce; mix.

Ising for a Plum Cake.

Take the white of an egg, a quarter of a pound of loaf-sugar, and a teaspoonful of gum dragon, melted. Mix them into a paste, and lay it on the cake.

Red Ink from woollen Table-Covers.

Dissolve in three ounces of hot water one drachm of oxalic acid; apply it warm to the ink spots, and they will quickly disappear.

Bleeding at the Nose.

WRESTLING WITH AN ELEPHANT.

A rather curious scene has occurred in Blackburn, England, during a performance in a menagerie. A young man, who had for some time been carefully observing the monster elephant, determined, like a fighting gladiator of old to try the strength of the huge bulk of flesh with his own. There is at the end of the elephant's tusks, which are of large size, an iron rod, binding one tusk to the other. Our hero seized hold of this, and began to lean with his whole weight upon it. The elephant, not altogether liking this sort of treatment, determined for his part to punish his audacious antagonist. He raised his great head aloft, and the young fellow was swang from the ground until he almost touched the canvass covering, and was no doubt much higher than his most wild ambition ever carried him. The animal repeated this, and a second time he descended to the ground, when the elephant, perhaps, thinking it best to temper justice with mercy, wrapped his trunk round the hapless and now thoroughly humbled youth, and very unceremoniously laid him in the mud that overspread the floor. The wrestle was ended, the elephant coming off the victor, while his combatant picked himself up and, amidst the hearty laughter of the spectators, vanished. Of course the Englishman was worsted; but our Dr. Windship would have slung that critter into the middle of next week.

"THE WELCOME GUEST."—The largest and best literary weekly paper in America is The Welcome Guest. Four cents per copy, everywhere. This paper is particularly calculated for the family, and will grace any parlor in the land, and gladden any fireside with its delightful tales, sketches, adventures, poems, and selections from all the new books of the day. It is not a sensation paper, yet you will be loth to lay it down until you have read every line!

PATENTED.—A Yankee's invention for extracting the lies from quack advertisements has been patented.

THEY OUGHT.—The assayers at the mint ought to be good boatmen, owing to their experience in handling the ores.

RIDING WITH A LADY.

The author of "Habits of Good Society" says that when you are riding on horseback in company with a lady you ought always to ride on the right of her, "lest you risk crushing her feet." An American writer says this settles a long-vexed question. But he is mistaken. In England, it is the custom to turn out to the left of the road in passing vehicles; here, to the right. If, in this country, you are on the right side of the lady, she runs the risk of being splattered, or having her skirt caught in the wheels. But if you ride on her left you protect her in these cases, and, moreover, have your right, or strongest hand at liberty to assist her in case of any difficulty with her horse. As to the danger of your crowding her feet, if you are not horseman enough to keep your proper distance, you should never undertake to ride with a lady. We consider that we have settled the question.

SPRING WEATHER.—With the coming spring weather, hundreds of delicate persons in New England will contract the seeds of consumption, a fact that is annually impressed upon all observing people. Is it not a duty to be on our guard against this terrible enemy? On the first symptoms of cough or cold, let that specific, Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry, be at once resorted to, and relief will as promptly follow. No family in our peculiar climate should be without the Balsam always at hand in their houses.

VERY PLEASANT.—It must be very pleasant for a young gentleman soft enough to ask a young lady what she thinks of his moustache, to have her reply, "O, it's nice! Just like the down on the wings of a butterfly!"

PRODIGIOUS.—A Cincinnati editor says that he has many a time seen a man on skates jump twenty-four feet. Lucky he didn't say yards, for then we might not have believed him!

JUST SO.—It is very well for little children to be lambs, but a very bad thing for them to grow up sheep.

COPPER MINE.—A new copper mine has been discovered in Bristol, Connecticut.

PROPAGATION OF OYSTERS.

For the last two years, the emperor, Louis Napoleon, has been causing artificial oyster beds to be made in the Bay of Saint Brieuc, and already the results have surpassed the dreams of the most ambitious hope. The parent oysters, the old shells with which the bottom of the bay is paved, everything, in short, which the drag brings up, is laden with young oyster-fry—the shingle of the beach itself is covered with it. The fascines bear, on every branch and on their smallest twigs, bunches of oysters in such extreme profusion that they resemble the apple and pear tree in an orchard, whose boughs are hidden, in spring, beneath the exuberance of their blossoms. You might take them to be petrifications of some exuberant fossil seeds or buds. As such a marvel obtains easier credence by sight than by hearsay, specimens have been sent to Paris to bear irrefutable testimony to the fact. The young oysters hanging to the twigs are already from three-quarters of an inch to an inch and a quarter in breadth. They are therefore fruits which have only to ripen to give in eighteen months a most abundant return. It appears from this that oysters grow much quicker than is imagined. There are as many as twenty thousand oyster-lings on a single facine, which takes up no more room in the water than a sheaf of wheat does in a cornfield. Now, twenty thousand oysters, when they have reached the edible state, represents the value of four hundred francs, their price current being twenty francs the thousand, sold on the spot. The returns from this industry are consequently inexhaustible, because collecting apparatus can be submerged to any extent, and every adult oyster belonging to a bed is the parent of from one to three millions of fry. Speaking of oysters, Louis Napoleon is very fond of them. He likes them on the shell with a drop of vinegar and salt, a little cayenne pepper, and a squeeze of lemon. The Empress Eugenie prefers them stewed. We like them both ways.

A MISTAKE.—It is common to speak of those whom a flirt has jilted as her victims, this is a grave error; her real victim is the man she accepts.

LIBERAL.—The St. Louis Agricultural and Mechanical Society have resolved to offer a premium list of $20,000 for their next fair.

GOOD PAY.—Tom Taylor received $250 an act for his last dramatization.

A TRUTH.—Pride is as loud a beggar as Want, but is much more insolent.

AGRICULTURE AT YALE COLLEGE.

To see Yale College stepping out from among the mists of antiquity and the graves of dead languages, and "taking up the shovel and the hoe," is certainly one of the signs of the times. She made her debut on this new stage on the 1st day of February, having secured the services of twenty-five leading agriculturists to sustain her in this first effort. These gentlemen are to take up all possible subjects connected with agriculture for the benefit of farmers and gardeners, young and old, and for their own material enlightenment. There are to be three lectures a day for the space of a month, each lecture to be followed by questions and a discussion. The list of names, in which we find Marshall P. Wilder, late President of the National Agricultural Society, Cassius M. Clay, of Kentucky, Lewis F. Allen, Esq., of New York, and other eminent men, besides Professors Silliman, Porter and Johnson, of Yale College, give the highest character to the undertaking. The advantages of this course are offered so cheaply ($10 for a course ticket), that it will draw together large numbers. The idea involved in this enterprise, namely, getting together educational capital by small contributions of knowledge from large numbers, is an important discovery. We do not see why it is not susceptible of very extensive and varied application.

THE PRINCE OF WALES.—Late English papers say the Prince of Wales will sail for Canada at the latter end of May or early in June, in the line-of-battle ship Renown, 91 guns. The suite that will attend his royal highness has not yet been arranged, but everything connected with this visit, it is stated, will be conducted on a scale worthy of the mother country, and calculated to do honor to the American colonies.

NEWSPAPER NOVELTY.—It is mentioned, as the latest novelty in newspapers, that in addition to "births, marriages and deaths," some of the English country papers now add the "divorces."

VIRGINIA IRON.—The iron manufactured at Wheeling, Va., in 1859, sold for upwards of two millions of dollars. Old Virginia is fast becoming a rival with Pennsylvania in producing iron.

REMOVAL.—We have removed our publishing office up one flight of stairs in the same building, No. 22 Winter Street.

NEW WORD.—A new word has been coined for the lady amateurs of skating—they are called skateresses.

THE OLD AND THE NEW.

Nothing more forcibly strikes the American traveller in Europe, when he goes abroad for the first time, and traverses the streets of the continental cities, than the time-worn character of nearly all the buildings, public and private, that meet his eye. In the old Dutch, in the old Italian, in the old German, Spanish and French towns and cities, he beholds everywhere the traces of venerable age: moss-grown roofs, crumbling house-fronts, with the date of some former century on their gables—"stones themselves to ruin grown." Hardly is there an exception to this. Paris alone, of all the great continental cities, exhibits what we Americans call go-ahead-iteness. And he learns, on inquiry, that this peculiar steadfastness permeates all society. He will find the same family exercising the same trade for generation after generation, just as the same family occupies a throne for centuries. Even in England he will find certain official costumes, absurd enough at the time of their introduction, surviving all the changes of fashion, the most unstable of human things—chancellors and judges invested with big wigs, and beef-eaters wearing the puffed trunk-hose, and carrying the halberds of the days of bluff King Harry of wife-killing memory. You may revisit the old places of which we speak after an absence of years, and you will find nothing changed.

But in this country an entirely different state of things is noticeable. There conservatism; here, change. There the struggle is to maintain the old; here the constant strife is to introduce the new. With us, there seems to be an almost morbid craving for novelty—in architecture, in dress, in literature, in domestic economy, in everything. How few relics of the revolutionary past, the heroic days of our history, remain! Scarcely, in each of our great cities, are there two or three of those buildings left which were silent witnesses of the struggles of our strife for independence; and of these but very few that the public generally do not regard as eyesores. Are there any lines of circumvallation or of breastwork left in some rural locality, the rude defences thrown up by our yeoman ancestry when they "bared their foreheads to the God of battles," the ploughshare must fill up or level them, not because they are annoyances, but because they are old. This fever for novelty has torn down many a substantial old house of worship that might have stood for a century longer, to give room for some new edifice divested of all the hallowed and hallowing associations that clung round the old. Old trees are hated because they are old. Even old men are only permitted to live on sufferance. They are not treated with the respect formerly accorded to age on account of its wisdom, and its experience of suffering and joy. Old America feels this keenly, and disguises its age as far and as long as possible. We have seen octogenarians in tight French boots and dyed moustaches, and it is very common for old men of seventy to cultivate gymnastics and learn the Schottische and German. The revival of the Minuet de la Cour, with its slow and stately movements, must be a blessing to these old covies, for gout and rheumatism are sad drawbacks in the whirlings of the waltz and the vigorous stampings of the polka, danced as it ought to be. We may smile at these endeavors of superannuated beaux to keep pace with the rapid boiling current of juvenility, but it is unjust to do so, for they are only obeying the law of inexorable necessity. Longevity in the eyes of Young America is unjustifiable. It is true that there is no statute against it, but the canons of society condemn it mercilessly.

The disciples of the new school, it is true, meet the old fogies with pitiless logic. They assert that all the great achievements of the world have been accomplished by young men, and prate to you about Napoleon the First, and a host of other brilliant boys. They go so far as to say that the men who fought our Revolutionary battles were by no means old, in spite of their three-cornered hats and knee breeches. And it must be confessed that there is some reason on their side.

Yet we must beware of a blind enthusiasm for the new. All that is new is not true, and all that is true is not new. Along the path of the centuries there rise, from space to space, immortal monuments of greatness that can never be surpassed—the pyramids of Egypt, the marbles of Greece, the pictures of Italy, the poems of Homer and Milton, and Shakspeare, the modern world can never hope to surpass or even equal these. And it is well, for the sake of association, to preserve, here and there, links which bind the present to the past. Let us not break down all the bridges behind us, bridges that have carried us safely over.

ANÆSTHESIA.

The new method of producing anesthesia by hypnotism, was recently tried in the Mauritian Hospital at Turin, by Dr. Pertusio, with perfect success, upon a young woman aged 18. The brilliant object held before her eyes was a gold seal-ring. After the lapse of twelve minutes, the patient said that she felt sleepy; she was then bid to shut her eyes, which she immediately did. After some preliminary trials, her state of insensibility being at length ascertained, the operation of extirpating a tumor, which she had, was proceeded with, the patient remaining passive, and not betraying the slightest symptom of pain. Nevertheless, she continued to reply to the questions put to her, and even commenced a conversation herself on matters quite foreign to the operation. She was awakened by blowing on her face after the wound was dressed.

Photographers and daguerreotypists used to direct their sitters to fix their eyes on some bright object, such as a spot of light on a glass globe, in order to keep the eyes steady, and this accounts for the sleepy look of the pictures taken when it was necessary, as in the infancy of the art, to sit several minutes. And speaking of hypnotism, we read lately of an experiment tried on a hen. The bird was placed on a bench painted bright green, and a line was drawn with a piece of chalk across the top of the bench, commencing with the bill of the bird. The hen, gazing fixedly on this line, soon became stupid and fell into a deep sleep, from which she was not aroused even by sticking pins into her body. Years ago, we tried this experiment on a superannuated Shanghai rooster with complete success, but did not try the experiment of sticking pins into its body, our purpose simply being amusement, and not science. But scientific men have no scruples. Dr. Mussey, some years ago, used to puncture the eyes of cats and inject the oil of tobacco, to show how deleterious tobacco was to human beings. We never saw the logic of the deduction, and remember thinking the experiment cruel—as no doubt the cat did—but as the torture was inflicted scientifically, we suppose it was all right.

STEAM FIRE-ENGINES.—The great value and importance of these machines is now so fully established that our cities generally are adopting them for use.

WATER RATES.—The Revere House, in this city, pays over $1000 per annum to the city for the amount of Cochituate water it uses.

THE BEARD.

Americans are fast becoming a bearded nation, cultivating the mustache and beard generally all over the face. It is a fashion that has crept over the water to us, and not an unbecoming one to many. Still it requires much tact and good taste to manage the beard so that it shall be becoming to the wearer. It will serve to hide an ill-formed mouth, and of course as well as to hide a handsome one; the teeth look clearer and whiter from behind a dark mustache. The beard may be so trimmed and arranged as to do much in remedying any natural defect. A short face may be made longer, and a narrow one broader, a lack of development in the chin remedied, and other desirable objects attained. Ladies generally like the beard, not objecting to this distinction which nature has created between the sexes. We acknowledge a liking for the appendage ourselves, considering it not only comfortable, but manly and becoming.

CHARACTER IN WRITING.

There are persons who profess to judge of character by handwriting; and to judge from their advertisements, there is very little doubt that their profession pays them. Yet their judgments, after all, are mere matters of guess work. They base them, as the gipsies do, on the mere pretence of simply looking at the hand. Now, writing a good hand by no means generally implies the having a good head. Still less is it indicative of having a good heart. A man may be remarkable for the superfinest qualities, and yet may write the coarsest and most commonplace of hands. He may have the clearest brain, and yet may sign his name so puzzlingly that nobody can read it. Many a man, indeed, who cannot write his name at all, may, without untruth, be looked on as a man of mark.

PERPETUAL YOUTH.—"Women can easily preserve their youth; for she who captivates the heart and understanding never grows old." So we ought to record the "death of a young lady of one hundred," when a juvenile centenarian skips off the stage of life.

SWEETS TO THE SWEET.—"Pray, can you tell me, my dear Mr. Jenkins," asked with admiring eyes a very pretty young lady, "how is sugar refined?" "When a lady gives it to you, madam," was the happy reply.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?—The Queen of Spain's last child has been baptized. It has no fewer than sixty Christian names.

OUR NATURAL WEALTH.

Almost every year develops new resources in our country, new proofs of the lavish bounty of nature in the land it is our fortune to inhabit. As the forest disappeared before the axe of the settler, the earth began to yield her exhaustless supplies of coal. When the precious metals became scarce, the existence of abundance of gold was made manifest; and now that whales are becoming as rare as angel's visits, we behold the phenomenon of oil superior to any ever yielded by the leviathans of the deep gushing out of the earth. We allude, of course, to the last natural marvels, the discovery of the famous oil springs in Venango county, Pennsylvania. If half the tales told of this discovery be true, the "Long-Tom Coffins" of Nantucket and New Bedford may lay their harpoons and lances aside. Their vocation has surely gone!

The oil flows out of a hillside, and a large number of persons have sunk wells and inserted pumps to raise the precious fluid. One man has a pump which delivers a gallon a minute. The oil comes from coal embedded in the mountains. The oil has very little smell, burns clearly, and is said to be superior to kerosene oil.

A correspondent of the National Intelligencer says: "I can assure you that the excitement is fully equal to the fever incident to the gold in California. The agitation develops itself in certain persons and temperaments in an extravagant manner. I sat on the bank of the creek below Titusville for some time, interested in the movements of two very respectable persons (of independent circumstances), wading in the deep, cold water, with stick in hand, alternately probing the mud at the bottom, and applying the end of the stick to the nose, to discover the possible presence of oil. Entertaining, indeed, to me, were the curious philosophical reflections in which they indulged, as they determined important and inevitable results from dubious contingencies, and established positive deductions from dubious premises. Oil has been discovered in large quantities along the entire length of Oil Creek, and with profitable results, by boring from one to one hundred and fifty feet. Drake's spring, about one and a half miles from Titusville, yielded about eight hundred gallons, and McClintock Spring, at the mouth of the creek, about twelve hundred gallons per day. The indications of oil along the Causewago valley are fully equal to those on Oil Creek, especially in the vicinity of the old salt works. This substance is said to be exceedingly valuable for almost all the practical uses of oil, and will undoubtedly command a widely-extended market."

ABOUT APPARITIONS.

The New Bedford Standard, in noticing Mr. Owen's book about this world and the other, wherein the design of the writer is to exhibit some of the proofs that the spirits of the dead still retain their interest in the affairs of this earth, that they are capable of affecting the living and even conversing with them in audible tones, and of rendering themselves perceptible to the eye, says: "When we read of the apparition of the dead, in their spiritual bodies, and yet wearing clothes similar to those they wore on earth, we think the argument proves too much. For it seems absurd to suppose that a slouched hat and a gold-headed cane have also a spiritual part which the deceased puts on his spiritual head, or carries in his spiritual hand. But if we acknowledge that this appearance is a reality, we must suppose the other to be so likewise." This idea has always struck us, in connection with ghost stories. The ghost of a pair of breeches is ludicrously incomprehensible. We remember being struck with the incongruity in a picture representing the apotheosis of the first Napoleon. There was the great emperor ascending to the seventh heaven, with a halo of glory round his head, and those famous jackboots going up too—an immortality of leather! It may be said that boots have soles, but the suggestion is that of an unfeeling punster. Yet probably the artist was tenacious of those boots, and refused to pull them off at the suggestion of the critics, exclaiming, with the stage hero:

"Who dares this pair of boots displace, Must meet Bombastes face to face."

DEAR OLD LADY!—Mrs. Partington desires to express her regrets that the French emperor has suppressed the Universe, and wants to know how he did it, and where he got his power.

A HINT.—If you would not have affliction visit you twice, listen at once to what it teaches.

WHAT'S IN A FLAG?

What's in a flag? Of itself it is a mere bit of bunting, white or blue or red, or it may be a few yards of silk fluttering in the breeze, and shining in the sun. But is this all? No! A national flag is a living language—a symbol that resumes within itself a history. "What is there," exclaims an enthusiastic writer, "more living than a flag? It moves, it palpitates, it breathes. Thousands of men die for it. Its rents adorn it, as wounds decorate the face of an old warrior. When it is but a lance surmounted by a rag of bunting, it becomes thrice holy and thrice sanctified. It is a shroud which has received the impress of the bleeding and scarred face of an army."

The meteor-flag of England! what memories cluster about its crimson cross! what a master-roll of heroes unfolds itself before the imagination, as the eye rests upon its folds! The tricolor of France! for how many years has it been associated with deeds the recital of which stirs the blood like the blare of a brazen trumpet, or the roll of a hundred drums! We behold it unfolded on the sands of Egypt, with the pyramids in the distance, with "centuries looking down on it," as Napoleon eloquently said, when the splendid cavalry of the Orient melted away like mist before the rolling volleys of the impregnable French squares. We see it climbing the Alps, and blazing in the sunlight on the plains of Lombardy. We behold the Austrian eagles in full flight before it. Again it rises on the view, pale, tattered, rent, fluttering in the Arctic air of Russia over the heads of frozen spectres that look like men dragged out of their graves, while hordes of Cossacks prowled like northern wolves around them, and the far distance is lighted by the lurid flashes of the enemy's artillery. We behold it again in a darker hour, when nations are banded against it. It descends with the Old Guard to the final carnage of Waterloo, and sinks with the hopes of France and liberty upon that stricken field. The white flag of the Bourbon rises in its stead; but not for long. Out of the blood and smoke of revolution, it rises again. It flutters over many a fierce struggle in Algeria, and it is again unfolded in the Italian sun, leading from victory to victory till the red day of Solferino crowns it with a fame worthy of its youthful laurels.

The black flag! what heart has not shuddered even at the pictured image of that sign of terror! The very thought of the pirate's ensign conjures up many a terrible tale of the ocean; of plundered galleons, of murdered crews, of desperate strife, of black waves closing over helpless victims.

Last, not least, nearest and dearest to our hearts is the star-spangled banner, the stainless flag of our republic, which has floated in undiminished glory from the time when it was first given to the breeze, down to the present day. New stars are yearly taking their place in its glorious constellation, and beautiful and bright, it waves in sunshine and storm—the symbol of a nation's power and a world's hope. The American traveller who in some foreign port beholds that proud and lovely ensign fluttering from the topmast of a vessel of his nation, comprehends the full significance and eloquence of a flag. His throbbing heart and tear-brimmed eyes confess all the power of symbolism and of association. He recalls the splendid story of our annals, and thanks God that he is an American. Many are the brave men who lived and toiled and died, that the star-spangled banner might be glorious. It received its baptism of blood and fire in hours of mingled glory and gloom. In terrible land battles, in fearful engagements at sea, throughout three great wars, twice with the haughtiest power in the world, it has received the laurel of victory; and it now rallies under its folds thirty millions of freemen, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the great lakes to the gulf. It sheds a lustre over the white wings of commerce from the poles to the tropics, from Jeddo to San Francisco, trailing its glories round the globe. It is a flag to live for and die for. And as yet, it is but in the infancy of its career. Who shall say over what realms that starred flag shall beam in the unseen future, either in warlike or in peaceful triumph? And who will dare to say that this glorious ensign is nothing but a bit of colored bunting? It is a nation's life.

NEW YORK STREET CHARACTERS.

In the illustrated department of the Dollar Magazine for the present month we propose to follow up a theme upon which we have more than once before engaged both pen and pencil for our pages. If we were not to write a single line in explanation of the engravings for this number, their expressive truthfulness would tell their own story. To persons familiar with street life in the great metropolis of America, we need not commend them as copies from actual scenes in the streets of New York. It is a prolific theme, that of the various itinerant masses of our city streets. This class is as strongly individualized as those of any European cities; indeed, many of these representatives are from abroad, bringing their old vagrant habits and business with them. City life gives rise to a multitudinous variety of occupations unknown to quiet inland towns; occupations that to an uninformed person would seem entirely without profit or reason, are, by persistent industry and necessity, rendered a means of support. It would appear at least a problem to our country friends as to whether an adult could pick up in the streets a sufficient weight of bits of rags and paper during twelve hours of the twenty-four to pay for the necessary food which is required to keep soul and body together. Yet it is a fact that there are many persons in every one of our Atlantic cities who make a thrifty living by this seemingly precarious means. Indeed we know of one individual, who is a daily visitor through Winter Street, by our office, who has money in the savings bank, and who has made what is to him a small fortune, and a decent living by this sole occupation. Everything is saved by these—what the French call—chiffonniers, bits of rags, paper, chips, old iron, all are tumbled into their ample canvass bags together, to be assorted in their humble quarters at night, and sold to the junk dealers, and paper makers, while the chips supply all of fuel that they permit themselves to consume. Each party thus employed has his or her particular route through the streets, and they generally pass over it at least three times each day, always with keen eyes fixed upon the ground, and sometimes being rewarded by picking up lost articles of considerable value. The party above referred to, told us, not long since, that a sixpenny loaf of bread morning and night daily sufficed him through the year, with an occasional chance meal procured by performing an errand, or by some other means, and that two shillings a week supplied him with lodgings! All he procured over this amount he saved, and he had nearly three hundred dollars in the savings bank. Of course his clothing was the cast off garments he picked up here and there, and the gift of charitable passers-by. Scarcely without an exception these people are foreigners, and some of them have seen "better days." In New York, especially, one is surprised to see the number of Chinese who are to be met at the corners of the streets, as beggars, or venders of cigars, or other trifling articles. How came these "celestials" so far from home? What a romance in fact their individual lives would illustrate. A fact is still in our recollection of seeing in Broadway, New York, some few years since, a ragged and careworn individual, picking up bits of coal from the ashes cast out of the dwelling houses, and filling a small basket with the same, who was known to have been an officer at one time in good standing in the Polish army. The sequel to his story, however, was comprised in a single word—rum—for the coals he picked up after hours of laborious and humiliating labor, he would receive, perhaps, enough to procure forgetfulness in a poisonous cup of liquor. Poor fellow, he has since died at Blackwell's Island, a pauper. Some, on the contrary, are sober and industrious; here and there, sad sight, will be observed young lads, and girls, who might be made good and useful, and even "ornamental," so to speak; some dutifully contributing to home support for aged parents or invalid brothers and sisters. Ah, the unwritten stories of actual life, the heroes and heroines of which are daily before our eyes! But let us go on to describe the several scenes which our artist has depicted for the reader's satisfaction.—Our first picture represents a "picker up of unconsidered trifles," with his well-furnished hand cart and canine assistant. The dog is well trained, and is of no small assistance in propelling the load. This little "turn out" is not the least picturesque of those to be met with in this live city, where the wheels of vitality never rest, and where there is scarce one silent hour in the twenty-four. The second engraving represents the "Vender of Kindlings." The pyramid supported on the back of the sturdy youth is composed of kindling stuff, which yields a very handsome percentage of profit to the vender. The street sweeper is our next illustration—an innovation which our New York friends have imported from London and Paris—she holds out her hand for the trifling recompense of her unenviable occupation. Many a dainty white kid glove drops a small coin into the palm in gratitude for the unsoiled French boots that have just achieved the formidable passage of Broadway. We do these things a little better in Boston, the city authorities keep the streets clean and passable at all hours by employing large groups of laborers under especial direction. The next scene represents a girl and woman, who are dealers in old glass, rags, and all sorts of miscellaneous wares they ferret out of old barrels, kennels and by-places. The "Chinese Beggar" is the theme of the next engraving. He sits at the foot of a flight of steps, and a playcard before him sets forth his appeal for charity. The next illustration gives us the "Chimney Sweep," a useful individual, and a thrifty trader. Then again we have still another representative of the flowery land, vending his cigars, and true to his national pigtail. The illustration which succeeds, the last, represents the "Omnibus Driver," a New York "institution." These various phases of life tell their own story, and furnish a complete illustration of the diversified modes of labor for obtaining the means of sustenance which the necessities of men call into play. How true is the axiom, "one half of the world know not how the other half live." This series of engravings will beautify our volume and gratify our subscribers.

THE RIGHT BIRD.

Old Dr. Nichols, who formerly practised medicine, found the fees and calls did not come fast enough to please him, so he added an apothecary shop to his business, for the sale of drugs and medicines. He had a great sign painted to attract the wondering eyes of the villagers, and the doctor loved to stand in front of his shop and explain its beauties to the gaping beholders. One of these was an Irishman, who gazed at it for a while with a comical look, and then exclaimed: "Och, and by the powers, doctor, if it isn't fine! But there's something a little bit wanting in it."

"And what, pray, is that?" asked the doctor.

"Why, you see," said Pat, "you've got a beautiful sheet of water here, and not a bit of a bird swimming in it."

"Ay, yes," replied the doctor, "that's a good idea. I'll have a couple of swans painted there; wouldn't they be fine?"

"Faith, and I don't know but they would," said Pat; "but I'm after thinking there's another kind of bird would be more appropriate."

"And what's that?" asked the doctor.

"Why, I can't exactly think of his name just now, but he is one of them kind of birds that when he sings he cries, 'Quack, quack, quack!'"

The last that was seen of Pat and the doctor, was Pat running for dear life and the doctor after him.—Woburn Budget.

THE CURATE'S COW.

Solomon Grisdale, curate of Merrington, who was very poor, and had a numerous family, lost his only cow. Mr. Surtees determined to raise a subscription for another cow, and waited on the Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry (the late Earl Cornwallis) then Dean of Durham, and owner of the great tithes of Merrington, to ask what he would give. "Give?" said his lordship, "why a cow to be sure. Go, Mr. Surtees, to Woodfield, my steward, and tell him to give you as much money as will buy the best cow you can find." Mr. Surtees, who had not expected above a five pound note at most, exclaimed, "My lord, I hope you'll ride to heaven upon the back of that cow!" A while afterwards he was saluted in the college by the late Lord Barrington, with, "Surtees, what is this absurd speech that I hear you have been making to the dean?" "I see nothing absurd in it," was the reply. "When the dean rides to heaven on the back of that cow, many of you Prebendaries will be glad to lay hold of her tail."—New York Picayune.

THE DAUGHTERS OF REBECCA.*A Story of the Mountain Passes of North Wales.

BY C. L. FENTON, M. D.

I HAD been so entranced with the majestic and romantic beauty of the scenery that a storm, which I had noticed an hour before, gathering in the horizon, overtook me before I was aware of it. I was fairly in for a drenching, if nothing worse, but if darkness should come on before I succeeded in finding a place of shelter, there was every probability that I should be compelled to pass the night among the woods which covered the mountain passes.

I must explain that I was travelling for pleasure in North Wales, and having been much delighted with the romantic aspect of the country in the vicinity of the Berwyn Mountains, I had taken up my temporary abode at an isolated farmhouse in the vale of the Upper Severn. The fine weather in the morning had tempted me to take a longer walk than usual, and I had wandered on, still climbing uphill, until I gained one of the loftiest pinnacles of Plynlimmon, where I had remained to rest myself and to admire the prospect, till my watch and the cravings of hunger warned me that it was high time to commence the descent, and plod my weary way back to the farmhouse. It was just as I had reached the base of the steep ascent, that I was overtaken by the storm, and if a stranger to this thinly populated district of North Wales chance to make a mistake and take the wrong pass—and all are much alike—he may wander for miles and see no sign of a human dwelling. Thus it chanced with me in this instance, and just as it became dark, I discovered that I had lost my way among the mountains. I was so utterly bewildered that I knew not how to act. If I stood still, I should perish with cold; if I walked onward, every step, for aught I knew, might carry me still further out of my way, and I stood the chance of being inextricably lost. Happily, after a while the storm ceased, the sky cleared, and the moon shed a faint light over the scene, though so thickly interlaced were the branches of the forest trees, that his feeble rays could scarcely penetrate them, and her light did me little service.

I had wandered about for more than an hour, and had just reluctantly made up my mind to select the most sheltered spot I could find, to wrap myself up in my cloak and lie down, and make myself as comfortable as possible under the circumstances, till daylight, when I fancied I heard a cracking of the underwood, and a rattling of the leaves in the thicket near by.

Now, as I had no other weapon of offence or defence with me, than a stout crab-stick, I acknowledged that I felt a faint fluttering at the heart. To be sure, I knew that there were no more formidable wild beasts to be found in Wales, than foxes and wild-cats, still I had no fancy to feel the sharp claws and sharper fangs of the latter animal fastened into my throat; and I had heard tales, how, when thinking themselves driven to bay, wild-cats were often known to fly at travellers and to inflict dangerous, and sometimes fatal wounds. But more than either foxes, or wildcats, or wolves, had there been any in the woods, I dreaded the sudden attack of robbers, for it was at the period when the Rebecca-ites, and other secret societies of a political character, were numerous throughout Wales, and especially in the northern counties, and it was known that bands of robbers, and men of bad character, had joined these societies in vast numbers, hoping to shield themselves from the consequences of their depredations, under the somewhat equivocal protection thus afforded them. I resolved, therefore, carefully to reconnoitre before I made my presence known, unless, indeed, I had been already seen.

I remained perfectly still, concealing myself as much as possible behind the trunk of a huge oak, for I heard the crackling, rustling sound nearer and nearer. Presently, to my great surprise, there emerged from the thicket, and stood in the open space directly before me, fully revealed by the moonlight, which was here unshrouded by the leafy canopy that in many places obscured its rays—no wild beast, no savage robber, but a young woman of three or four-and-twenty, clad in a broad-brimmed man's hat, and full, short petticoat, and other picturesque accessories of a Welsh female peasant's costume. Her form was tall and slender, but remarkably well-proportioned, her attire showing her well-rounded limbs, and neat ankles and feet to great advantage. Her light hair fell in great abundance over her shoulders, reaching down to the small of her back, and neatly braided and tied with gay ribbons, according to the custom amongst Welsh maidens. Her features were regular, and their expression decidedly prepossessing, though her complexion was of an unearthly pallor; but this might have been occasioned by the moonlight, which shone full in her face, as she gazed earnestly into the distance, as if she were anxiously watching for some person's approach.

Had I come on hersuddenly, and seen her standing statue-like, as she now stood, I might possibly have taken her for an apparition, although I am not prone to believe in the supernatural; but I had had evidence of her material substance in the rustling of the leaves and crackling of the underwood as she emerged from the thicket. Still, I could not but think, it strange to meet with a young woman at so late an hour, in so lonely a spot, so distant, as I believed, from any human habitation. While I was doubting whether to accost her or not, and thinking how I should make my presence known without alarming her, she suddenly turned aside, cast down her eyes, and exclaimed, with a deep-drawn sigh, expressive of painful and yet long-endured disappointment:

"O dear, will he never come?" Presently she added, more hopefully: "He will surely come to-morrow." And gathering her shawl about her shoulders, she moved a few steps towards the thicket where she had emerged into the clearing, when she caught a glimpse of my shadow, extending, through lack of caution on my part, beyond that cast by the trunk of the tree behind which I had concealed myself.

She uttered an exclamation of joyful surprise, turned round, saw my figure, and springing forward, flung herself into my arms, exclaiming:

"Ah, Dávid! it was cruel to stay away so long, and then to surprise me thus. But I forgive you, since you have come at last."

The next moment she had fainted in my embrace, her arms twined around my neck, her hands clasped, and her head resting upon my shoulder.

Here was a pretty predicament to be caught in! With considerable difficulty I unloosed her hands, and laid her down gently on a heap of fallen leaves, which I had collected to make my bed upon for the night. Fortunately I had with me a small flask of brandy and water, and I poured a few drops of the fluid into her mouth, and not knowing what else to do, commenced to rub her hands vigorously. Happily she soon revived, and after gasping for breath once or twice, opened her eyes and gave utterance to a faint sigh.

"Do you feel better?" I asked, in as gentle a tone as possible. My voice caused her to start. She re-opened her eyes, which were gently closing again, and gazed into my face as if bewildered; then, with a faint cry of alarm, she struggled to raise herself, but finding herself too weak, she sunk back, her heart palpitating violently with affright. I spoke to her kindly, and sought to quiet her fears.

"Let me go away," she said. "Pray assist me to rise." And a deep blush suffused her pale cheeks, as she added:

"I was sadly mistaken, I thought you were David."

"No," I replied, "I am not David—but I am ready and willing to serve you to the extent of my power. Let me assist you?" And I succeeded in raising her to her feet.

"How came you here at this hour?" she continued. "Who are you? I know every neighbor for miles around, and I have never seen your face before."

"I might repeat your first question," I said, with a smile. "I am not a native of this country, but am travelling here for pleasure. I am now staying at Farmer Wynn's at Dwggyrn Hill (pronouncing the barbarous collection of consonants and semi-vowels, as well as my Saxon organs of speech would permit), and having climbed to-day to the summit of Plynlimmon, I was overtaken by the storm, and lost my way during my descent. I have wandered in the woods for hours, and at length, thinking that I was far distant from any human habitation, I had made up my mind to sleep in the woods till daylight, when at that moment you emerged from the thicket near by. I presume, however, since I have met with you, that there must be a farmhouse or perhaps a village near at hand."

This explanation appeared to satisfy the young woman. The expression of wildness which I had remarked when I looked closely into her face, gradually left it, and after passing her hand once or twice over her brow, she said, as if communing with herself:

"Yes, I should not have come abroad so late. I might have known he would not come to-night. But he will come to-morrow."

Then addressing me, she added: "Don't you think David will come to-morrow?"

I had made up my mind that the poor young woman was a monomaniac with regard to some matter, the nature of which, alas, I readily surmised, and thinking it best to humor her fancy, I replied:

"O yes. I have no doubt you will see him to-morrow."

"But do you really think so?" she said, looking pitifully up into my face. "That is what they all tell me. That is what something ever whispers in my ear—but to-morrow and to-morrow comes and goes, and still he comes not."

I made no reply, and the poor thing continued: "Ah, you too try to deceive me, as well as the rest. Ah me! Sometimes I fancy myself that my poor wits have gone astray, and that all this watching is for naught, and that he will never come to me, but I must go to him in the heaven above, where perhaps he is waiting as anxiously for me. But come," she added, "it will not do for us to remain here. My mother's cot is not far off. I will lead you thither, and from thence I can easily show you the way to Dwggynn Hill. It is only two miles distant. You can soon walk that."

She led the way through the thicket, and then taking my arm confidently, led me along a narrow path which skirted the wood, to her mother's cottage—a small wooden dwelling standing in a little well-kept garden, and the only habitation in sight. A neatly-clad, elderly woman was standing at the garden-gate. She was evidently anxiously awaiting her daughter's return. She started when she saw by whom she was accompanied, and looking earnestly into my face, shook her head gravely, as she asked the young woman where she stayed so long.

The maiden replied that she had been to the clearing, thinking that David might come. (I noticed that the old lady glanced at me with a beseeching, pitying look, as much as to say, "Respect my poor child's misfortune.") And the daughter explained that I was a stranger who was staying with Farmer

Wynn, and had lost my way in the mountain pass, when she encountered me.

They both directed me to a path, which led by a short cut to Dwggynn Hill, and the old woman brought me a bowl of goat's milk, which I found very refreshing. They then bade me good night, and following the directions they had given me, I was soon resting my tired limbs beneath Farmer Wynn's hospitable roof. I related my adventure while Dame Wynn was preparing supper, and asked for some information respecting the young woman, who was known to both the farmer and his wife.

"Ah, poor Mary Morgan!" said the farmer. "It's a thousand pities! There is not a better, and before her sorrow came, there was not a prettier lass on the mountain side than Mary. David Jones, sir, was her sweetheart, and as fine and manly a chap as ever stood at the plough-tail, till he joined the 'Daughters of Rebecca.' He is dead, sir, long, long ago. He was—but I cannot tell the story. I knew the lad well, and it always makes me sad to think on't. Poor Mary is sensible enough in aught else; but she is waiting for David to return. Poor soul! she has waited three long years, and every day she hopes he will come to-morrow. Every day she goes to the place where they parted, expecting to see him coming up the clearing; but she may wait till the day of judgment."

THE STREET-SWEEPER.

"I should like to hear her history," I said.

"Master Davis the curate will tell it to you better than I can, if you ask him to-morrow," returned the farmer. "The parson know'd 'em both, and he's very good to poor Mary and her mother."

I was forced to be content and wait for the morrow myself, when I resolved to call upon the curate, with whom I had already made acquaintance, and ask him to relate to me poor Mary's sad story. The next day I met the curate while on my way to the parsonage. He was a handsome, venerable old gentleman, who, for the small stipend of thirty pounds a year, had presided for more than forty years over the spiritual welfare of the parishioners of Dwggyenn Hill and the adjoining parishes, until he had grown old and gray in his Master's service. He was almost worshipped by the simple, honest peasantry, most of whom he had known from the cradle, and christened and confirmed with his own hands. I greeted him, and strolled along by his side, and soon found an opportunity to broach the subject of my curiosity.

"Ah, poor Mary Morgan!" sighed the curate, when I had related my adventure in the clearing. "I have known her, poor thing! and I knew her sweetheart, David Jones, ever since they drew their first breath. I christened them both, and I was at Caernarvon when poor David suffered. I prayed with him at the last moment, and I hope and believe he died truly penitent. It is a long, sad story, sir. Let us sit down on this grassy mound. I begin to feel my legs totter with weakness when I have walked for a short time, though I once thought nothing of clambering over Plynlimmon and preaching at Cwdd-Gwnys on Sunday, after having already preached at Dwggyenn Hill—but old age will tell upon us all. I shall be ninety-five next birthday!"

So the venerable old man and I seated ourselves upon the grassy mound, and he told the following story:

"The parents of David Jones and Mary Morgan were both farmers, and like most of the farmers in this part of the country, they were poor, yet independent so far as the ability to supply all their simple wants were concerned, and David and Mary were both only children. I, who make it a point of duty to know intimately every individual amongst my few but widely-scattered flock, and so far as God permits me to guide them in their spiritual duties, was always pleased with my pastoral visits to these families, and as the children grew up, I was glad to perceive the growing fondness of the young people for each other. David grew up to be a handsome, manly fellow, and Mary when she had reached her seventeenth year was one of the prettiest, as well as one of the best young women in the united parishes of Dwggyenn and Cwdd-Gwnys, and I looked forward with pleasure to the day when I should perform the marriage ceremony between them. I hoped when they became man and wife, the influence of Mary's gentle sway would curb the only tendency to wildness I had ever remarked in David. This was a partiality for field-sports, which sometimes led him to transgress the law of the land by poaching. I knew that Mary had often begged him to desist from the practice, and he had promised to do so, and kept his promise until again led astray by the ill example and persuasions of others. At length the time arrived when David and Mary were to be married, and as their parents' farms adjoined each other, it was arranged that the young folks should reside alternately with both their parents, and that the young man should assist in the cultivation of both farms on equal shares. About this time the various secret societies, of which the 'Daughters of Rebecca' was the most numerous and influential, began to be formed throughout the country. There were doubtless many honestly-disposed, but ill-advised men belonging to these societies, formed for the redress by secret force of various social and political grievances, but the majority of the members were the idle and dissolute young men of the county, who had all to gain and nothing to lose. I don't know by what means, but doubtless through the influence of old companions whom he had been associated with in his various poaching expeditions, David Jones was induced to enroll his name amongst the 'Daughters of Rebecca.'*

"Great was the distress of the old folks, but greater still that of Mary, when they and she heard that David had leagued himself with this outlawed band, and Mary at length obtained her lover's promise that as soon as they were married he would quit the order. Sir Watkin Williams Wynne, the proprietor of the Jones's and Morgan's farms, though a kind and generous landlord, was especially obnoxious to the 'Daughters of Rebecca,' in consequence of his determination to uphold the right of property, and his rigid resolve to visit all those who were caught in the act of infringing those rights with the severest penalties of the law; consequently poor Mary's distress was all the greater, lest Sir Watkin should hear that David had united himself with this illegal body.

"Meanwhile turnpikes were torn down and burnt, and their keepers abused and beaten, and in more than one instance, murdered; and sometimes the country for miles around, was illuminated by the light from blazing barns and granaries, which were set on fire because their owners upheld, or, at least, refused to oppose, the action of the authorities. Troops were called to protect the magistrates in the execution of their duties; frequent collisions took place between the soldiers and the outlaws, and it was a period of terror and disaster to the well disposed throughout that section of the principality. It wanted, however, but two days of the time appointed for the wedding, and poor Mary rejoiced that the time was so near at hand when David, who she knew would be true to his promise, would leave the society forever.

"David and Mary were to be married the day before Christmas. On the night of the 23d December, Mary sat pensive and alone by the cottage fire. Restless and anxious, she glanced often from the flaming hearth to the window of the room; and a moment listening with deep anxiety, would relapse again into her musing. It was ten o'clock. The Welsh peasantry go early to bed and rise early; her parents had been asleep for nearly two hours. After long waiting, she at length arose from her seat, softly opened the door, and looked forth into the night. An air of wildness about the girl, added to the simplicity of her attire, and the strongly illuminated loneliness of the house, imparted a shade of the romantic to her situation. Fitful gusts of wind passed before her face, ruffling her hair, and chilling her slight frame with a sense of something fearful, and whispering as they passed a melancholy language.

"'He will not come to-night,' muttered the maiden, as, shuddering, she cautiously closed the door and returned to her position by the fire. 'No, he will not come to-night.'

"Still she sat and watched—a dreary, anxious, uncertain time. At length a shrill, low whistle was heard amid the howling of the wind, and the girl sprang up, exclaiming, faintly:

"'Ah! he has come at last.'

"She moved swiftly to the door, lifted the latch, and stood waiting in the doorway. Presently a well known voice said, 'Mary.'

"'David,' returned the girl, in a quiet, gentle tone, and the next moment they were standing side by side, and the maiden's head was resting on the young man's bosom. In the delight of that moment, she forgot the long, weary hours of waiting. The glory of his presence extinguished all the darkness which had oppressed her mind.

THE STREET SCRAP-GATHERER.

"Mary," said the youth, after they had stood for some time silent, 'to-morrow I am to call you mine. I have waited long and risked much to meet you to-night, according to my promise, which I never break. After to-morrow I shall not quit your side again. I can remain now but a minute. It is late.'

"But you go only to your father's house, near by?" cried Mary, in a tone of anxiety, for she guessed his meaning, and dreaded his reply.

"Mary," he said, 'I am pledged to rejoin the society to-night. There is work on hand. They will suspect me of treachery if I flinch from my sworn duties. But it is for the last time. I have told them all, and with difficulty have obtained permission to quit the order. It proves how much they trust me,' he added, in a tone of pride.

"David," said the girl, 'I have been much troubled to-night, as I sat brooding over the fire. I have had strange forebodings. I am sure the doings of the society are very, very wicked, and I fear some evil is hovering over us. Don't go back to-night; don't, for my sake; if you love me, David! Why not leave them forever, to-night, as well as to-morrow?'

"Because they have my promise."

"David," said the girl, beseechingly, 'if you love me you will not go!'

"I do love you, Mary. God knows how dearly; but I must go. It's only for this time. I am pledged to go to-night; but I will go no more after this. There, now you have my promise, so dry your tears and let me see you smile."

"Pledged—to—go—for—the last time!" said the girl, slowly, and almost wildly, with a strange intonation of voice. 'No, no,' she added, quickly, seizing him by the arm and dragging him further into the room. 'David,' she almost shrieked, 'you shall not go to-night!'

"Mary," replied the youth, 'willingly, gladly would I stay away. I was a fool to join them. I was ignorant in a great measure of their object. I like not the work that we have to do to-night, and would avoid it; but I have with the utmost difficulty obtained permission to leave them. To-night I stand pledged to rejoin them; but in a few hours our task will be done. The place of our rendezvous is close at hand. Go sleep, dear Mary. Early on the morrow I will be with you, once more a freeman, to claim my bride.'

"The light at this moment shone on the barrel of David's gun, which he had placed near the door on entering the cottage, unseen by Mary. Now she saw it."

"David," she cried, 'you carry fire-arms. There is mischief, deadly mischief, on hand. I have heard something of vengeance being sworn against Sir Watkin's gamekeepers. It is what you are going to seek after. David, it will be murder. The men have only done their duty. O, stay, stay! For pity's sake; for my sake! For our happiness and hopes of heaven, go not abroad beyond your father's cot to-night!'

"Dearest Mary, my honor is pledged," was the young man's solemn reply.

"The lovers still stood lingering. David would, how gladly, have remained behind, and left his companions to go on their mission of destruction and vengeance alone. Mary still clung to him and earnestly begged him to stay; when suddenly both were startled by the sound of fire-arms, followed by a wild and piercing cry, which though but faintly heard, apparently proceeded from the plantations in Sir Watkin's park, a quarter of a mile distant.

"The youth was instantly reminded of his pledge. Confused and horrified, and under the impression that something dreadful had happened, he hastily kissed the cheek of the affrighted damsel by his side, snatched his gun and darted away, crying:

"Mary, I am too late already. I go to prevent mischief, if possible. Remember to-morrow I return to leave you no more."

"Stay, David, stay!" shrieked the young girl. Stay! murder stalks abroad. I will denounce you if you do not stay."

"But he upon whom she called was already out of hearing of her voice, and flinging her arms above her head, and claspings her hands, she shrieked aloud, and in a fit of dread and anguish, fell senseless to the floor."

"The noise awoke her parents who were sleeping in an adjoining room. They sprang out of bed and came to see what had happened. They raised the unconscious girl, but their united efforts failed to restore her, and having carried her to bed, they remained through the night watching her, as she lay like one that was dead. Hour after hour passed by, and still there was no sign of returning consciousness. The closed eyes did not open, the blanched cheek recovered not its bloom, and the unnerved arm lay powerless. There was no discernible heaving of the bosom; no sensible motion of the pulse; a cold dew rested upon her forehead, and the cast and solemnity of death overshadowed her still lineaments, and save that the limbs were not rigid, nor as yet cold, there was nothing to betray the presence of life. She lay thus in a trance for several hours, and woke at last in a raging fever."

"Meanwhile David Jones, guided by a vivid conflagration, which shortly burst forth, deepening the darkness and obscurity around, hastened toward the spot where the occasional discharge of fire-arms was still heard. Striking his way through the wood, he had not proceeded far when he discovered that the conflagration was caused by the burning of the house of Sir Watkin's head farm-bailiff. The house and the adjacent barns, outhouses and stables were wrapped in flames."

"In a few minutes he reached the scene of the outrage. The conflict had apparently ceased; but he heard the murmur of gruff voices, mingled with what seemed to be the groans of a dying man. Pressing forward, he came upon a group of disguised and blackened 'Daughters of Rebecca,' who were standing or stooping around the body of one of their members who appeared to be fatally wounded, while two others of the society lay stark dead beside the farm-bailiff—also dead—a short distance off."

"The dying Rebeccait was a mere lad—a friend of David's, who like himself, had been unwillingly persuaded to join the order, nay, who had only joined it because David had done so. Poor lad; but for its black stain, his smooth face and youthful, regular features would not have ill-become the feminine habiliments he wore in compliance with the rules of the society."

THE CHINESE BEGGAR.

"Enraged, and forgetful, or rather heedless of all consequences, David's instant impulse was to avenge his friend's death, for that the lad was dying was evident. He was already clenching at the earth, and tearing up the roots of decayed grass, in his death agony.

"David forgot that in his hurry he had not resumed his woman's attire, nor re-blackened his face, which he had washed before presenting himself to Mary, and was consequently easily recognized, by the under bailiffs and constables who were hastening to the scene of riot, and were already there in concealment behind the trees.

"One of the under-bailiffs he perceived standing in the shadow of the wood, engaged in re-loading his gun; the excited youth surmised that this must have been the man who had fired the fatal shot: and acting upon such a hasty and desperate conviction, almost before he was perceived by his own party, he pointed and discharged his gun at the unguarded bailiff. He saw his victim fall, but staid to see no more. Stricken with terror at the action, he turned and fled straightway from the spot. At this moment a whole posse of constables arrived, and the Rebeccaes fled in confusion, leaving the dead and dying on the ground,

'Friend and foe, in one red burial blent.'

"David had been seen and recognized, but before any one could seize him he was gone; escaped beyond their reach.

"Away he fled, through wood and tangled brake, with the hounds of fear following on his track; heedless of all obstacles, onward he went, he recked not whither—onward for his life!

"At daybreak he found himself in a bleak and rugged country, and he sat him down on the skirts of a wood to rest. As he sat the sun rose red and fiery from the east; clothed, as his excited fancy pictured, with frowns, like one who came to proclaim himself the avenger of the slain, and he remembered the doom of Cain the first murderer, and how he became a vagabond and a fugitive on earth, and carried with him the sign of his guiltiness engraved on his forehead.

"How changed it was with him, he thought! But yesterday—though not guiltless, or unstained by sin, he was yet free from the curse of any deadly crime; and now, at the dawn of another day, he sat, a conscience-stricken murderer—a wretch upon whose head any man might set a price!

"In his darkness, and remorse, and fear, he looked back upon his former life, and saw, or seemed to see, how that all that was black and base in it might have been otherwise, and he a free and happy man. He thought of his early youth, from childhood upward; of his early and growing love for Mary; of her beauty, goodness and purity. Ah, her goodness and purity! By the dread act of the past night, he had interposed a barrier between himself and her forever!

"Why had he not listened to her earnest pleading? She seemed to him to have been his good angel, who would and might have saved him had he not refused to hearken to her pleadings, and now she was lost to him forever.

"He recollected how at one time in his life he had suffered from fearful dreams, and how on awakening, quaking with terror, he had rejoiced to discover that they were only dreams. O, that he could now awaken and find that the horror of the past night was but a dream! But no. Too surely it was undeniable reality. He felt on his soul the weight of a damnable, inexpiable crime; the cry of the avenger of blood was in his ears, and that cry he felt would never be hushed until vengeance was accomplished!

"Still he must arise and strive to elude the pursuing steps of the avenger. So he arose and wandered on for many miles heavily, halting, aimless. So for days he wandered on, with the remorseless curse of Cain upon his brow. His ruddy cheek grew pale and ghastly; his black hair turned gray with dread; his step lost its lightness and vigor. So he rambled on, purposeless, aimless, shunning the habitations of his fellow-men; his sole companions the demons born of his own remorse.

"Days passed. How many he knew not; he had lost all sense of time. The sun rose and set, the nights and days came and were gone, all unheeded by him. A dull apathy came over him, and at last he grew utterly reckless and careless of life; still he would not, if he could avoid it, die by the hands of the executioners. Hunger often forced him to ask charity to support the life he cared not to sustain; but he only sought it of the poorest of the people; and these, even these, pitied his wretched aspect, and gave him of their store; and men shook their heads and sighed, and women wept with compassion as they marked his premature decay, and mothers pressed their infants to their bosoms, and uttered a prayer to Heaven, that their babe might die rather than it should ever become such as he.

"At last he came to a great city. It was Liverpool; but he cared not to know its name. He walked through the crowded streets, purposeless, aimless as before. All he saw was a confused diversity of faces, a vast multitude of human beings engaged in the pursuit of pleasure and of business; but he felt, with bitterness indescribable, that he had nothing in common with them.

"He roamed throughout the day from street to street, and at night, in rags and penniless, starving with hunger and cold, and fainting with weariness, he flung himself down on a doorstep, and all wretched as he was, sleep, which brings rest and relief to all, however wretched, came to him, and he slept heavily and—dreamless.

"It was here and thus the avenger found him. The rumor of a murder spreads quickly, and all the particulars of his case had reached the police stations some days before he arrived. He awoke suddenly, beneath the glare of a strong light. A policeman was standing over him, with the bull's-eye of his dark lantern turned full upon his face, comparing his features and garments with some printed descriptions he held in his hand.

"The desperate man sprang up and strove to run, but the stranger seized him, and summoning assistance, led him away to meet a charge which he knew there was no answering. Remorse-stricken, miserable, forsaken of God and man, there could be but one ending to this tragedy.

"In the course of one week he was identified, tried, found guilty and condemned. Then it was," interposed the curate, "that I heard of his capture and his doom, went to Liverpool, and remained with him till the day of his death, and I trust, as I have said before, that he died truly penitent, and in the full hope of a joyful resurrection.

"He asked for Mary, and prayed that she might remain in ignorance as to his fate. She was then, it was thought, dying, and he was so informed. 'She is young,' he said, 'to die. And I killed her, too, unwittingly. But there is hope that we may meet in heaven. Poor, dear Mary! Poor Mary!' These were his last words. He was hanged," added the narrator, "I fancied with some bitterness, for the commission of a crime perpetrated on the spur of the moment when his mind was astray with anguish as he witnessed the dying agonies of a beloved friend, and believed that he saw that friend's assassin—for the edification of society!

"A month elapsed, and Mary was restored to consciousness. Then it was that some foolish gossip told her all: of the reckless deed of violence; of her lover's flight; of his sufferings, his capture, his trial, his terrible death, and of the last words uttered by his lips.

"Again she became unconscious; a relapse occurred, and her life was again despaired of; still, she recovered, and to perfect health; but never to perfect sanity. Happily, perhaps for her, she has forgotten all save that her lover left her on that eventful night to return on the morrow. It seemed a merciful bereavement of memory, though it was painful to see her wandering for hours amongst the mountain passes, continually calling for David, and ever, as he came not at her call, going home under the delusion that he would surely come to-morrow. Her aged father fell ill and died; but the good Sir Watkin, who had heard the sad story, gave permission to the mother and daughter to occupy the cottage and farm, rent free, for life.

"After a while, poor Mary's monomania became less violent. Now, save on certain occasions, she goes about her dairy and farm work as if she had never known trouble or care. She remembers her childhood and girlhood, and what has occurred since her illness; but the interval between is a blank, all save that David has gone and will return to-morrow."

The good curate here concluded his narrative. I thanked him, expressed my sympathy for the unhappy young woman, and bidding him good day, returned to the farm-house.

Soon afterwards I quitted North Wales, and three years elapsed ere again I visited Dwggyenn Hill or the mountain passes of Plynlimmon. The good old curate had been gathered to his fathers, and a younger man occupied his place. Farmer Wynn still lived at Dwggyenn Hill, but poor Mary Morgan's long looked for morrow had come. Her death was melancholy, though, perhaps, painless. One bitter January night she had gone forth, as was her wont, to meet her lover. Her aged mother, who was now bed-ridden, waited in vain for her return. The morning came, and still she had not made her appearance. Then the neighbors were alarmed, and went forth to search for her. She was discovered in a clearing, cold and dead; the pure white snow a fitting bridal-robe, pure as her own young, blighted existence, lying unmelted on her bosom.

She was buried in the churchyard of Dwggyenn Hill, and over her lowly resting-place yearly bloom and blossom the snow-drops and the mountain-daisies, fair emblems of her own innocence and purity. And the spot where she lies is so calm and pleasant that one can scarcely imagine that it covers the remnant of so great a sorrow.

A HEAVY PER CENTAGE.

A somewhat verdant-looking individual called upon a jeweller in Montreal, and stated that he had managed to accumulate, by hard labor for the few past years, some seventy-five dollars; that he wished to invest it in something whereby he might make money a little faster; and that he had concluded to take some of his stock and peddle it out. The jeweller selected what he thought would sell readily, and the new pedler started on his first trip. He was gone but a few days, when he returned, bought as much again as before, and started on his second trip. Again he returned, and greatly increased his stock. He succeeded so well, and accumulated so fast, that the jeweller one day asked him what profit he obtained on what he sold. "Well, I put on 'bout five per cent." The jeweller thought that a very small profit, and expressed as much. "Well," said the pedler, "I don't know as I exactly understand about your per cent., but an article for which I pay you one dollar, I generally sell for five."

There is no greater sign of a mean and sordid man, than to dote upon riches; nor is anything more magnificent than to lay them out freely in acts of bounty and liberality.

THE AUTHORESS'S WIFE.

BY MRS. M. T. CALDOR.

"WHAT foolish creatures we are, even in our very wisdom," sighed my Aunt Letitia. "Fortunately for many of us, 'our very wishes give us not our wish.'" Saying which she wiped off a little mist from the clear disc of her spectacles, and turned again diligently to her undignified employment of renovating a basket of old stockings, just brought in from the ironing-table by Betty the housemaid.

It was a dismal, forlorn day, such as, despite the shade of Thomson, spring's "ethereal mildness" is exceedingly apt to bring. Scarcely a more deplorable scene could be imagined, than the view from the windows. Dark skeleton trees nodding forebodingly back to our discouraged gaze; dingy fences and slimy walls dripping with the raindrops, not in a generous, hearty shower, but slowly, miserably, downheartedly. Great pools of water, anything but transparent, set round with ridges of mud, and occasionally along the sheltered bank of withered, stalky, last year's grass, a patch of snow, its original purity long since among by-gone reminiscences. Over and around all wailed and moaned a complaining southeast wind.

Such was the view without; and after a shivering glance, we all—that is, my madcap sister Katy, my consequential, "almost-of-age," brother Harry, and your humble servant, dear reader, came back shivering to the grate, where Betty had heaped up the glowing anthracite into an invigorating, cheerful blaze, and sat down rather disconsolately—we girls with our work-baskets, and Harry took up for the fourth time the previous evening's Journal, to read, I suspect, the brilliant, spicy poetry, setting forth the enticing qualities of some Dock Square clothing dealer, as well as his wonderfully fitting garments, or to scan again the diversified accomplishments of that astonishing article "Liquid Glue." At length down went the paper, and up rose Master Harry with an impatient "pshaw!"

Katy looked up to his face inquiringly.

"Why," said he, "still another new book by a woman! How I should hate a woman who was forever dabbling with pen and ink! Heaven keep me clear of such!" And away he went to stretch himself out on the sofa with the air of a savant of the most profound wisdom.

Then it was that our Aunt Letitia, the beloved maiden aunt who had no single grim or old maidish sentiment in her whole cheerful, generous heart, uttered the foregoing remark. Our spirits rose at once, and Katy and I exclaimed simultaneously:

"O, Aunt Letitia, tell us about it!"

She looked at us with the placid satisfaction that betokened consent, while she asked:

"About what, you simple creatures?"

Katy pushed her ottoman close to the basket of stockings, and replied:

"O, aunty, you know well enough what a splendid story your tone told us of. And to-day is just the time to hear it, when we are all so cross and stupid with being obliged to lose our ride. Don't waste a minute, but begin."

She gave her own mellow, cheery laugh at this sally of impatience, and said: "Well, well, Katy, you wilful creature, but I want first to ask Harry why a woman should not write a book if she has the ability, and patronize the stationer as much as she can afford."

Harry was ready to reply. "You'll find plenty better answers in a dozen places than I can give. Everybody knows, when the mistress of a house is a blue stocking or Mrs. Jellyby, far-off Africa gets very much better taken care of than her own family—witness poor little Caddy and her brothers in 'Bleak House.'"

"Ah, well," said my aunt, looking leniently at Harry's bold, triumphant face over her spectacles, "you're like many others of your sex, Harry. I won't be as merciless as time will be in trampling down your theory. Listen to my story:

"Frederic Brownell cherished just such sentiments as yours, Harry, only his talk was a thousand times more extravagant. Indeed, his horror of literary women was so intense, that I have heard he was actually grieved when he received the first note from his beautiful betrothed Helen Armstrong, to find the chirography so dainty and exquisite, and the language so refined and intellectual.

"For mercy's sake, Helen, what are you doing?" he said, one day about a month after they were married, as he came in from the store and found his young wife cosily ensconced in the luxurious corner of the tete-a-tete, her fine dark eyes all aglow with enthusiasm, and a nameless light irradiating her whole face, while the same slender hand he had placed the wedding-ring upon, clasped a sheet of paper closely scribbled with suspiciously short lines, and the other held the pretty gold pencil-case he had given her.

"She started up in alarm at his hasty words, and looked around wildly to account for the utter horror his face betrayed. I was sitting with my worsted-work in the rocking-chair opposite the tete-a-tete, and for half an hour had been quietly watching the pretty picture she made, while the inspiration of her verse drifted in light or shade across her face. How vexed I was with him for his rude interruption, and the feeling deepened into indignation as he proceeded.

"What have you there, Helen? Is it possible you are writing poetry?"

"Comprehending his meaning now, Helen blushed the deepest crimson, and stammered:

"Why, Fred, I was only stringing a few rhymes while resting from my morning's work. A few thoughts came which I wished to catch while they were fresh. But what is the matter with you?"

"He was thoroughly vexed and could not hide it, eying the inoffensive paper on the carpet, as if he would gladly have trampled it under his feet.

"I never mistrusted such a thing!" he muttered.

Something more than surprise flushed Helen's cheek now, and I saw the tear swelling up to her eye, and quiver of the lip that said meekly, "I do not understand your meaning, Frederic. You seem offended at I scarcely know what. I wish you would speak plainly."

"Well, I will, dearest. How in the world you came to think of such a thing as writing poetry, is a mystery to me! But like a dear little wife you'll promise to give up the habit, won't you?"

"She looked thoroughly distressed and grieved, and thinking it was getting to be a domestic scene, scarcely fitted for the presence of a third party, I quietly gathered up my work, and was passing out, when Fred arrested me.

"Don't go, Miss Letitia—this isn't a quarrel, by any means. It's only fair I should explain my views to both of you. You see, dear Helen, I have a few peculiar notions, and one of them, the most decided of all, is a perfect horror of any literary attempts from a lady. I cannot find words powerful enough to express my abhorrence of a strong-minded woman. Such a one is as much out of place, as your pure-leaved camellia there, Helen, would look in a lawyer's dusty, smoky office, or as that heliotrope, so deliciously sweet here in the parlor, would be amid the coarse sights and sounds and smells in my store, among the West India goods. A woman is sweet and pure and lovely, the guiding, ministering angel of our home, but any attempts on her part at science, literature, or business, are ridiculous enough. Of course, I don't want an ignorant wife. I rejoice to have you enjoy books, and be capable of entering into refined conversation, but a writer, a blue—horrible! horrible! And now my little Helen knows why it frightened me to see her attempting rhymes. True, in poetry women have won fame, but it must always be at the expense of domestic happiness. No good wife can be an authoress."

"With which profound remark, this one of many arrogant, self-sufficient lords of creation concluded his speech, and looked around as if he had silenced forever any doubt in our minds. I did not speak, but his wife said quietly, although I detected the restless, troubled undercurrent beneath that calm, sweet tone:

"Thank you, Frederic; I am glad you have acquainted me with your sentiments. They are entirely new to me, but rest assured you shall never be disturbed by any further literary attempts from your wife."

"He kissed her fondly, patted her flushed cheek, and said, so patronizingly, I could have boxed his ears for indignation, 'there's my good little wife!' lit a cigar, and disappeared. As the door closed after him, Helen raised the paper from the floor, and carrying it to the grate, threw it upon the glowing bed of coals, standing to watch it crumble, then brighten into a fiery sheet, with every pencil stroke standing out vivid and distinct as if carved of ebony, finally blacken and fall away to dull, gray ashes. With a forced smile, far more melancholy to me than a burst of tears, she said:

"It was an ode to his birthday. Fortunately enough I have escaped the folly of presenting it."

"The tone betrayed how many bright hopes and joyful anticipations had fallen to ashes, as well as the luckless poem. I scarcely knew what to say, but she did not expect a reply, and was entirely absorbed with her heroic efforts at self-control and cheerfulness. She took out her work and began to sew furiously, but I saw how widely the needle sped of its mark, and how the fingers trembled that held it. Presently the work was laid aside, and her head drooped forward to the sofa-cushion, with the face averted from my gaze. But it needed no glance at the familiar features, for me to know Helen Brownell's heart. I saw how it was writhing beneath the humiliating, bitter discovery of the clay in the hero she had worshipped. I read the torturing agony of a proud heart and noble mind, compelled by the hand the best beloved, to submit to be treated like a pretty, petted child, instead of a sympathizing, noble-minded woman. And my indignation at this summary putting down of talents so superior to his own, almost made me dislike as well as despise her husband. A smothered, long-drawn sigh drew me to her side instantly. I laid my hand on her forehead, and whispered, 'It's a cruel shame, darling!'

"Ah, children, I was young then. I have since learned it will never do, no matter how great our sympathy or indignation, it will never do to hint a doubt of the kindness and tenderness of one to the other of a married couple. And this true, sweet wife resented even the implied reproach.

"No, no, Letitia, Frederic is not cruel—he does not mean to be. Never husband loved a wife better than I am loved. But he has caught the narrow-minded sentiments of some of his associates. I can soon convince him of his error."

"She lifted her head, as the rose suddenly rises up shaking off the shower that oppressed it, and smiled bravely.

"Yes, yes, I must find a way to open his eyes, without allowing him to suspect I am taking a physician's part. Not write! Why, Letitia, though I never touched a pen, how could I help thinking poetry? It is in my soul, and if it was not meant to be nourished and cultivated, why was it implanted there? Ah, I acknowledge it grieves me deeply to find my husband has no higher standard for the wife he has chosen to walk by his side on a life-long journey. I know—I feel it within me, that we women are capable of more than needlework and household duties—more even than encouraging the drooping hearts, or tending the beds of our sick kindred. Heaven knows I would have none of these common duties neglected, but I see not why a cultivated intellect, an aspiring genius, may not enliven these homely duties, making them more surely and cheerfully fulfilled. I am confident they can all be combined in one.' She rose to her feet, her face glowing with the inspired resolve. 'What did he say? Domestic happiness must be sacrificed to fame—no good wife could be an authoress? I will prove it false. He shall yet acknowledge the wrong he has done the sex!'

"Then came a flood of tears, deluging and cooling her burning cheeks, and when they were wiped away the storm had passed, and she was tranquil and serene again.

"Come and see us very often,' called out both my friend and her husband, as I left the house that evening. And so I did, keeping a friendly and most interested watch over the course of their domestic life.

"Fred Brownell was a kind, amiable, well-meaning man, but he was thoughtless and inconsiderate, and inclined to be exacting and overbearing in regard to his pet theories, while his wife was one of those delicate, sensitive temperaments, so keenly alive to every implied reproach, or latent slight. Such opposing qualities must certainly have caused misunderstanding, alienation, and possibly open warfare and misery, but for the quick intellect and firm, self-reliant will, that rendered Helen so superior to many jealous, unhappy, irritated wives, with just such sensitiveness as hers. Yet they were very happy, even though the business panic affected Frederic's trade likewise, and rendered it necessary that the expenses of the household should be closely attended to. And what a model house it was! So neat and clean and cheerful, amid its unpretending elegance. No one could help echoing Fred's own proud declaration that there was not another such genteel and capable little housekeeper in town.

"It's all owing,' said he, laughing, to me, 'to that wee bit of a lecture I gave her so early after our marriage. Such a splendid little economist she is without any one's mistrusting it. Why, Letitia, it is perfectly wonderful how she makes a tiny sum of money hold out for a dozen wants.' A twinkle in Helen's eye made me think, just then, that perhaps the pen and inkstand locked up so carefully in the secretaire, might have a word to say about compound interest, or at least partial payments. 'Yes, yes,' he continued, 'you see I have proved right. Now just imagine how it might have been. Fancy the house littered from one end to the other, with scraps of paper, rolls of manuscript, and everything, from the table-linen to Helen's rosy fingers, bespattered with stains of ink. And at dinner, you and I, while vainly endeavoring to swallow indigestible bread and uncooked pudding, might be regaled with scraps of original poetry or plots of new dramas. Horrible, horrible!'

"He laughed, and so did I, and so did Helen, longest and heartiest of either, and the moment he left us, she came dancing up to me holding aloft the dainty fore-finger, on whose fairness rested a tiny black stain.

"Only look, Letitia, at this guilty proof of my disobedience. All the time he was talking there was that atrocious blot of ink on my finger. I tried my best, but could not erase it, any more than Mrs. Bluebeard could cleanse the fatal key.'

"Another time, two years after this last visit, while I was with Helen, Fred came home with a new book just then exciting attention, with the favorable criticisms of which all the papers had been filled.

"There, Helen,' he said, tossing it over to her side, 'there's something worth reading, I can tell you. The man who wrote it may well be proud. And judging from the number of editions, he has a snug little sum for the bank.'

"I supposed the author was unknown,' said I. 'Why do you say a man? Perhaps it is a lady who has been so fortunate.'

"His lip curled a little. 'You don't suppose a woman wrote a book like that, do you?' and peremptorily dismissed the subject.

"I did not care myself to pursue it further, for I had caught a sudden flash shimmering through Helen's drooping lashes, and was overwhelmed with the new revelation that broke upon me.

"It was not so cheerful a scene, when next I visited the house. Helen's colorless cheeks lay against the scarcely whiter pillow, and from the coverlet, beside her, peeped up a dark, downy little head. She received my congratulations absently, and despatching the nurse from the chamber, turned eagerly to say:

"Dear Letitia, I am so glad to see you! You are the very friend I need. Something is amiss with Frederic. His cheek is pale, and his manner embarrassed and distressed, and every time he looks at the precious little one, his eye fills with tears. Will you go to him and find out what it is? He tries to hide it from me, but it is far more injurious to lie here, and worry, worry, all the time, surmising a state of affairs, a great deal worse, I dare say, than the truth. Go, dear Letitia, and win his confidence. If it is business trouble, as I suspect, hasten to tell me."

"It was evident the uncertainty kept her very restless and nervous, so the moment Frederic came into the house I hastened to meet him. I did not wonder his wife was anxious, when I saw his haggard face and feverish eye. I explained my errand at once. He looked distressed and annoyed."

"Poor child, why will she seek to share a man's troubles? I have tried to keep it from her, lest it should injure her in her present delicate health. The fact is, Letitia, I am ruined!"

"He jerked the word out, bitterly, wrathfully, as if injured through his own conscious innocence."

"Not even the house here, can I call my own. I am not sure the unfeeling creditors will leave a bed for that helpless darling and her babe to lie upon. God help her!"

"He stopped suddenly. The veins across his forehead knit themselves like cords. The pent emotion so long smothered down came surging up, and with a deep groan, he covered his face, and burst into a passion of tears."

"Poor Helen! sweet, delicate, helpless darling, with her little babe. It is for her sake I grieve. What will become of her!" he groaned, again.

"I saw he was sincere. The privations he dreaded for her wrung his heart more than his own loss or humiliation. At that moment of his deep distress, I forgave him all his injustice towards his noble, gifted wife, for the sake of his true and abundant love."

"I tried my best to soothe and comfort him, and at length he grew more calm."

"You must use your own judgment," he said, 'about telling her. I confess I am almost afraid. Perhaps it will be best to consult the doctor.'

"We did so, and kind Dr. W. decided when I whispered I did not imagine the announcement would cause any distress, that it was wisest to gratify her."

"I was not disappointed. A radiant smile illuminated her face, the moment she was acquainted with her husband's loss of wealth."

"Now, Letitia," she cried, 'is the hour I have waited for so long! Now is my hour of triumph!'

"Nurse," continued she, authoritatively, 'I want you to raise me up with the pillows, and bring the prettiest wrapper from the closet. There's a dressing cap, too, in the drawer, Letitia. I want you to dress me for company,' laughing a low, sweet laugh."

"The nurse remonstrated, but she was peremptory, and we saw plainly contradiction was far more injurious than indulgence. So the pale, pink wrapper was folded around the slender waist, and the dark, glossy hair put back beneath the pretty cap, a fanciful but most becoming mixture of airy lace, gossamer bows, and velvet bands."

"How surpassingly lovely she looked in the becoming costume, the rich hue of her wrapper, and the soft, pink flush on her cheek, setting off so charmingly the shining dark eyes, and extreme fairness and delicacy of complexion."

"Now," said she, with a sigh of satisfaction, 'baby must have his embroidered blanket, and then call Frederic in.'

"We obeyed. The husband came in slowly and dejectedly; we saw how he dreaded the meeting. The doctor, the nurse, and I, quiet spectators of the scene, at her earnest request. As his eyes rested on the pretty picture, he smiled fondly, and a deeper gloom settled down upon his face. She took his hand tenderly in hers, and looked up, with fondness into his face."

"Frederic," said she, 'have I been a careless and negligent wife?'

"He looked up in surprise and reproach."

"What a question for you to ask me, my Helen."

"Answer me, my husband, yes, or no."

"No, my blessed wife, I have not deserved one half your goodness."

"Has your house or your clothes suffered for want of my care?"

"Pained and grieved, he replied, 'I do not understand your meaning. There has been no chance for complaint, Helen. Who has dared insinuate such a thing?'"

"Her face was gloriously beautiful, the silvery voice thrilling with tenderness and exultation."

"And yet, Frederic, I have dabbled with pen and ink. I have been so lost and misguided as to become an authoress. But since it has not been, as you predicted, at the expense of home comfort or affection, will you not forgive me? At any rate let these plead for me." And she passed the bank books, I had placed at her request upon the pillow, in his trembling hand.

"The bewildered husband opened the books mechanically, saw the name and sums written therein to his wife's account, not in hundreds, but in thousands, and ejaculated: 'Good heavens, Helen! What does this mean?'"

"Nothing, dear Fred, only you are not yet ruined in business if you are in character, by having an authoress for a wife. You remember the book you assured us was written by a man. O, Fred, to think how you praised a woman's literary efforts, then, and that woman of all others—your wife." Her clear laugh was delicious!

"Well," said Aunt Letitia, "perhaps some one will see you, Harry, just as humiliated and crest-fallen, and as delighted to be so, as was Frederic Brownell."

"What a splendid story, Aunt Letitia," cried Katy, "And such a grand denouement."

"Hush, hush," said my aunt, softly, wiping away a flood of tears that came dripping down her cheek. "We laid her back, so beautiful and happy, and bade her be quiet and sleep. While Fred, touchingly penitent and grateful, took the baby in his arms, a better and wiser man, and sat down in the rocking chair, gazing thoughtfully upon its tiny features. We remained very quiet for nearly an hour, when suddenly Helen called out, in a sharp, unnatural voice:

"What is that roaring? How dark and cold it is. Fred, Letitia, where are you?"

"We saw the white arms thrown up wildly, and sprang to the bedside. But it was too late. Helen was dead! Ah, children, too much joy is death for some."

A WELL-MADE HUNCHBACK.—They tell a story of a preacher, who, descending from the pulpit after preaching a sermon in which he had affirmed that everything God had made was well made, was apostrophised by a cripple, who maliciously asked him whether he thought his assertion would hold good, as a general rule. "By the way, Mr. Parson, do you think I am well made?" "Well, yes, my good friend, I consider you are very well made—for a hunchback," was the prompt reply of the clergyman.

A CEYLON JUGGLER.

As this was one of the idle seasons of the year, during which labor is suspended while waiting for the rain of the monsoon, ere recommencing the sowing of rice, the Kandyans were lounging about their villages, or gathered in groups by the roadside, engaged in listless and sedentary amusements. In one place a crowd was collected to watch the feats of a juggler, who, to our surprise, commenced his performance by jumping up on to a pole, and placing his feet upon a cross bar six feet from the ground. On this he coursed along by prodigious leaps, and returning to the audience, seated himself on his perch, and then opened his exhibition. This consisted of endless efforts of legerdemain: catching pebbles from his confederate below, which, upon opening his closed hand, flew away as birds; breaking an egg shell and allowing a small serpent to escape from it; and keeping a series of brass balls in motion by striking them with his elbows as well as his hands. Balancing on his nose a small stick with an inverted cup at top, from which twelve perforated balls were suspended by silken cords, he placed twelve ivory rods in his mouth and so guided them by his lips and tongue as to insert the end of each in a corresponding aperture in the ball, till the whole twelve were sustained by the rods, and the central support taken away.

This, and endless other tricks he performed, balancing himself all the while on the single pole on which he stood. He took a ball of granite, six or seven inches in diameter, and probably fourteen pounds weight, and standing with his arms extended in line, he rolled it from the wrist of one hand across his shoulders to the wrist of the other, backward and forward repeatedly, apparently less by raising his arms than by a vigorous effort of the muscles of the back; then seizing it in both hands he flung it repeatedly twenty feet high, and watching it in its descent till within a few inches of his skull, he bent forward his head, and caught the ball each time between his shoulders; then bounding along the road, still mounted on his pole, he closed his performance amid the smiles of the audience.—From Sir. J. Emerson Tennent's Ceylon.

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

The Springfield Republican talks in this wise: "Where there's a will, there's a way," says the maxim, but the maxim lies. There's a will in all men to get rich, but there is not a way for a fifth to a fiftieth part of them to do so. 'God helps those who help themselves'—sometimes. It depends a good deal upon what a man is trying to help himself to, and whether it is, on the whole, desirable that he should be helped. 'I'll try' has been doing journey-work in infant schools and Sunday schools till the poor little girls and boys have supposed that there was a magic in it which would ultimately introduce them to a glory equal to that of Whittington, Lord Mayor of London. The trouble is that it is the weakest head that takes the most encouragement from these maxims and proverbs, and is most acted upon and influenced by them. A boy with brains is never troubled by these things."

THE FORTUNE-TELLER.

"Hark, my maiden, and I'll tell you
By the power of my art,
All the things that e'er befel you,
And the secret of your heart.

"How that you love some one,—don't you?
Love him better than you say;
Wont you hear, my maiden, wont you?
What's to be your wedding-day?"

"Ah, you cheat, with words of honey,
You tell stories, that you know!
Where's the husband for my money
That I gave you long ago?

"Neither silver, gold, or copper
Shall you get this time from me;
Where's the husband, tall and proper,
That you told me I should see?"

"Coming still, my maiden, coming.
With two eyes as black as sloes;
Marching soldierly, and humming
Gallant love-songs as he goes."

"Get along, you stupid gipseey!
I wont have your barrack-beau;
Strutting up to me half tipsy,
Saucy—with his chin up—so!"

"Come, I'll tell you the first letter
Of your handsome sailor's name"—
"I know every one, that's better,
Thank you, gipseey, all the same."

"Ha, my maiden, runs your text so?
Now I see the die is cast;
And the day is—Monday next." "No, Gipseey, it was—Monday last!"

 "DREAMING."

BY B. FRANKLIN HOOKER.

One night as I was sitting
 In my chamber dark:
 The fire was faintly flitting
 An uncertain light;
 Soon I fell to dreaming—
 Dreaming of the past:
 Of the many pleased
 In my childhood east.

Dreaming of my playmates,
 And the pretty dell
 On the old estates,
 Where our parents used to dwell;
 And of the pranks we played
 Upon our parents kind,
 But now they all are laid
 Beneath the grassy vale.

As I sat there dreaming
 By the smouldering fire,
 My brain with thoughts was teeming
 With memories of the past.
 And as I still kept thinking,
 I gazed into the fire;
 The embers, faint and dying,
 Spoke the word, retire!

LEND ME FIVE POUNDS!

BY WALTER CLARENCE.

THE Rector of Chirley in N—shire, England, was one of those fortunate individuals who, being blessed with moderate desires and ambitions, was the happy possessor of everything that could render life agreeable. He was not past middle age; he possessed a handsome, portly person, a pleasant set of features, a beautiful and amiable wife whom he dearly loved, and by whom he was loved dearly in return, two lovely children—a son and a daughter—and a good living of fifteen hundred pounds a year in a delightfully romantic part of the country, of which no one, not even the bishop of his diocese, could deprive him, so long as his conduct did not do outrage to his sacred calling—a thing not very likely to occur with a man of the Reverend Charles Markham's character and temperament. For, though he was remembered by his classmates to have been a wild lad at "Harrow," and was spoken of by his fellow-colleagues as having been by no means remarkable for his hard reading at Baliol College, Oxford University, and as having been fonder of his dog and his gun than of the duties pertaining to the midnight lamp, he was now regarded with esteem and reverence by his parishioners; and his only uncanonical habit and delight—if, indeed, it may truly be termed uncanonical—was, that he still adhered to his college liking for a glass of generous wine, taken in moderation, and was never happier than when, as he was in the habit of doing once or twice a week, he was enjoying his wine and his long clay pipe (he was above the snobbishness of cigars) with the lord of the manor, the squire, the village doctor, and occasionally a neighboring clergyman, together with his own curate, who—to do the worthy rector justice—was always invited on these innocent festive occasions.

I knew the Reverend Charles Markham when I was a boy, and seldom failed to spend a few days at the rectory on the occasions of my return—at periods long distant—from my sea voyages. I recollect it was always a matter of wonder with those who had known Charles Markham in youth and early manhood, by what means he, possessed of no family influence and no superabundance of money and no extraordinary talents, came to be inducted into a living which many a wealthy country gentleman, or even many a titled personage, would have been glad to have secured for a younger son.

To be sure, Charles Markham had been at Harrow—one of those great public schools at which, generally speaking, the sons of the nobility and gentry only can obtain admittance, on account of the expenses attending a boy's education there—and he had subsequently taken the degree of A. M. at Oxford; but it was known that he had been at Harrow, as it were, on suffrage, and that some time before he quitted Oxford to accept a small curacy of fifty pounds a year, he had become very poor.

The father of Charles Markham had made a moderate competency in the hosiery business, and retiring, had been seized with the mania of making his only son a gentleman. Though it cost him nearly half his income annually, he resolved to send the boy to Harrow, and to afford him such an allowance of pocket money as should place him, in that respect, on a par with the sons of the wealthiest; and though the lad's humble birth was somewhat against him in that assemblage of high-born youths, his spirit and good temper, together with his generous expenditure of money, and his readiness to oblige those of his school-fellows who, if his superiors in station, were his inferiors in wealth, had made him a favorite. The like generosity on the part of his father enabled young Markham to pass through his first three years at Oxford with éclat, amongst the aristocratic young men there assembled; but at the end of the third year, old

Mr. Markham lost nearly the whole of his property through some unfortunate speculation, and dying with old age and grief, left his son, with no rich uncle or aunt to look to for assistance, to fight his way through the world as best he could.

Of course the son of the bosier was cut by his aristocratic companions, as soon as it was discovered that he no longer had the means to compete with them in their extravagant expenditure; but Charles Markham, instead of foolishly taking this sad reverse of fortune to heart, united himself with the graver and, generally, humbler class of reading men, and set himself to work to fit himself for a college "fellowship," or, that failing, a humble curacy.

With what many persons called foolish precipitancy, the young man very soon rendered himself ineligible for a "fellowship" by falling in love with, and marrying the pretty daughter of a farmer in the vicinity of Oxford; and as after taking to himself a wife, it was absolutely necessary to do something to maintain her, he was very thankful, shortly after, to accept the curacy already alluded to, which was offered him by the father of a young man who had still regarded him with some degree of friendship, when the rest of his college chums had forsaken him.

To the curacy the now Reverend Charles Markham retired with his pretty young wife; and all who knew him supposed that he would remain a plain curate for the rest of his days. Consequently everybody was taken by surprise when, some five years after, the announcement was made in the clerical record that the Reverend Charles Markham, late curate of St. Mary's in Chelsea, near London, had been presented with the rich incumbency of Chirley, N——shire, the income attached to which amounted to fifteen hundred pounds per annum!

On the occasion of one of my visits, by some chance the conversation, one evening when the squire and the lord of the manor and other of the reverend gentleman's friends were present, turned upon the chances which sometimes lead to fortune, and a gentleman present remarked that oftentimes that which at one time appeared to be the very bane of a man's existence, turned out to be a stepping-stone to fortune.

Mr. Markham had listened to the conversation without taking part in it. Presently, however, he laid down his pipe, and giving a preliminary "ahem!" thus commenced:

"Gentlemen, I know that it has been a subject of wonder to many of those whom I now esteem as my friends, how I, the son of a tradesman, without family influence—and through the unfortunate failure and decease of my poor father, in the later years of my youth left without money—came into the possession of a living which I know the Earl of M——, whose estate lies in the adjoining parish, had expressed himself desirous of securing for one of his own younger sons. I have hitherto never mentioned the circumstances which led to my advancement to any one beyond the members of my own family; I will, however, now relate them to you, and you shall judge for yourselves how much or how little I am indebted to chance or fortune for my extraordinary success—for I acknowledge that I desire no loftier position than that I now hold, nor no greater share of this world's goods. Thousands whose prospects were far superior to mine, would be glad to be as I am to-day. But before I begin, gentlemen, fill your glasses! This claret wine you will find excellent. It is a present from the earl, and is of a rare vintage."

The glasses and in some instances the pipes were re-filled, and the Reverend Charles Markham thus continued:

"At the time of my father's decease, I was on the point of marrying my present wife. My father's death caused a postponement, and, as many thought, rendered it very improbable that I should marry for years to come, since, as many of you are aware, I was left almost without a penny in the world; but Susan and I loved each other, and a kind friend having offered to procure me a curacy of fifty pounds a year, near London, I eagerly accepted the offer and married—as everybody said, foolishly. However, at the end of a year, my wife's father died, leaving her a small property which, having been invested in the three and a half per cent. consols, brought us the very comfortable addition of one hundred and fifty pounds a year. We thought ourselves rich; and, happy in each other's society, were content to pass through life without burthening ourselves with ambitious desires for that which seemed to us unattainable. But Providence always sends some trouble to vex us, in order that we may not become too much wrapped up in ourselves, to the injury of our spiritual welfare.

"When I was a boy, I recollect that an old gentleman, who was always attired in a snuff-colored coat of antique cut, knee breeches of the same color, and worsted stockings, who wore buckles on his shoes, and an old three-cornered cocked hat set upon a rusty scratch wig, was a frequent and I fancy not a very welcome visitor at my father's house. He was an odd-looking little man, with a sharp, pinched-up face, and he appeared to make the same suit of threadbare though decent clothing last him forever, for his clothes never looked better nor worse. I have a faint recollection that he was perpetually wanting to borrow money in small sums, and that he usually succeeded, much against my father's will, in obtaining what he wanted, or at least in obtaining some money, for which he was particular in writing out formal acknowledgments, the which, as soon as his back was turned, my father with a smile, half of vexation, half of pity, used to tear to pieces and throw into the fire. He always patted my head, said I was a fine lad, and would be sure to get on in the world, and asked me many questions relative to my studies. Who or what he was, or how old he was, I did not know; but if I recollect right, he professed to have known my father when he was a boy. So he must have been pretty well advanced in years, for my father was not a young man when he married my mother.

"After I went to Oxford, I saw no more of the old gentleman, and had almost forgotten his existence, when one day, soon after my wife had received her father's legacy, our maid-of-all-work entered my study, as I sat writing and compiling the three sermons I had to preach the next day (for my rector, who enjoyed a living of seven hundred pounds per annum, made me do all the work for fifty pounds), and informed me that a gentleman wished to see me.

"Show him in, Hannah!" said I, thinking that it was the church-warden, who was accustomed to call on parish business occasionally.

"In a few moments who should enter, to my great astonishment, but the identical old gentleman of my boyhood's recollection, clad, as it appeared to me, in the self-same threadbare snuff-colored garments and three-cornered cocked hat, knee-smalls, shoe-buckles, scratch-wig and all, that he had been wont to wear, and appearing to me not a day older than he had appeared at least twelve years before! To my great astonishment, did I say? to my amazement! His appearance confounded me—shocked me! Had it been midnight, I should have thought that he had stepped forth from the grave, where I believed he had long ago been laid; but there he stood, palpably, materially, in propria personae, before me—a living man, with now every well-remembered wrinkle just as I had seen them in my father's house.

"I rose from my chair, but was for some moments too confused to speak. He was the first to break the silence.

"My dear sir," said he, advancing and seizing me by a button of my dressing-gown, 'this is indeed a pleasure, a happiness long eagerly sought for, until I almost despaired of its accomplishment; but'—and he drew back and surveyed me from head to foot with an expression of amazement—'how you have grown! Why, I recollect you when you was no higher than the table; ay, and I recollect your poor dear respected father, too, when he was not more than so high!' holding his hand some four feet from the floor. 'Ah,' he continued, with a sigh, 'what a wonderful thing is memory! A kind gentleman was your father—my late respected friend. He did me many kindnesses. I shall always remember him in my prayers—yes, in my prayers—and, God bless me!' holding me at arm's length, 'how much you resemble him! You are just like what he was at your age—only, perhaps, not quite so handsome a man! You will excuse me for saying that, I know. Ah, Mr. Markham, my old and respected friend, was a fine man—but people sadly degenerate—yes, sadly! Still you do put me in mind of your dear father.'

"By this time I had sufficiently recovered from the shock his sudden appearance had given me, to speak. Of course I expressed my pleasure at seeing him, said I perfectly recollected him, and begged him to be seated. At the same time, I intimated that I had forgotten his name. I don't know that I had ever heard it.

"Warlock!" said the old gentleman; "Joshua Warlock. Dear me! can it be possible that you have forgotten the name of your late father's best friend, who knew him when he was a boy only so—"

"I put a stop to the repetition that I foresaw was coming, by pretending that I now recollected the name perfectly well.

"Ah, I knew you would!" he said. 'I knew you couldn't have forgotten old Joshua, as your respected parent was wont jocularly to call me. Yes, he was fond of a joke—very fond—was my dear old friend Markham. You must often have heard him speak of my large property in the North and in the West Indies?'

"A sudden thought crossed my mind.

"Ah, yes!" said I. 'That accounts for your long absence. You have been in the West Indies since my father's death?'

"O, no—never was there in my life! The property I speak of belonged to my great grandfather, Warburton Warlock! It was given to him by the premier of the First George as an acknowledgment of some great political service rendered to the government. He might have been Sir Warburton Warlock, baronet; but he preferred a grant in the island of Jamaica, and a large grant of money with which he purchased the estate in N—shire.'

" 'I congratulate you, Mr. Warlock,' said I, with some surprise. 'I was not aware that you were so wealthy a man. You see me a poor curate.'

" 'Yes,' he rejoined; 'but if I have not been misinformed, your amiable wife has succeeded to a property of one hundred and fifty pounds per annum. That, with the profits of your curacy, amounts to two hundred pounds per annum—quite a respectable income!'

" 'Enough,' I replied, 'to maintain us, with care and economy; but a mere nothing to a gentleman who possesses an estate in the North of England, and large West India property.'

" 'Just like your father!' said the old gentleman. 'He was very fond of a joke, as I have said. You are pleased to be facetious. Ah, a very facetious gentleman was my dear friend, Mr. Markham! He often joked me upon my West India property.'

" 'A jest, Mr. Warlock,' said I, 'that you I presume was very willing to take, though it was scarcely civil from a simple tradesman like my father.'

" 'Your father was a kind-hearted man, who had a salve for all his jests,' continued the old gentleman. 'He knew, and felt for my poverty.'

" 'Your poverty, with the property you have alluded to?' I cried, in some surprise at this remark.

" 'To tell the truth I began to think the old man was a little touched in the brain.'

" 'Can it be possible,' he resumed, 'that you have forgotten the case of Warlock vs. Burbage? My dear young man, the property has been in dispute since my great-grandfather's death. In chancery—O, that tiresome chancery! But I have hopes—yes—I have hopes. It is not, it has not been forgotten. It comes up from time to time. No less than nine lord chancellors have at various periods during the last century given their special attention to it, and I have every reason to believe that the suit will terminate shortly in my favor. Every reason! The Tomkinsons and the Boraxes, and the Ewbanks, who profess to be the descendants of the defunct Burbages, will eventually be flooded; yes, my dear young man, flooded! I say it emphatically, flooded!' and he struck his shrivelled fist a heavy blow upon the table, 'and I shall regain possession of my great grandfather's immense wealth.'

" 'It was half an hour past my dinner hour. Hannah had been once to inform me that dinner was ready, and twice my wife had gently opened my study door, and made me a private signal.

I had alluded to it—said that I was deeply engaged upon my sermons, and had looked repeatedly at my watch. Still the old gentleman would not take the hint, and as an old friend of my father's, and one whom I had known in boyhood, I could not avoid, at length, asking him to take dinner with us, or lose all chance of getting any myself. Still, I knew that it was Saturday, and in our economical household, we could not afford a fresh joint every day. On Saturdays, especially, we had always a makeshift dinner, made up of the cold meat of the day or two previous, hashed or stewed, and I knew that my wife would not like the presence of a stranger on such an occasion.

" 'However, I had no help for it, and the old gentleman consented with joyful alacrity. Poor old fellow, I believe he had called with that object in view.'

" 'As I suspected, my wife was ill pleased. She frowned, and spoke to me in a sharp whisper. It was the first, and almost the last time that ever we had a difference; but if I had had any idea of claiming the Dunmow flitch of bacon, certain it is that old Joshua Warlock would that day have put a bar to my obtaining it.'

" 'He lingered long after dinner, and, at length, when I was almost compelled to hint to him that it was time that he should take his departure, he called me aside, saying that he had a word for my private ear. I recollected what I had seen at my father's house, and guessed what was coming. However, I reconducted him to my study. He led me aside, behind the curtain, and stood on tiptoe as he whispered in my ear:

" 'Could you—could you—lend me a five pound note—till—till—the case is settled? I will be sure to repay it—with—with all the little sums—of which I have kept, I assure you, a most correct account—that at different times I have borrowed from your late lamented father.'

" 'Really, Mr. Warlock,' said I, 'I cannot. With my small income it is impossible.'

" 'Ah, my dear Mr. Markham,' cried he, with a comical whine, 'that is not what your respected father would have said. He would not have refused me.'

" 'My father, Mr. Warlock,' I rejoined, 'was better acquainted with you than I am; besides he, at the time you speak of, was a comparatively wealthy man.'

" 'All I could say, however, was of no use; beside, I really pitied the poor old fellow, and at last, for old acquaintance sake, I let him have the five pounds he asked of me.'

" 'He insisted upon writing an acknowledgment in an expressly legal form. I could not help smiling, when I bethought me of the acknowledgments he used to write for my father, and the disposal he made of them. In this respect, when the old gentleman had at length taken his departure, I followed my father's example, and threw the acknowledgment into the fire, after which I returned to my studies, not a little put out at the idea of having been so foolishly wheedled out of my money.

"From that day I was continually bored with the old gentleman's presence, and as continually he asked for the loan of money, sometimes coming down in his demands to a few shillings, but always managing to obtain some trifling loan, for which he always insisted in writing his acknowledgment.

"If I told my servant to say I was busy, he would wait till I was at leisure. If out, till I returned. See me he would, if he had to wait for hours. When disappointed of seeing me in the house, he would come to the church on Sunday and seat himself right under the pulpit, often on the pulpit stairs, ready to waylay me when I came down, before the whole congregation, and seriously discomposing me while preaching or reading prayers, for I knew what was coming; besides, I began to fear that my congregation would suspect that he was a bailiff, dunning me for some debt I owed. I often saw them whispering in each others' ears when he made his appearance in the church.

"He never but once again asked for so large a sum as five pounds; but the money he obtained, in sovereigns and crowns, and half crowns, and even shillings, must have amounted to a very considerable sum. How much I knew not, for I never kept an account, nor his acknowledgments.

"He would bore me all sorts of ways, always introducing his subject with his acquaintanceship with me when a boy, and with my father, when he was so high; and then he would ask me to listen to a long rigmarole respecting the suit in chancery, leaving all manner of musty, yellow, closely-written parchments for my perusal, to amuse me in my leisure hours, forsooth!

"The second occasion on which he asked for the loan of five pounds came about as follows: He had been absent a whole month. God forgive me! I hoped I had lost sight of him forever. I thought he was dead. It was Saturday, his usual day of calling. I heard the door-bell ring, something told me it was my 'bore,' my 'Monsieur Tonson' come again, and it was he. I heard the girl hastening to announce him, but he outstripped her, and without even knocking, entered the study.

"How do you do, my dear sir? How do you do?' he exclaimed. Evidently he was unusually excited. 'But I need not ask,' he continued, 'for you look charmingly; so like your respected father. I declare, you are growing stout. Your father was inclined to corpulency. Poor soul, he was a good creature—so generous, so free, so kind!'

"Perhaps, Mr. Warlock,' I interposed, 'he was too generous for his own good.'

"Ah, he was indeed, as you say, too generous, too liberal. Forgive this tear to his memory. Ah, my dear sir, you grow strangely like him; you do, indeed.'

"Well, well, Mr. Warlock,' said I, somewhat sharply—I knew what all this preceded.

"Just what your dear father would say, sometimes. You have just his assumed irritability—merely assumed to cover his generous actions; but I know what you mean. You are hurried, and you wish me to proceed to business?'

"Really, Mr. Warlock, I have no time—'

"Not five minutes, my good friend, I will not detain you five minutes. I'll sit here. Thank you. No nearer the fire. O, no, not a foot.'

"Mr. Warlock,' said I, out of all patience, 'you see that I am busy, and I have an appointment—'

"Pray pardon me, not a word, make no excuses. You have heard me speak of the chancery suit?'

"Heaven knows I had, too often! He continued:

"Dear me, how like your frown of impatience is to your late father's! Well, Ewbank is at it again; but at the next session he is sure to be floored—I could see it in the lord chancellor's countenance. There is a petition on the part of the infant Jowler, the third and only surviving child of Ewbank's elder brother; but he is a lunatic, and so was his father, and Nancy Higgins, who was Ewbank's nurse before old Jowler—'

"Good Heavens, Mr. Warlock,' I exclaimed, 'you will drive me mad.'

"He did not heed me, and proceeded:

"Before old Jowler cut his throat— Now if this is refused, as it assuredly will be, I shall immediately come into—'

"Mr. Warlock, I really cannot at the present moment—'

"Of course not, until you have read the petition. I have a duplicate. It covers ten sheets of parchment crossed. I will read it to you, and then the analogy will be quite clear—'

"I didn't mean—'

"Certainly not; you would not be so pre-capitate, I know; but besides the petition, I have a letter in the handwriting of the testators dated in the third year of the reign of George the Second, which—“‘Gracious, I shall go mad!’

“‘Rather I shall, with delight; but I know your kind sympathy. Now listen—’

“‘Mr. Warlock, I must insist, I cannot hear it now.’

“‘Well, if you think it will overcome you I will leave it, and you shall peruse it at your leisure. You will find it exceedingly interesting. When shall I call for it? Monday? No, not Monday; that will hardly give you time. Say Tuesday, at twelve o’clock? Good. On Tuesday, at twelve I will call.’

“‘Very well,’ said I, glad to get quit of him any way, and inwardly resolving that he should never be admitted into my house again.

“‘He laid the petition and the letter upon the table, and resumed his old battered hat.

“‘Good morning, Mr. Warlock. Forever,’ I muttered to myself.

“‘One moment, my dear friend. You will pardon me, I know you will; but on this pressing occasion—I hope the last time—may I venture to ask—I’ll write an acknowledgment—for the loan of five pounds?’

“‘No,’ I said, sternly.

“‘No,’ he repeated, mildly. ‘Ah, your good father would not have refused me. He was indeed a friend. I knew him when he was so high.’

“‘Mr. Warlock, I cannot, I will not—’

“‘Two pounds ten, then. Let me write two pounds ten? No! Ah, the world is not what it used to be. There is less kindness, less generosity. One pound ten? You will not refuse me, for the sake of the past? Say a sovereign. You will not? Ten shillings, then. Yes? Thank you, you are very kind. God bless you, my dear sir. How like your father—so open-hearted, so generous and liberal! Read the documents. On Tuesday at twelve o’clock, I will return for them. God bless you!’

“‘He was gone. I rang the bell. The servant appeared.

“‘Hannah,’ said I, ‘when Mr. Warlock calls for these papers, hand them to him; but on no account admit him. Shut the door in his face—slam it. Mind, if he gets into the house again, you lose your place immediately.’

“‘Hannah promised to keep him out if I said so. She always thought him a beggar, and hated the sight of him.

“‘He came on the Tuesday, punctual to his appointment. I heard the altercation at the door, and laughed in my sleeve. Hannah was talking to him through the keyhole, afraid to open the door, and at last she handed the papers through the window. He begged very hard to see me, but Hannah was firm, and at last he went away.

“‘After that he came repeatedly; but the door was never opened to him, and I gave directions to the doorkeeper not to admit him to the church, saying that he was a lunatic, and that I feared he would create annoyance. I heard that he often came to the church door, but went away meekly on being requested so to do, expressing his regret.

“‘Once he kept me prisoner for hours by taking his seat on the steps of my house, and I was thinking of sending for a constable to carry him away; but my heart smote me, and at length he left of his own accord.

“‘It seemed now as if I had wearied him out. Two months elapsed, and he was not seen or heard of. He was, I thought, dead, or in the lunatic asylum, or had gone to some distant part of the city. I blessed my stars that, at last, I had got quit of him.

“‘Alas, I had reckoned without my host. One day business called me to the west end of the metropolis. I was walking along Bond Street, when I heard my name called in his cracked but well-known voice. Without glancing toward him, I hailed an omnibus, sprang in, and the driver drove on. Unfortunately, omnibuses make frequent stops for passengers. The driver waited a long time for some ladies, at the corner of a street, and after the ladies, in stepped my persecutor. I was near the door. He did not see me; but passed to the far end, where alone there was a seat. I observed that he wore the same old-fashioned suit; but somewhat cleaner and fresher. He had had his clothing renovated. Presently he saw me, nodded, and began to make his way toward me.

“‘Stop!’ I shouted to the driver.

“‘I got out and called a cab, into which I hastened.

“‘Where to, sir?’ asked the driver.

“‘Anywhere—as far as you can go,’ I replied.

“‘The man stared, but said nothing, and drove on. Presently I heard the sound of wheels behind, and the voice of some one shouting, ‘Stop, stop!’ I peeped out of the window, and saw a cab following at a rapid rate, the driver shouting, and the old gentleman adding his own cracked shouts, and gesticulating with his arms for my cab to stop.

“‘Driver!’ I said, in the calm tones of despair, ‘I must avoid that madman. Drive on rapidly till you distance the other cab, then when they cannot perceive you, put me down, and I will trouble your fare."

"In ten minutes I was set down in the Hay-market. A coffee house was close by, and I slunk into it like a thief. I took a paper in my hands, but had not read a line, when to my horror, in walked Mr. Warlock. There was now no retreat; I braced myself up for the meeting.

"The old gentleman advanced, smilingly as ever. I now perceived that his clothes, though cut after the old fashion, were new!

"So glad, so very glad to see you," he commenced. "Have tried every means; was determined to do the business at last. My dear friend—how like your father you are at this moment, sitting there with the newspaper before you, just cocking your eye over the top—I owe your father and you a thousand, thousand thanks; and more, I owe you, as my dear old friend's representative, all the money I have borrowed from him on various occasions, as well as from yourself—always giving my acknowledgments. There, there it is, all right, with the interest at five per cent. added. I have had it in my pocket since the day I called for the documents I left with you. Couldn't get to see you. Sent it once in a letter, the letter was returned to me. You will see that it is all correct. I won't stay to count it now. I have gained the suit, as I told you I should, and more than that I am now Sir Joshua Warlock, of Warlock Castle, N—shire, baronet. God bless you! You will hear from me again."

"Before I recovered from the stupor his appearance and words had occasioned, he was gone. I should have thought that I was dreaming, but there lay the money—a heap of notes, gold, silver and copper, before me—palpably before me. I at length recovered my senses sufficiently to count the money. It amounted to £700, 16s., 4 1-2d.! With it was a general statement of all the moneys borrowed from my father and myself, at dates extending over thirty years, with the interest added; and I, for months had been hiding myself, and refusing to see the man who wanted to pay me all this money!

"I returned home, astonished, confounded, yet delighted. The money was a godsend. So thought I, so said my wife.

"A few weeks afterwards I received a letter; it was from Sir Joshua Warlock, and in it he informed me that he had great pleasure in presenting me with the living of Chirley—worth £1500 per annum—as a slight token of his regard for my late father and for myself! He furthermore stated that he was on the point of sailing for Jamaica to visit his estates on that island, and that he expected to remain abroad two years; but he hoped to see me on his return to England.

"Poor old man! he never returned. He died in Jamaica a year afterward, in the eighty-seventh year of his age, and the title and estates passed into the family of the Earl of —, to whom he was distantly related; but the living once presented could not be taken from me, and I have since held possession of it, and expect to hold it till the day of my death.

"Thus, gentlemen," said the reverend gentleman, in conclusion, "that which at one time was the bane of my existence, the destruction of my peace of mind, proved eventually to be the cause of my singular prosperity."

A BEAUTIFUL COAL MINE.

Dr. Buckland mentions some remarkable instances of the persistence of forms of vegetation traceable in coal: But the finest example is that of the coal mines of Bohemia. The most elaborate imitations of living foliage bear no comparison with the beautiful profusion of extinct vegetable forms with which the galleries of these coal mines are overhung. The roof is covered as with a canopy of gorgeous tapestry, enriched with festoons of most graceful foliage, flung in wild, irregular profusion over every portion of its surface. The spectator feels himself transported, as if by enchantment, into the forests of another world; he beholds trees, of form and character now unknown upon the surface of the earth, presented to his senses almost in the vigor of their primeval life—their scaly stems and bending branches, with their delicate apparatus of foliage, are all spread forth before him, little impaired by the lapse of countless ages, and bearing faithful records of extinct systems of vegetation, which began and terminated in times of which these relics are the infallible historians.

THE TRANSPORTATION SYSTEM.

The first distinct notice of the modern transportation system is to be found in 18 Car. II., c. 3, which gives the judges power, at their discretion, to execute or to transport for life the moss-troopers of Cumberland and Northumberland. The punishment was inflicted frequently in an illegal manner up to the reign of George I., when its operation was extended and legalized. During the reign of James II. transportation, or rather reduction to slavery, was a favorite, and to many parties a profitable punishment. Dr. Lingard quotes a petition, setting forth that seventy persons, who had been apprehended on account of the Salisbury rising of Penruddock and Grove, after a year's imprisonment, had been sold at Barbadoes for 1550lbs. of sugar. Among them were divines, officers, and gentlemen, who were represented as "grinding at the mills, attending at the furnaces, and digging in that scorching island, whipped at whipping-posts, and sleeping in styes worse than those of hogs in England."—The Australian Colonies.

LOST.

BY EDWIN S. LISCOMB.

Have any of you seen my child?
 Her hair was threads of gold;
 Her ways were winning, sweet and mild,
 Her gentleness untold.

She strayed in innocence away,
 To loiter on the shore;
 To watch the sunlit billows play,
 And list the breakers' roar.

Some wayward ship, I fear me now,
 With wanton grace and glistening sail,
 Hath marked my child's angelic brow,
 And lured her to the gale.

I wander restless up and down
 The desolated beach,
 And, moaning, glean each gathering frown,
 Across the ocean's reach.

I gaze upon the ships that go
 In beauty on the sea;
 And still they're gliding to and fro,
 But bear no hope to me.

MY HUSBAND'S DAGUERRETYPE.

BY MRS. C. ELLIS HOWE.

I HAD been a teacher just six months in Mr. Hamilton's Young Ladies' Seminary, B—, Virginia, when I received a letter from my mother's physician, informing me that he regarded her situation as extremely precarious, although he apprehended no immediate danger, and advised me as soon as I could conveniently, to relinquish my school duties and return home.

I had been supremely happy in my present relation as teacher, the warm-hearted, pleasure-loving southern girls had found their way into all the crevices of my affections, and between them and me there existed strong bonds of sympathy and love.

I was not yet eighteen, and but a recent graduate at school, but my pupils, so far from taking advantage of my youth and inexperience, sought in every possible way to lighten my cares and promote my happiness.

It was, therefore, with feelings of the deepest regret that I thought of parting with them, and the teachers with whom I had been so happily connected; but my anxiety and love for my mother would not permit me to remain an hour longer than was absolutely necessary for me to complete the preparations for my journey.

As soon as it was known that I was about to leave, presents were showered in upon me from all sides, many of them of much beauty and value, not only from the various classes which it had been my pleasure to instruct, but from the scholars individually, and from nearly every one I received some token of affectionate remembrance. In fact my room, the morning of my departure, presented quite the appearance of a miniature museum.

I was to leave at one o'clock in the afternoon, and had been busily engaged for two hours, packing my effects into the smallest possible compass, when a slight tap was heard at my door, and upon opening it, I beheld Nellie Grahame, a sweet, gentle little girl of eight years, the youngest of my pupils, and a great favorite of mine. She was an orphan, from the far South, and had been consigned to the especial care of the teachers.

"Come in, Nellie, and sit down," I said. "I am very glad to see you."

"No, thank you, Miss Manning, I can't stop. I've only come to—"

Here the child stopped, as if at a loss how to proceed.

"Well, what did you come for?" I asked, encouragingly. "Did you want me to do anything for you?"

She looked up into my face, and with the prettiest simplicity imaginable, said:

"O, Miss Manning, you don't know how sorry I am you are going away, and I am going to give you a present, something for you to remember your little Nellie by when she is far away from you, and I have brought you a daguerreotype, just such as the other girls have been giving you, only a great deal handsomer, will you accept it?"

She spoke in a low tone, as if doubtful how her present would be received.

"Gladly," I replied, "though I do not need anything to remind me of you, Nellie, you have been such a dear, good little girl, and have given me so little trouble, that I shall always remember you, even without any keepsake."

The child's eyes sparkled with pleasure at my words, and she drew from under her shawl a daguerreotype, which she placed in my hand.

"Open it," she said, "and see if it isn't beautiful."

I did so, and found to my amazement a picture, not her own, but of a person whom I had never seen, a fine, intellectual-looking gentleman, of perhaps twenty-six or eight, and with a particularly pleasing countenance.

"Nellie," said I, as I gazed admiringly upon it, "this isn't your picture, you've made a mistake, and given me some one's else instead of your own."

"No, I haven't, it's mine; my brother Mark gave it to me when he brought me here to school," she said quickly, eager to convince me that she was giving away only what rightfully belonged to her.

"Yes, I know," I said, "the daguerreotype is yours, because it was given you; but that isn't what I mean. It isn't your picture, a likeness of yourself; it's your brother's, he sat for it, and it was taken for him."

"No, Miss Manning, it's mine, Mark had it taken on purpose for me." And then, as if overcome by a sudden outburst of affection, she threw both her arms around my neck, exclaiming, "O, my dear, dear Miss Manning, you don't know how much I love my brother, and next to him I love you, better than any one else in the whole wide world."

I knew that were I to refuse Nellie's gift, it would be inflicting a deep wound on her feelings, and though I felt extremely unwilling to take the daguerreotype which she prized so highly, yet I accepted it in the spirit with which it was given, though to tell the truth, the moment I closed the door after her, I sat down on my trunk, and laughed immoderately for some minutes. The idea that the value of a daguerreotype consisting of a handsome picture, enclosed in a handsomer case, of no matter who, rather than of the likeness of a friend, was altogether a novel one, and I could scarcely refrain from laughing outright, even before Nellie had left the room.

That afternoon I left, and in the course of a few days found myself once more within my New England home. I never returned to Mr. Hamilton's school, for although the summer sufficed to restore my mother to her usual health, yet my own had become a good deal impaired, and I knew that my strength would be insufficient to perform again the laborious duties of a teacher; but I ever retained the pleasant remembrances of the time passed there, and of my former pupils and friends. The presents I had received from them at parting, I ever regarded with much pleasure, and there was not one that I prized more highly than I did the daguerreotype of the unknown gentleman, for the sake of the sweet little giver.

Four years passed by. I had received pressing invitations from Mr. Clark, a cousin of mine, and a planter in Georgia, to pass the winter at his house, which I at last concluded to accept.

I travelled from New York to Norfolk accompanied by a friend, but the rest of the journey I was forced to perform alone. I found no difficulty, however, for our polite and gallant countrymen are ever ready to assist a lady who by chance happens to be travelling without an escort. The cars took me no further than M——, a distance of twenty miles from my cousin's plantation, and here I was in the expectation of meeting him, for I had written to apprise him of my coming, but as I stepped from the cars and beheld not one familiar face, I could not but feel a good deal disappointed, and somewhat apprehensive as to how I should be able to reach my place of destination.

"Has Mr. Clark been here?" I inquired of the depot-master after the train moved off, and I could see nothing of him.

"No, he has not," was the reply.

"Are any of his servants here with his carriage?" I asked, a faint hope remaining that if Mr. Clark had been prevented from coming himself, he had sent some one in his stead.

"There is no one here," answered the depot-master politely, "but if you wish I will find some other mode of conveyance for you."

"I regret I have not my carriage with me," said a pleasant-looking elderly gentleman near us, "but if the lady will consent to ride in my buggy, I will take her with pleasure over to Mr. Clark's."

"Thank you," I answered, "I shall consider it a great favor, but I am afraid it will occasion you a good deal of inconvenience."

"Not in the least," was the gallant reply, "it will be an especial favor to me to have the pleasure of your company. My plantation joins Mr. Clark's, and it will be but little out of my way."

In a few moments I found myself seated by Mr. Johnson, in his buggy, whom I discovered at once to be a gentleman of much refinement and culture. We rode rapidly over a hard, smooth road, leading past gentlemen's residences of much elegance and taste, until we came into an open country, and here Mr. Johnson turned off from the main road, and took a much less frequented one, which led directly past his own and my cousin's plantations.

We had ridden about five miles, conversing pleasantly upon the various topics of the day, when a large tree, upon which two negroes had been hewing, fell with a crash by the side of the road just as we were passing it. The noise occasioned by the falling of the tree, together with the shouting of the negroes, frightened our horse, which was a high-spirited animal, and he shied out so suddenly that we came near being precipitated down a steep embankment, then giving a sudden spring which almost threw me off my seat, he dashed furiously ahead, without Mr. Johnson's having the least power to control him. For two miles he ran a regular John Gilpin race, we were enveloped in a perfect cloud of dust, the buggy swayed to and fro like a ship in a gale, and the wheels scarcely touched the ground over which we passed. In a short time, however, the horse began to slacken his speed, and Mr. Johnson, who now spoke for the first time since the horse had commenced running, said:

"If anything happens, Miss Manning, and we are likely to be overturned, you must jump. I think you can do it without injury; but don't jump till you—"

The words were scarcely out of his mouth when one of the reins broke, and the horse, frightened anew by this fresh disaster, darted on with redoubled fury. We were now rapidly approaching a corner, around which it would be impossible to pass without being overturned; a thick stone wall was upon both sides, and we should be in imminent danger of being thrown against it.

"Jump," cried Mr. Johnson, "jump quick, and I will follow you."

And seizing my arm, he assisted me as I sprang upon the seat, and from thence leaped to the ground; but in doing so, my dress for an instant got entangled, and I was hurled with violence against a large log by the roadside. Whether I was stunned by the fall, or fainted, I cannot say; but certain it was I became unconscious, and remained so for some time. When I recovered my senses I found myself lying on a sofa, in a handsomely-furnished parlor.

My bonnet and shawl had been removed, and a lady was bathing my head in cologne water, and near me stood a gentleman and a young girl, both evidently regarding me with great interest.

"Where am I?" I exclaimed, bewildered at finding myself among strangers, and in a strange place.

"With friends," said the gentleman, in a deep, melodious voice. "You were thrown upon the ground in consequence of your horse taking fright, and brought here."

"O, I remember now," I said, comprehending at once my present situation, and for an instant my gaze was riveted upon the fine, handsome face of the gentleman.

Where had I seen him before? was the thought that occupied my mind, for his features were perfectly familiar to me. At that moment a cry of joy burst from the lips of the young girl, and springing forward she threw both her arms around my neck, bestowing upon me a shower of kisses.

"It's Miss Manning!" she cried, "my dear, dear Miss Manning. I am so glad to see you again—"

"Nellie," said the gentleman, endeavoring to draw her from me, "you are rather too demonstrative in your joy, you must remember that the lady is sick, and has not yet recovered from her fall."

But she paid no attention to his words, except to speak in lower tones.

"Is it possible," I exclaimed in surprise, "that I again behold my young friend, Nellie Grahame?"

"Yes, it is I, Nellie—your own little Nellie, as you used to call me. No wonder you did not know me; just see how I have grown." And she drew herself up to her full height, revealing a form and face of much beauty and symmetry.

She then introduced me to a lady as her aunt, and to the gentleman, whom I recognized at once, from his resemblance to the daguerreotype, and before she told me, as her brother.

"We are no strangers, I believe," said Mrs. Grahame, smiling; "although we have never before had the pleasure of a personal meeting. But Nellie has given us such glowing accounts of her school life at B——, and told us so much of you in particular, that we have long regarded you as an old friend."

"And now you are here," interrupted Nellie, "we shall not let you go till you have made us a long, long visit. Wont it be delightful, Mark?" she said, appealing to her brother, her face radiant with joy.

"It will certainly afford us great pleasure," was his quiet reply.

"But where is Mr. Johnson?" I inquired. "I hope no harm has befallen him from this accident?"

"He has just ridden over to Dr. Smith's," said Mr. Grahame. "You remained so long unconscious, that we feared you had sustained some internal injury. But here they are now," he added, as the door opened and Mr. Johnson, accompanied by the doctor, entered.

I attempted to rise, but my foot refused to bear my weight. It had been paining me for some time, but I had hitherto taken no notice of it; and upon examination, it was found to be a good deal swollen.

"It is not a bad sprain," said the doctor, "though it threatens to confine you to the house for a short time."

"O, I am so glad!" interrupted Nellie; "not because you have sprained your ankle, but because you cannot get away." And she began eagerly telling the doctor of our former acquaintance.

"I too am greatly indebted to Miss Manning," said Mr. Grahame; "for I was suddenly obliged to go to California, and could not get off short of a six months' trip, and was forced, much against my will, to place Nellie at a boarding-school until my return. For all your attention and kind care of her," he added, addressing me, "I am deeply grateful."

"Then this is the teacher, is it, whose merits have been sounded in my ears ever since Nellie's return? Your pupil, here, has certainly a high appreciation of your kindness," said the doctor, laying his hand on her head as he spoke; "and since you have fallen in with such good friends, Miss Manning, I advise you to remain with them for a short time, at least until you are better."

"I am afraid my cousin will—"

"No, Mr. Clark is not expecting you," said Mr. Grahame, interrupting me, "for I saw him yesterday, and he told me that he should look for you in the course of a fortnight. Your letter has doubtless been miscarried."

"Then you must stay," said Nellie, decidedly. "We shall not let you go."

"I shall insist upon it," said Mrs. Grahame.

"And I shall take it quite an affront if you leave us for one week at least," re-echoed her nephew.

I could not refuse such pressing invitations, and passed with the Grahames one of the most delightful weeks of my life. No one who has ever been South, can fail to admire the hospitality and cordiality of the Southern people. True, they have not the energy and enterprise which are the leading characteristics of the Northerners; neither is education so widely diffused among all classes as with us; but in point of sociality and hospitality, we should do well to imitate them.

It was a delightful morning in the latter part of November, when the cool, invigorating autumnal breezes were bringing strength to the debilitated frame and roses to the cheek, that I bade adieu to Nellie and her aunt, and took my seat beside Mr. Graham in his handsome chaise, which was to convey us to the residence of Mr. Clark. A ride of a dozen miles over a good road, with a fleet horse, is not much; and an hour brought us within sight of a large, tastefully built cottage just peeping out from beneath the trees, and half hidden by the surrounding shrubbery, which Mr. Grahame pointed out to me as my cousin's plantation home.

"What a lovely spot!" I exclaimed, eagerly leaning forward to see if I could not catch a glimpse of some of its occupants.

"You are going to take them completely by surprise," said Mr. Grahame, "for they have not had the least intimation of your arrival, and are not expecting you for some days."

"I know it," said I, "and I can scarcely restrain my impatience to see them."

Mr. Grahame, however, seemed to take no notice of my impatience, for instead of increasing the speed of his horse, he drew him almost to a walk. Our ride, thus far, had been rather an unsocial one; Mr. Grahame was not in his usual conversational mood, and several times had fallen into a profound reverie.

"Miss Manning," said Mr. Grahame, smiling, just as we were turning up the avenue leading to the house, "Nellie has been telling me of the present she made you some four years ago, and I think a daguerreotype of a person you had never seen, and in whom you could have no possible interest, could hardly have been a very acceptable gift."

"On the contrary," I replied, "it was a most acceptable one, for the giving it away involved a good deal of sacrifice on Nellie's part, and contained a strong proof of her affection for me; and I have always valued it highly."

"And I hope," said Mr. Grahame, a rich colour mounting to his face as he spoke, "that the acquaintance, begun with the daguerreotype, will be continued with the original, and that you will value it hereafter not only on account of the giver, but for the sake of the giver's brother."

"I most certainly shall," I answered, "after having received so much kindness at your hands."

Mr. Grahame gave the reins a slightly nervous toss, and then in a voice which I never afterwards forgot, said:

"Our acquaintance has been very short, I am aware, Miss Manning; but this one week has sufficed to inspire me with feelings of the most profound respect and admiration of yourself. And now may I claim the inestimable privilege of becoming a frequent caller upon you, whilst you remain at your cousin's home?"

The words were simple enough; but there was a depth, earnestness and feeling in his tones, which I had never seen before. I bowed an assent, for I had no time to reply; our approach had been discovered, and Mrs. Clark came tripping down the steps of the piazza, followed by her husband, to meet us. And O! what a warm welcome we had! how delighted and astonished every one was to see us!

"And now, Mary Manning," said my cousin Frank Clark, after the first exclamations of surprise were over, and I had laid aside my bonnet and shawl, "I should like to know where you came from, and how you have contrived to pick up my friend Mark Grahame on the way?"

"O," said Mr. Grahame, answering for me, "it was one of the accidents of travelling that brought us together." And then turning to me, he added, with a mischievous smile: "And I trust it will prove a most providential accident, too."

Four months from that time, I was again travelling homeward; but this time I was not unattended, for my companion was Mark Grahame, with whom I had agreed not only to take a trip to the North, but also, by the holy marriage vow which we had just exchanged, to perform with him the whole of the long journey of life, and we were now on our way to pass the summer with my friends at home.

Reader, two years have passed since that eventful period; and if you will come and visit me in my happy Southern home, I will show you, enclosed in a case of purple velvet, the daguerreotype of a handsome, intellectual looking young man, which all the gold in California could not tempt me to part with. It is my husband's daguerreotype which I prize so highly, for I learned to love it long before I ever saw or loved its dear original.

MUSIC AS A MEDICINE.

Eugene de Mirecourt, in his lively little biography of Felicien David the composer, whose recent work, "Herculeanum," was so successful at the Paris opera, tells that when in the East, David cured a man sick with fever by his piano-forte performances. The sick man at the sound of the instrument felt his fever leave him, and when it threatened to renew its attacks, David would chase it away by a few preludes. In a week the man was well. This was not unlike the genuine original David playing before Saul. This fact is worth receiving the attention of the faculty. To treat people by music would be an excellent method of introducing harmony into the conflicting medical systems. A dyspeptic affection would probably be cured by three days of the cornet-a-piston. Nothing has yet been advanced to prove that neuralgia could withstand an hour of violoncello, and an attack of cholera, however violent, would not stand more than twenty minutes of ophicleide. Half an hour of bassoon would drive away the headache, while deafness could be effectually cured by the united efforts of these instruments in one of Verdi's finales.

As to Flattery, the current commodity of the world on which Fashion lives and thrives, it is at most, a lie in its best clothes.

MUSIC.

Of all music, that is best which comes from an articulate voice. Whether it be that man cannot make an instrument so melodious, as that which God made, living man, or because there is something in this, for the rational part as well as for the ear alone. I think he hath not a mind well tempered, whose zeal is not inflamed by a heavenly anthem. Music is good or bad as the end to which it tendeth. Surely they did mean it excellent, that made Apollo, who was the god of wisdom, to be god of music also. It argues it of some excellency, that it is used only of the most aerial creatures; loved, and understood of man alone; the birds next have variety of notes. The beasts, fishes, and the reptiles, which are of grosser composition, have only silence, or untuned sounds. They that despise it wholly, may well be suspected of something of a savage nature. The Italians have somewhat a smart censure of those that affect it not: they say God loves not him, whom he hath not made to love music. I believe it is a helper both to good and ill; and will therefore honor it when it moves to virtue, and beware it when it would flatter into vice.—Owen Feltham's "Resolves."

THE TRUTH AT LAST.

In a certain town in the North of England, not long ago, lived (and died) a worthy well-known sculptor and dealer in marble monuments. A customer called one day at the works for the purpose of giving an order. Walking into the yard he saw no one but a stolid looking mason, who was busy chiselling a death's head and cross bones. "Is Mr. Boeson in?" inquired our friend. "Naw," was the monosyllabic answer. "Never mind, I'll look in afterwards." A second time he made his appearance, put the interrogatory, and received the same answer. A third time he called, and found the same man still busy with mallet and chisel. "Is Mr. Boeson come in yet?" he again interrogated. "Naw." "Do you think he will be in soon?" The answer was conclusive. "Naw, aw dinna think he'll be in suin; Mr. Boeson's died!" and again the mallet and the chisel went on as before.—English paper.

THE KORAN DISGRACED.

Some time ago a number of handkerchiefs were brought, or rather smuggled, into Mogadore, having printed upon them passages from the Koran. One of them got into the hands of the emperor, who, thinking the Christians were ridiculing the sacred book, ordered instantly all the cities of the coast to be searched to discover the offender who introduced them. Happily for the merchant, he was not found out. His highness commanded that all the handkerchiefs which were collected should be destroyed. When Dr. Davidson was at Morocco, he prepared some seidlitz water for the use of the sultan, and placed on the sides of two bottles, containing the beverage, Arabic verses from the Koran. The sultan was exceedingly exasperated at this compliment to his religion, and had it privately intimated to Mr. Davidson not to desecrate the holy book in that abominable manner.—Richardson's Morocco.

RECORDARE.

BY ELIZA FRANCES MORIARTY.

I once had a sweetheart—O, long, long ago!—
 With eyes like a dove and a brow like the snow;
 Her lips were like cherries, as ripe and as red,
 On her fair cheek the rose and the lily were wed;
 Her hair fell in ripples of light wavy gold,
 Her round shape so lovely was beauty's own mould;
 O, each movement of grace, and each step blithe and free,
 Made her dearest of all in the world to me!

Her words breathed a spirit of joyance and truth,
 Her heart was a fountain of love and of ruth;
 The tones of her dear voice, so girlish and low,
 Sought the depths of my heart in a musical flow;
 Quick vanished before her each shadowing care,
 That angel so near me but not unaware.

In the springtide of love, in life's hallowing hour,
 The winds of the churchyard sighed o'er my lost flower;
 O woe of my boyhood! O grief of my prime!
 Lone grief, that can never find solace in time,
 Thou 't darken this bosom till life's spark has flown
 To the land where the sad tear of sorrow's unknown!

NELLIE.

BY MATTHEW S. VINTON.

I ALWAYS knew, from the time when we were children together, that Nellie Herbert was a roguish, tantalizing little witch (and a pretty one, withal!); but I never guessed one half her wickedness, until lying one blessed summer afternoon in the summer-house, dozing with my eyes open (and ears too, as it happened), I overheard her as she paced up and down: one of the garden paths near by, in company with a chatty girlfriend of hers (Sue Deane, her name was), indulging in rather a confidential conversation, to which I knew, sooner than have had me for a listener, she would have pulled her little rosy tongue out by the roots, and gone speechless the remainder of her days—the saddest destiny on earth for a woman, you will allow.

Perhaps you will say I wasn't gifted with a very keen sense of honor or delicacy. Well I don't pretend to be perfection, so it can't much matter. Think of me as you please, for I am going to confess (candor is one of my faults) that, although I was conscious the pretty minx hadn't the faintest suspicion of my whereabouts, and couldn't so much as guess that my eyes took in every flutter of her white gown through the wall of shrubbery between us, at the same time my ears (quite inquisitive for the masculine article) caught every syllable of her musical talk, somehow the fact didn't tempt me in the least to clap my hands over my organs of vision, or thrust my fingers' joint deep into my organs of hearing, or even to get up and go away like the dear honorable darling of a man that I was.

Instead of that I turned over leisurely upon my side (perhaps it was because my former position wasn't an easy one, and then perhaps—well, I rather think it was because I could see and hear still better—impertinent fellow!) and watched and listened to the best of my ability.

"How long is it since Charley Hammond proposed?"

That was Sue's voice, and I remember distinctly how, as I raised myself, for they had reached the farthest end of the walk from where I was lying, and my position had become quite intolerable (for my ears), the ashes of the half-smoked cigar which I held loosely between my fingers took a notion to sift down to the ground, but changing their mind before they got there, came waltzing up on a little puff of wind, into my face. One ash (is that grammatical?) was mean enough to hop into my eye, and I shed more tears in consequence than a hypocrite during a revival.

If I hadn't lost Nellie's answer, however, I wouldn't have minded this extravagant waste of lachrymose material, though to be sure I had been saving it up carefully to shed for my sins, when I should get old and meditative.

An indistinct murmur, and a little laugh, dainty and sweet as the tinkle of silver bells, was all I caught of the reply.

"Henry (that was my name, and I opened my mouth so wide with curiosity that it must have looked like a dilapidated water-pail, with the bail fallen out) hasn't offered himself yet, has he?"

"Henry!" What a pretty womanly affectation that soft, surprised exclamation was! "Why, no, goose, I hope you don't think Henry Burnett has any serious intentions. La, he's my cousin—didn't you know it?—and it isn't pretty or proper for cousins to marry."

Now that was a fib, and the jade knew it. If to be the adopted son of her stepmother's cousin's widow's brother, was to bear any blood relationship to her, why then we were cousins, not otherwise. And as for serious intentions, hadn't I kissed her every time I caught her in the hall after dark for the previous six weeks? And hadn't I squeezed her hand, till I dared not squeeze any harder for fear of crushing the white, beringed, tremulous bit of a thing? (It looked like a symmetrical fragment of dimpled swan's down—excuse a lover's extravagant conceit—with pink seashells for nails.) And hadn't I shaved off half my beard to please her, and played the unconquerable hero to every other young lady in the neighborhood, that she might have no cause for jealousy? Hadn't I, in fact, done everything but get down on my knees to her? (I should have done that, let me tell you, only I had a new pair of—of—how shall I say it for blushes?—of that kind of garment which strong-minded women are supposed to monopolize after marriage, and I didn't like to wear the gloss off the knees of them!) Serious intentions indeed! In my mortification at being so poorly appreciated, I came near groaning aloud. I prudently restrained the impulse, however.

"What a pity! But, O, Nellie!" I heard a distinct clapping of hands, "I can have him, now, can't I? Strange I never thought of it before! Say, Nellie, may I?"

"You are welcome to him, for aught I care. I am very sure of that."

I wasn't so sure of it if she was. I hadn't been the victim of threescore serious flirtations, to lie there that eventful July afternoon, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and forty-nine, minus experience in the ways of women. I hope I'm not constitutionally a vain man, yet I would have wagered my new box of Alexander kids, and not been afraid of losing them either, that that same Nelly, in spite of her pretended indifference, would have swallowed her friend (I speak figuratively, of course,) if she had thought there was any real danger of having her for a rival in my affections. She liked me, Nellie did, and I liked her—ay, loved her to distraction—the red-lipped, blue-eyed, brown-curled little flirt.

"Now aint that delightful, dear? The most relentless coquette in all Christendom yielding up the handsomest, wittiest and best-natured of her admirers voluntarily!"

If anything will make a bashful man feel peculiar, it is to hear himself praised. I modestly shut one eye and looked up at the clouds. Somehow they made me think of Nellie's hair, they were so soft, so lustrous, so tenderly, goldenly brown!

There was no reply to Miss Sue's exclamations. I was glad of that, for while I was too modest—I was really, now—to believe that her admiration was all the genuine article, I knew that if Nellie had entirely sympathized with her friend's mood, she would have expressed as much in words. For that reason her silence gratified me.

"I shall set my cap immediately. And, O, sha'n't I be proud of my handsome beau, when I've caught him? Mind you don't come poking that saucy little nose of yours in the way, to spoil my fun. But what's your notion of giving him up so readily? He's a deal more agreeable than Charley, and besides, you've rejected him already."

"You speak as if there were only those two men in the world—the conceited creatures! I'd die an old maid for all either of them."

O, how my ears tingled! I came near swearing that she should die an old maid in good earnest, before any interference of mine should prevent her. Conscious, however, that, to use a vulgar, but expressive comparison, I should "only be biting my own nose off" in that case, I prudently restrained the incipient vow. There had been considerable uncalled-for pique and irritation in Nelly's voice, which betrayed—What? Well, as I said before, I hope I am not a vain man, but thinking of that, I chuckled so audibly with inward satisfaction, that I feared for a moment I had betrayed my whereabouts.

But no. The girls took two or three more turns round the shaded path, which they wouldn't have done had they heard me, and then arm in arm sauntered slowly to the house. I had formed a resolution, in the meantime, a resolution of which revenge was the father, and love the mother. The child of an ill-assorted couple, maybe.

I rose up, threw away my cigar, whistled a bar of "Hail Columbia," by way of rousing my courage, and then followed them into the house. Going directly to my room, I brushed my hair and whiskers, till I came near falling in love with myself, they were so glossy; put on a clean dickey, tied a stunning bow to my cravat, made myself generally fascinating (I am not a vain man, remember), and then marched straight down to the parlor, and seated myself on the sofa beside Sue Deane.

She looked a little flustered at so unusual a proceeding, for I had never paid her much attention; but when I took a flower from the button-hole of my vest (it was a beautiful wild flower that Nellie had gathered the day before, and placed on my table in one of her delicate Sevres vases), and begged leave to arrange it in her hair, telling her with my most winning smile how beautifully the white, waxen blossom contrasted with the purplish blackness of her magnificent braids, she looked absolutely bewildered, and glanced toward Nellie in the most puzzled air imaginable.

As for Nellie herself, the only reward I got from her for my premeditated hatefulness, was one surprised, indignant, wide-open flash of her superb eyes. It shot through and transfixed me like an arrow.

All that afternoon I was devoted to Sue. I threw admiration into my eyes, passion into my gestures, tenderness and devotion into the tones of my voice. If I played a deceptive and consequently wicked part, I have the satisfaction of knowing that I played it gloriously and with complete success.

Nellie was completely thrown off her guard, though I think Sue, who was less interested, partly understood me all the while. Through my lashes I watched her face (Nellie's) assiduously—detecting every change that passed over it. It was rare sport to see the angry crimson rise and waver and die away, only to rise again in her cheek; to detect the knitting of the soft white brows, as if half in scorn and half in pain; to watch the toss of the small, proud head, the convulsive locking together of the dainty hands, the quivering of the grieved mouth, like a rose-leaf stirred by the wind. Rare sport, I say! It might have been, had I not loved her. As it was, I came near breaking through the cruel farce a dozen times, for I knew her pride would never, never let her forgive me, if she once detected me watching her, and knew that I understood the cause of her agitation.

That night, after I had escorted Sue home, I walked back and forth in the street for an hour, to make little Miss Indifference think something that wasn't exactly true—i. e., that I had been spending my time in said Sue's company. When I re-entered the parlor, it was dark and apparently deserted; but as I turned to leave the room, a little disappointed at not finding Nellie there, the sound of a stifled sob smote my ear. I was back again in an instant, pushing the muslin drapery from one of the low windows, only to find Nellie crouching down, with her face hidden in her folded arms, and to hear the audible weeping that even my coming could not check or soothe.

My first impulse was to take her to my breast, tell her how dear, how very dear she was to me, and kiss her back into smiles again. But there were a few dregs of malice in my heart even then—sweet angels, forgive me!—and so I only said, gently enough, but not tenderly:

"Why, what ails my little cousin?" (I had never acknowledged the title as legitimate before.) "Charley hasn't proved faithless, has he? I should be tempted to cowhide him, if I thought he had anything to do with those tears."

"Charley!"

If a rosebud could snarl, I should say that Nellie's mouth snarled then. She lifted her head and dashed the long, moistened hair away from her forehead with a proud gesture, the effect of which was counteracted the next moment by a little sob that would come, in spite of her.

I said nothing more, just then—only lifted one of her white hands, and commenced idly slipping the rings back and forth across the dimpled fingers. She let it lie passively in my clasp, and with triumph—it was a reverent and happy triumph, dear Nellie!—I felt the tremulous thrill that ran through it at the half-carressing way in which I held it.

"Charley! I hate Charley!" she broke out at last, passionately, seeing I had let the matter drop.

"Why I thought him one of the best of fellows, and he is certainly very fond of you!" I answered, gravely, dropping her hand as carelessly as I had taken it up. "By the way, what a sweet girl that little friend of yours is—Sue. I never realized it completely until to-day. I have nearly lost my heart to her. What a soft voice she has—and what glorious eyes! Don't you think so?"

"They are well enough, I dare say," she replied, a little curtly, pulling at the lace edge of her handkerchief. "I never thought them remarkable."

"O, of course you wouldn't be expected to admire her so much as myself! I always had a fancy for black eyes and soft voices, you know."

She nodded a silent affirmative to my remark:

"If I am any judge of character, she is more than commonly amiable in disposition, too. I can hardly imagine such a thing as a frown on her forehead, or an angry or rude word slipping from such a mouth."

"There you are mightily mistaken, at any rate! You ought to see her in a passion once, as I have done. You might change your views."

"But don't you like her? I am surprised—and sorry, too; for I was about to ask you how she would please you as a cousin, supposing I could have the good fortune to make an impression."

"Well, then, I don't like her!" she exclaimed, with a suddenly darkening face; "the artful—"

She checked herself, as though suddenly struck dumb with repentance.

"But I thought her your dearest friend, and a perfect little jewel of a woman?"

"And so she is, and I ought to be ashamed to have spoken so of her!" she said eagerly, as if to atone for her former words, and bursting into a paroxysm of passionate tears, as she spoke. "She is a dear, sweet, affectionate darling, and it would break her heart to know what I have said."

My brave, true hearted, womanly Nellie! How I loved her for her penitent words and tears!

"Then you would like her for a cousin, wouldn't you, after all?"

She looked up at me quickly, and I hated myself for the moment for the look of pitiful anguish that dilated her eyes and whitened her compressed lips.

"Yes—no—O, please don't talk about it any more to-night! I am ill and tired. Sometime—to-morrow, maybe, I shall be glad and happy to hear you."

"What a fib, Nellie!"

"But—"

"O, please—please, don't! You can't guess how my head aches! Let me go!"

She rose and tried to pass me. Did I let her? Instead, I drew her down into my arms and whispered softly: "But I must talk of something, Nellie, and if you won't hear that, why—"

Pshaw! What's the use of finishing that sentence on paper? It must be enough for you to know, reader, as it was for me that happy night, that the poor words I said (all words are poor that try to express love) stirred Nellie's pure heart to its sweetest depths, and that in her surprise and delight she put her white arms about my neck, and— Well, did she? or didn't she? Yes, she kissed me. But that wasn't all she did. When she found out that I had listened to her conversation in the garden, she actually boxed my ears, the minx! And that wasn't all she did, either. Six months after, she married me.

O, she is the sweetest little wife—my Nellie!

ELBRIDGE GERRY'S MONUMENT.

Elbridge Gerry, one of the Massachusetts delegates to the provincial congress in 1776, minister to France in 1797, and vice president in 1813, died suddenly at Washington, while on his way to the capitol. His monument occupies a conspicuous position in the congressional burying ground, by the side of one erected to the memory of another deceased vice president, George Clinton, who died in 1811. Mr. Gerry died September 23, 1814. Upon his monument these words of his are inscribed: "It is the duty of every citizen, though he may have but one day to live, to devote that day to the good of his country."—Washington Union.

ENVY.

The lion craved the fox's art;
The fox the lion's force and heart;
The cock implored the pigeon's flight,
Whose wings were rapid, strong and light;
The pigeon strength of wing despised,
And the cock's matchless valor prized.
The fishes wished to graze the plain;
The beasts to skim beneath the main.
Thus, envious of another's state,
Each blamed the partial hand of fate.—GAY.

A DANGEROUS INK.

A ingenious Parisian stationer, who for some years past has taken up his abode at Shanghai, has returned to Paris, bringing with him a curious Chinese invention. This extraordinary discovery consists in the composition of a paper which can be made to last as long as one wishes, by the use of a water or eau magique. The paper must be beforehand prepared, by some means known only to the buyer and seller, and is then saturated with the water, which is colorless, tasteless, and scentless. The length of time that one desires the paper to last is regulated by the introduction of pure water to weaken the effect. For instance, if the paper is to be decomposed within six days, the eau magique is put on without adulteration; if a month, a certain quantity of pure water is to be used. With this paper, then, the wily Chinese write their billets doux, taking care, however, that the corrosive water and their passion shall be of the same weight. The water is called "Divine Ink," and the paper "Exquisite Prudence." If Divine Ink and Exquisite Prudence take up their permanent abode in civilized countries, what a death blow it will be to all breaches of promise suits, which, for the most part at least, are founded on love-letters, written promises, etc. And then, again, how many dishonest persons would sign promissory notes, knowing that, thanks to the encre divine, their signature would soon disappear; in fact, such an invention is a most dangerous one, reversing the present order of things, and opening a wide field for rascality.—Liverpool Times.

THE ARABS.

The following story is related of Count La Borde: "When among the Arabs, he saw a very fine mare, which he wished to purchase. While the bargain was going on, hearing a talk, the Arabs thronged round, and jostled against him rather rudely. He drew his sword; but as quick as his ready steel flashed, came forward the rummah and cobba of the Arabs, and he was borne back by numbers. Burning with rage, he plucked off his head-dress, when his wig came off too, and he cast it amidst the crowd. They fell back in terror from this wondrous man. "Ya wallah! the Kaffir has plucked his head off! God help us! God pardon us!" This gave time to appease all anger; the count replaced his wig, which has proved to him a better defence than the triple shield of Ajax, or the petrifying head of Medusa. Backshish, Backshish, and all was forgotten.—Colonial Recorder.

SEWING BY ARTIFICIAL LIGHT.

Persons whose vision is somewhat defective can sew white cloth by candle light, but they are unable to perform the same operation with black cloth. The following plan, however, affords a partial remedy: Pin or baste a strip of white paper on the seam of the black cloth to be operated upon, and sew through the paper and cloth, and when the seam is completed the paper may be torn off. The black thread will be distinctly seen on the white paper, and by drawing the stitches a little tighter than usual, good work will be produced. This method is well adapted for sewing by machinery as well as by hand.—Scientific American.

SPEAK KINDLY.

BY MRS. R. B. EDSON.

Speak kindly!—'tis a simple thing,
 Yet bears a wondrous power;
 'Twill shed the bloom of summer time
 O'er every darkened hour.
 'Twill calm the jarring chords of life,
 By grief or passion stirred;
 Like oil upon the troubled waves,
 Is a kindly spoken word.

And they who fought, but, yielding, fell,
 Were wrecked by passion's blindness,
 Though fallen, may be won by love
 And blessed words of kindness.
 Then let no cold, self-righteous spirit
 Place love and pity under ban;
 Con vail this season's holy teachings,
 "Deal gently with thy fellow-man!"

Speak kindly!—many a bitter word,
 In thoughtless moments rashly spoken,
 Through weary years of vain regret
 Its galling chains remain unbroken.
 The sweetest glimpses of paradise,
 The truest types of heaven above,
 Are beaming smiles, and kindly deeds,
 And gentle words of love!

MEASURE FOR MEASURE.

BY EMMA M. A. KIMBALL.

MARION GEORGE was a coquette, and played her cards with consummate skill and adroitness, as many a pierced heart among her large circle of male acquaintances can testify. The cunning hand of nature had moulded her face and form in accordance with her highest ideas of beauty and grace, and tinted the former with the freshest and purest color. Marion had a pretty, demure way of casting her eyes to the ground, perhaps in the consciousness that her long black lashes looked well curving upon her delicate-hued cheek, or of the fact that she had a more bewildering surprise in store for the beholder, when slowly lifting them she brought the splendor of two of the richest and darkest violet eyes to flash upon him it was seldom the lot of mortal to see.

These were the traps which were sprung upon Odin Moore, making him, without hope of escape, a prisoner of love, in the power of the most merciless and speculating of all flirts. He placed her in his heart upon a pedestal, high above all others, and worshipped her as the realization of his ideal. Every word that parted those cherry lips was to him heavy with wisdom and polished with wit. He loved her reverentially. How his impatient fingers would gladly have rested on the low, broad forehead, and twined in the heavy, silken bands of her hair, or thrilled to hold the perfect little hand (Marion meanwhile wondering why he was so stupid as not to do it), had he not thought it almost desecration. Woman to him was the embodiment of everything pure and angel-like. He remembered a sainted mother, the memory of whose soft hand, trembling with its weight of love upon his boyish head, brought the best and holiest thoughts to cluster in his soul, and he had grown to manhood with one of those rare and noble hearts which partake more of the divine than human. An intense love of the beautiful characterized him, and in whatever created thing it was met there his humble reverence became due.

Marion George had awakened in him this emotion, which by her arts she so quickly caused to be followed by love, that the veil was over his eyes which would admit nothing but perfection through its meshes. A glance over his shoulder at his journal reveals where he stood.

"One hour ago with Marion. Would that the blessed joy of saying my Marion were mine! I trembled lest my new-born earthly love should alienate me from Him who should have my first and best thoughts. But Marion, guileless and pure and beautiful as she is, would be the dearest gift my heart ever craved. My Father, make me worthy of her, if thou canst see fit to give me this precious boon."

Then a lingering spirit might have seen him bowed in prayer, thanking God for the pure being he had given him to love.

Another one at the same hour, looking into Marion's heart, or upon the sheet of paper over which she bent with a mischievous face, could have read words cruel enough to coil about the noble heart of poor Odin and sting it with all a serpent's venom. The address ran thus, after the style of devoted friends—"My darling Nellie," and then followed information concerning her last new lover.

"He is very good looking, pale and interesting, you know, but has a wide, open face and heart, and 'whoever runs may read' what is there. O, but he is stupid. He gazes at me with his great, thoughtful eyes, and sits in silence most of the time, and has never so much as given me a single kiss! He writes beautiful notes, and tells me that he loves me next to his Heavenly Father; and that brings me to the funniest part of it. To-night when he was here, I was feeling as mischievous and wicked as possible (which is an unusual thing for me), and had just quoted something that I thought extremely witty, when he, looking most vacantly, said, 'I don't understand you!' Was not that cold-waterish? He continued grave as a deacon, and very soon after asked me what my hopes of heaven were! I can't think of telling you what I answered him, but I was as considerate as possible to his feelings, and before he went he knelt and prayed for me. It was as much as I could do to keep from touching him with my foot and sending him over backwards; but as it was, I laughed so behind my handkerchief that he thought I was sobbing, and called them blessed tears. I wish you were only here, Nell, to help me have a good time with this honest son of Adam, for I am nearly tired with him alone, and mean to 'ship' him the first good chance that offers."

Odin Moore had no thought of all this, as he walked with her a few evenings after upon the beach. He drank in like wine the beauty of the sky and earth around him, and but one sound had more music to him than the low, melodious murmur of the stranding billows. He talked to Marion to awaken that sound; but she was wisely silent, for she had no appreciation in common with his. He seated her upon a broad rock and himself where he could look in her face, alternately with the scene around him—the gigantic, throbbing ocean tossing restlessly before them, the rival sea above, where angels sail their golden barks, and his whole soul was filled with reverence, adoration, awe and love.

Marion was impatient. It was not enough for her to know that she was loved by Odin Moore as few women are loved, but her selfish heart coveted words that would bring it to her ears in glowing and passionate reiterations. She was therefore disappointed when, turning towards her, he said:

"The name of God seems written upon every leaf of nature, Marion. It is wreathed in golden letters upon the blue scroll of the evening sky, and the skill of his hand is seen in the purple and gold of the sunset and silver and rose of the dawn. The wild-leaping sea hymns sonorously of him who holds its waters, and the deep-mouthed thunder interprets with awful voice the tracing of the vanishing lightnings."

He paused, as if awaiting a reply, but Marion had thrown into her face an expression of great thoughtfulness, and leaned her cheek upon her dimpled hand, knowing that the pensive air became her remarkably well, and her hand never looked whiter than when in that position. Moore thought—"She has an appreciative soul, and trusts not her emotions to words."

He glanced at her head, with its massive, shining crown of braids, the delicate ear, the well-turned and snowy throat, and then at the wondrous waves of rich, soft crimson upon her cheeks, the dangerous eyes, the sweet-pouting lips, the cunning chin, where nestled the most bewitching dimple that was ever impressed upon flesh. What milk-white marble was ever moulded and polished into such perfect arms, and hands, thought he, and then that beautiful gauze drape of colour de rose, sweeping over the rock in such graceful and flowing outlines, allowing just the tiniest bit of a slipper to peep out coyly from its hiding-place.

She had changed her position, and leaning with pure grace against a side rock, was looking far out upon the foam-capped waters, as if entranced by the holy beauty of the place and hour. Just the slightest motion of the bow-like lips, and how innocently twin dimples in either cheek flashed and darted out, putting the finishing stroke upon Odin's fascinated heart. Away down in its depths he whispered, "Beautiful as an angel," and aloud, with tones burdened with earnestness:

"Marion! Marion, I love you better than life itself! Will you be my wife?"

"Why, how you frightened me, Odin Moore!" said she, starting from her position with a well-dissembled nervous flutter and quick breathing. "Pray, what was it you said?"

Alas for Odin! His tongue threatened to refuse him utterance, and his face grew paler yet from the shock. "She could not have understood me," thought he; and bowing his head upon the hand he had dared to take, he said, with a more subdued tone:

"Will you be mine, Marion—my wife?"

"Why, really, Mr. Moore, you have been very sudden and precipitate, and the truth is, I have looked upon you as—a friend, and I am—an engaged."

She met no words in return, but a face so deadly white that her own paled with alarm. She took the arm that was proffered in silence, and carrying her wide-brimmed hat in her hand, endeavored to assume a very self-possessioned air as they walked to her home. Not a word as they parted at the garden gate, for Odin's heart was too full of bitterness and disappointment to frame an adieu, and Marion too proud of spirit to solicit one. She passed up the walk soliloquizing:

"This is a queer piece of business, at any rate, and performed mighty quick. He went overboard sooner than I imagined; but the stupid thing is well got rid of. This makes four this very summer. I must write about it to Nell." And the heartless girl soon grew very merry and facetious over a narration of that evening's pastime, as she coolly called it, to her friend.

But Odin had one to love him, and that with as much devotion and earnestness as he hoped from the false-hearted Marion. A singular, and wilful madcap of a girl was his only sister, and one who had tried his deep, pious heart most severely by her odd pranks, nevertheless she was his dearly loved sister, and he knew that in her nature were deep seated throbs of tender feeling that would respond to his own bleeding heart, and give him consolation and sympathy. He knew where her favorite resort was in the evening's glooming, and thither he went. She looked up with a smile, and prepared to welcome him to a lounge upon an ottoman, with his head in her lap, but noticing his white face said, with emphasis :

"Why, Odin! you must be very ill. What is the matter? Let me get you something."

"No, no, Marcia," waving her back with his hand, and trying to smile. "My case does not need medicine. I trust to Time as a successful physician. But if you will let me have my old place, I will tell you all."

He gave her a brother's confidence, and she listened with all her soul's indignation to a wrong done a trusting heart like his. He ended with "but call her more fickle than false, Marcia."

"More false than fickle, Odin. I know her well by reputation, and it says of her that she is as destitute of principle or a single iota of a good heart as a marble representation of her would be. O, she is a heartless flirt—a vain, capricious, wicked—"

"Hush, hush, sister! You must not speak thus of her. She may have had no kind mother's teachings to make her better. Let us forgive her, and leave her in peace. It is well, perhaps, that my foolish trust in human nature should be destroyed in this way."

"It is not well, in such a manner as this," Marcia said, silently, in her heart, and as she looked at her brother's pale features, high, thoughtful brow, and slender, consumptive form, she could not repress the rising tears. After the good-night had passed between them, she went to her chamber to meditate in anger on what he had told her, while his voice floated to her ears, with Marion's name borne upward on the wings of prayer. No one but herself knew of what she thought as she viewed with satisfaction her tall, well-developed figure in her mirror, and thanked fortune for substantial hands and feet, and the sickness which brought her black, curling locks under the clip of the barber's scissors. Some words escaped her lips audibly:

"Her measure shall be meted back to her, pressed down and running over. My brother, with his generous soul, will forgive and forget it if he can. His conscience is tender, while mine is as elastic as hers upon some matters, and this is one of them. He shall be avenged."

It was scarcely a week after Marion's dispensing with the love of Odin Moore, and she was beginning to feel ennuied, and impatient to return to her city home, in search of some new subject for experiment. It mattered not to her whether they were scented and milky-mouthed gallants, that babbled to her of never-dying attachment and adoring love, or men who poured the saved up love of a lifetime into her treacherous ears, as had Odin; a conquest was a conquest, even if the victim, forgetting the kind blue eyes of a confiding wife, should swear to be hers forever and none other's. Then the scorn with which she treated the poor dupe was magnificent, and the dilating violet eyes were full of shivers of flame for the trembling wretch who would have thought her an immaculate goddess were it not for vivid recollections of covert encouragement once read on the now triumphant face.

She sat gazing out of the window towards the beach, yawning, and wishing for some adventure, when the thought possessed her to call Neptune, her splendid great Newfoundland, and start for a roam on the shore. Away they went together, in high glee, the huge fellow racing and tumbling against her in his doggyish good spirits.

"I wonder if I can row that boat," said she, aloud, glancing at her damask palms, and then at the sailboat dancing most temptingly upon the water at the end of a long rope. "Nep, here, take hold with your teeth and help me pull it in." And the dog, seeming to understand her, did as his young mistress commanded.

"Perhaps if you are to have a sail this beautiful evening, you would not object to a stranger hand taking the guidance of the boat."

A most graceful start betrayed her surprise, as she turned in the direction of the voice, and saw a young gentleman after her most approved model standing, hat in hand, to hear her reply. She could find no objection to the well-trimmed whiskers and forked moustache so glossy and black, nor the soft, wavy hair, contrasting so well with them, nor the eyes, so very pleasant, even grave, as their owner was trying to make them look, nor the lips, nor the white teeth; and his dress, it was a la mode, and therefore he must be a gentleman born and bred. Be sure there was a dash of impudence in his presuming to address her, a perfect stranger, but then she could see no trace of it in his manner and face, so she thought, as she concluded her hasty glance of survey, that an adventure was before her (such things being doted upon with supreme delight by all such young ladies as Marion), and an Adonis for its hero. A charming blush rippled over her cheeks, and demurring a little, she said with a smile that brought a sparkle of admiration to the young stranger's eyes, as she interpreted it :

"With your word that you did not rise from the sea in quest of a hapless body to take back with you, and will bring me safely to the shore again, I will thankfully accept your services."

It was a slight but pleasant laugh that came from the young stranger's lips, as he bowed his thanks and said :

"I assure you that your fears are groundless. I address, I have no doubt, Miss George, for whom to exist is to be known ; but as I am an obscure individual I can claim no such distinction," handing her a card, upon which was written, "Shirley Horton."

They were soon seated in the boat, moving gaily over the water, for Marion's companion proved sufficiently entertaining, choosing, with great aptness, the very topics most interesting to her. He administered delicate compliments, in doses moderate enough to cause her to feel assured that they were not intended as mere words of flattery, and was so kind and solicitous in regard to her personal comfort that she really held him in esteem. Neptune, like a discreet dog, sat far apart, and bayed at the rising moon. He was obedient as well as discreet, and a single word from his mistress would have silenced him, but of course she did not care for that, as his noise made it convenient, proper, and very agreeable for the dark, handsome stranger to incline his head a trifle nearer hers in order to insure a more distinct hearing.

Neptune, if he heard, was not a good linguist, so no one could have their curiosity appeased by him, while the waves kept up their chant, deaf to all else, and the roguish stars only winked the merrier if now and then they caught a syllable. But the hour declared that it was time for them to be returning. Accordingly they obeyed, and headed their boat in the direction of the land, which was reached in due time, without Marion losing her balance and catching a bath in the briny element, or anything like a squall appearing to disturb the tenor of her spirits, which were remarkably even and placid. Before taking the walk to the house, her escort, with her upon his arm, turned to the sea and called her attention to that and the serene beauty of the night, discoursing eloquently of the former, as it lay glittering and shaking at the feet of the moon, as if in joy at the shower of shimmering light she threw lavishly down upon him, while the "rocking, white-capped waves" careered over his monstrous back in choruses of ringing glee.

"This is a very beautiful world, Miss George, especially in pleasant weather," remarked Horton, as they walked slowly away.

"It is, Mr. Horton, but I never thought so much of it as I have this summer, the only one indeed ever passed by me in the quiet country."

"Have you not enjoyed very much communion with nature in this lovely place?"

It was too bad that Marion was obliged to fib, but she was determined to make a good impression.

"I have intensely. Such splendid sunsets I never saw, and such glorious evenings."

She might have gone on and told him how once she went into raptures over a pink cloud, and would not be contented until she had searched every dry goods store in the city to obtain a fancied match.

"But the dawn, Miss George—you have certainly missed no opportunity to see the gates of day opened, and its god appear in all his regal glory?"

"Nep, keep off my dress, you dirty dog! See, he has put his paw right through this delicate tissue!" exclaimed she, as in great trepidation she held up the edge of her skirt, to discover the rent to be only a naughty footprint. She was enabled to regain her placidity by means of Horton's sympathy, and all calm again, her tormentor commenced :

"Let me see, what were we talking about just before? O, the sunrise, aurora—did you say you enjoyed the prospect?"

"Confound aurora! No, I don't like the prospect of being plagued like this all the time, by a bunch of conceit," was what she wanted to utter aloud, and what she thought, but with great sweetness she said, instead :

"Of course, one would be the possessor of a very dull mind not to enjoy it. The morning air is very bracing, and seems so elastic that one feels like being enervated from the ground by it."

"An elevation would not be safe so near the water, and if there is danger of it, I shall see that some one prohibits your taking morning walks."

His lip did not bleed as he bit it under his moustache, and Marion was too much engrossed by her own distress of mind to notice it if it had. She answered with a light, affected laugh, but said nothing.

"You must have an imaginative brain, Miss George. Do not the exquisite panoramas spread above you cause an expansion of soul and fledging of innate, though perhaps until this summer latent, poetical ideas? Or perhaps you are not inclined to a romantic or sentimental turn."

"O, romance!" said she, catching enthusiastically at the word. "I delight in it. If there is a being who has a passion for romance it is I. Sometimes my soul has been so full of it that I have thought I could if I chose write poetry."

Horton glanced at her face, and saw it turned to the sky with an ecstatic expression.

"But have you never written verse?"

"None of any importance—but I adore to read it."

"What kind has your preference, sentimental, didactic, epic, or epigrammatic?"

"I like all equally well. But which should you recommend me to read?"

"Sentimental for the present, and should you tire of that, by all means didactic would be the most suited to your mind and mood."

"Thank you. But will you not come in?"

"Thanks; but not this evening. Miss George, a repetition of the enjoyment of your society would be valued by me as a rare treat."

"Then I have not the heart to deprive you of it, sir. Good-night."

She laid her head upon her pillow that night a little piqued, very much pleased, but determined to see the end of what promised so pleasing a triumph. "Ay, he is smart, handsome, and I know by his jewelled repeater that he is rich. What will Nell say?"

Summer passed from sight, garlanded with withered flowers, and autumn, in her gorgeous robes and golden sandalled feet, reigned successor. Marcia Moore had watched her brother with an anxious eye, and saw with pain his tender, mournful eyes grow larger and more brilliant, his once firm step slow and feeble, and the white temples sunken. The hand of that flattering, insidious destroyer, consumption, was upon him; but as if in pity for the sensitive heart that had so suffered, was leading him gently down towards the gloomy valley. Marcia saw all this, and knew that when the soft-falling snow should enwrap the earth he would be lying in his last, dreamless sleep beneath it. She laid the burden at the door of Marion George, and from the deepest hatred of her heart cursed her for it.

Meanwhile, Shirley Horton continued his attentions to Marion. He shared her amusements and recreations, and his manner since the first evening had been studiously free from everything that could make her feel ill at ease. She discovered that his mind was richly cultivated, and the pearls of genius, talent, and wit shone in his brain. He had travelled, and could bring to her stores of information, and his ready language, always choice and elegant, with the low, pleasant tones that fell with such strange music upon her ear, succeeding in weaving securely the chains of fascination about her. Her first intention of adding him to the list of conquered lovers passed from her mind, and she now aimed to secure him for life. She loved for the first time, and with all the tender, thrilling, passionate devotion of such a love. Horton saw and knew it by her manner towards him, for she strove in vain to conceal it, and his only care was to rivet the chains tighter and make them more secure. Not a word of love had he spoken to her, with the exception of sentences which she knew were in jest, but had not every kind attention spoken it, every glance of the dark, deep eyes, so full of mysterious light? She knew that he loved her, and why did he not give words to it? She sat with him in the twilight, and playfully said:

"I was thinking to-day that you always chose the evening for visiting me. Why do you not allow the sun to light your footsteps here?"

"I promised my companionship to a sick friend during the day, and I must not be too selfish, you know."

"Who is this friend?"

"Odin Moore."

She could not repress a start, and an anxious look, as she inquired:

"Is he your friend? how long has he been so?"

"Since our days of youth. He seems in the grasp of consumption, and probably will never be better. Do you know him?"

"A slight acquaintance, that is all."

"It is said that a disappointment in love was the cause of his declining so rapidly. His sister told me this, but he has never mentioned it."

"Do you know the lady's name?" said Marion, with discomposure visible upon her features.

"I never inquired, and Miss Moore, probably in consideration of her brother, kept it from me. I have the impression that she is dead (to all things lofty and good, said he, mentally), and that was the nature of the disappointment."

"O, sir, you relieve me much by saying this. My first impression was that some heartless flirt had been practising her arts. I consider it a solemn thing to trifle with the affections."

"Most surely, Miss George, and one that brings its own reward. If any crime is punished upon earth, I think this is the first to be visited."

"It ought to be. They should be made to suffer in like manner."

"I am glad to find your feelings so in accordance with mine. It is like finding a pure dismond to make the acquaintance of a woman with a good and noble heart. It has been my determination to make such a heart mine when I should find it. Do you think such a woman would trust me with it?"

He looked very earnestly into her eyes, and she, trembling with joy at his words, laid her head upon his shoulder, and sighed:

"O, I am very happy! I have loved you long, dear Shirley!"

"Such words are very dear to me, Marion. Have I the permission to call you mine?"

"Yours, forever! You have all my love." She wept glad tears, as he folded her closer, and for a long time nothing was said.

"I must return now, Marion, and to-morrow leave the place on business, which will keep me a fortnight or more. You may think of me in the meantime as much as you please; and when I see you again, we will talk of—something else."

Marion's friend received far less of the particulars of this case, as she did of Odin's—for Marion this time, in her love, was chary of her confidence. However, she wrote to her that she was a bride elect, and should probably be married within a month, and begged her to come up and assist her in some preparations. Horton returned at the time specified, and Marion sent him a note, asking him if he had any objections to their marriage taking place on a day which she named, as she had a dear friend who wished to witness it before she returned, as she was obliged to do so soon. She received in reply:

"Consult your own convenience in regard to your marriage; it can have no possible relation to mine. I have never told you that I loved you, nor asked you to marry me. I shall never marry any woman—but have won your love, that you may know how cruelly my poor brother has suffered from your hands. You see it all now, my precious piece of artlessness, and remember, perhaps, that by your own words you condemned a coquette, yourself the chief among them! Take your punishment—and I care not if it humiliate you in the dust. I hope that you will find didactic poetry pleasant reading now. My brother is on his dying bed, and prays for you, the one who brought him there. Remember that, and recognize justice."

It was signed "Marcia Moore, alias Shirley Horton."

She read it with a blanched face and trembling lips, and with a moan sank to the floor, saying:

"My punishment is harder than I can bear!"

A fever followed, and for weeks she tossed upon waves of delirium. Consciousness returned one gloomy day, when a heavy cloud-hung sky lowered over earth. The wind rose and sank in sobbing breaths, and the cold rain struck aslant on the pane, and drove through the air in sheets. Marcia Moore stood at her brother's bedside with an agony in her heart never felt before. She knew by the cold moisture of the brow, that the death-angel had baptized it with the dew from the dark river, and that his feet were already descending into the cold clasp of its waters.

Down he went in holy confidence, leaning upon the arm of an invisible Friend; and as his weeping sister watched him, a strange light passed over his features, like the reflection of an angel's wing, and told that he was at rest.

Marion's experience seemed to transform her whole character. She was pale and spirit-like, and one evening was seen upon her bended knees before God, acknowledging the justness of her punishment, thanking him for her life, with the solemnly spoken vow to never again be guilty of a like transgression.

Marcia saw her changed manner and life, and actually humbled herself before her as a suppliant for forgiveness.

"Ask God, as I did, Marcia Moore. The lesson you taught me was the best of my life. I thank you for it; for in that hour's crucifixion, I felt the thorns my own hands had placed upon the heads of others, and from my remorse was lifted to a better life."

NON-INFLAMMABLE DRESS FABRICS.

The ladies will be glad to learn that a method has been discovered by which any dress fabric may be rendered non-inflammable. By direction of Queen Victoria, two distinguished English chemists undertook a series of experiments which have resulted in determining that a solution containing seven per cent. of the crystals or sixty-two per cent. of anhydrous salt is perfectly anti-flammable. They remark: "Tungstate of soda ranges among the salts which are manufactured on a large scale, and at a cheap rate. A solution containing twenty per cent. renders the muslin perfectly non-inflammable. It acts, apparently, by firmly enveloping the fibre, and thereby excluding the contact with the air. It is very smooth and of a fatty appearance, like talc, and this property facilitates the ironing process, which all other salts resist." The following formula is given as having proved efficacious, and will simplify the application: "A concentrated neutral solution of tungstate of soda is diluted with water to 28° Twaddle (an alkalimeter, so called), and then mixed with three per cent. of phosphate of soda. This solution was found to keep and to answer well. It has been introduced into her majesty's laundry, where it is constantly used." The solution can be applied to any fabric. It is only necessary to dip the cleansed article in the prepared fluid, then drain and dry it, after which it may be ironed; or, if preferred, the solution may be incorporated with the starch to be used in the stiffening.

"IN MEMORIAM."

BY J. HOWARD WERT.

Sweet roaming in the balmy breeze beneath the purple tide,
I first beheld, one golden eve, my beautiful, my bride;
Her fastooned locks of silken curls were flung around her face,
Whose joyous smile bespoke no care, nor sorrow's dimming trace.

Her lips with tints of ruby pearl, and eyes of azure blue,
Fixed my bewildered gaze on her, yet why, I scarcely knew;
The silver cadence of her tones fell softer on the ear
Than sighing zephyrs in the plain, or Thetis' sea-born tear.

The warbling streams that ripple by in Maia's flowery hours,
Or nymph-like brooks in Cnidus thrown, from Crete's refulgent bowers,
Chant not so sweetly on their course, nor beam so soft and bright,
As does the music of her voice, and beams her eye with light.

She was the image of my hopes, my passions, and my fears,
The angel form, of whom I dreamed through long-forgotten years;

But memory such as mine of her so very much endears,
When death is nigh my latest sigh will not be life's, but her's.

GOLDEN HILL.

A STAFFORDSHIRE STORY.

BY LIEUT. T. SMITH REED.

ABOUT half a century ago there was a famous battle fought in Belgium, and a great many good soldiers were killed there, and although it is almost forgotten now, and there remains little of the victory but the name of the thing, it was thought much of in those times; wise men said that it had settled Europe, had driven Bonaparte and all his family out of France forever, and had firmly fixed the Bourbons on the French throne. We do not see many remains of all these fine effects now-a-days; but the memory of the battle may serve as an introduction to a little story about one of the soldiers who fought then.

Jean Gerrard, a captain in H. M. 12th, or as it was disrespectfully called, in the service—the dirty dozen—had put himself right in the way of a Polish lancer, who put his lance through Jean's body, just as a boy would put a pin through a fly. Jean, who had served in the "die-hard," would not readily give up the ghost; he was tumbled over by the lancers as they rode forward, and he was tumbled over by them again, as followed by the English heavy dragoons, they rode back again. But Jean held fast to his life, and some six months after the battle, was in full enjoyment of half pay at a place he had down in Staffordshire.

And a queer old place was Gerrard Cross. Somehow or other the estate kept growing smaller and smaller, as it grew older. Jean's grandfather had given a great dinner to George II., and a great slice of the best land about Gerrard Cross, somehow or other, was used for the dinner. Jean's father, among roystering gentlemen, experimenting adventurers, and unsuccessful attempts to find a coal mine, used up another great piece of the family estate, so that there remained for Jean Gerrard very little besides the old house, a couple of hundred acres of black-looking, stony land, and the abandoned shafts of an unproductive coal mine. Jean, however, was received and welcomed as quite a hero by the landed gentry in the neighborhood, and was an especial favorite with Sir Edward Melburn, of Melburn Grange, who one fine morning in October rode under the windows of Gerrard Cross, and hailed the half-pay officer.

"Come along, Jean, the hounds throw off at 10 at Copley Corner; we drag the scrub—sure of a find—lovely morning! Come along!"

"My mare's lame, Sir Edward," Jean Gerrard answered, as he stood at an open window.

"Why did you not send word? Here's Davis, however, with Trumpeter, jump on. Davis, let Captain Gerrard have Trumpeter, you can go back and bring out Squirt or one of the others. Come, get into your scarlet and come along."

Jean Gerrard put his head outside the window frame, and as he did so he changed color at perceiving a young lady on horseback, in conversation with a handsome young man, who was very impassioned in his manner. Sir Edward Melburn noticed Jean Gerrard's disturbed look, and unaware that the lord and the captain knew each other, attributed them to a touchy dislike of new acquaintance, as he knew Jean was rather haughty in that matter, so he said, carelessly:

"It's only Lord Stanmore and Flora."

Sir Edward Melburn thought that this piece of information ought to be quite satisfactory to Jean Gerrard, who, however, was not of the same opinion, and the baronet added:

"Flora is to marry him. Come along!"

Gentlemen don't swear now—they sometimes swore pretty roundly, when "our men were in Flanders," forty years ago, and Jean Gerrard had not left off his habit of swearing, when he put off his uniform. He rapped out a round oath as he mounted Trumpeter, and said, half aloud: "Ha, ha, my Lord Stanmore, we shall have a gallop to-day!"

"Come, Gerrard, we're late," Sir Edward called out, as he turned half round in his saddle, and looked back.

Sir Edward did not for an instant suppose that a half-pay captain, even with a Waterloo medal on his breast, would be in love with Flora, and if he had thought that Jean Gerrard could be afflicted with such insanity, he would have regarded him with the pity one bestows upon a harmless lunatic.

There was hard riding that day. The two young men, although scarcely civil to each other, rode together in competitive emulation, aware that Flora Melburn was the spectator of their daring horsemanship. Jean Gerrard fancied that Flora endeavored to draw him aside from the rest of the hunt, but with jealous ill-temper, he avoided a tete-a-tete, until late in the afternoon on their way homeward, he found himself in a lane, with Flora alone at his side.

Flora's red lips pouted a little, a flush of pale pink added to the beauty of her fair complexion, her golden hair was a little ruffled by the wind, and her bright forehead drooped upon her arched eyebrows as she said: "Captain Gerrard, you treated me unkindly to-day."

Jean Gerrard's heart bounded, and with one great throb every sentiment of jealous anger was displaced by gratified and grateful affection for the confiding tone of the woman he loved. He desired to hear those kindly-spoken words again drop softly from those red, restless lips, that quivered a little in unison with the tear that trembled but did not fall, and Flora repeated:

"You treated me unkindly to-day."

"It was unintentionally, then, and unknowingly. Tell me how?"

"You should not have left me so much alone with Lord Stanmore."

Jean Gerrard's heart gave two or three big bumps that threatened the button-holes of his waistcoat. The words rang in his ears, the tone thrilled to his marrow, and the look that flashed under the long lashes of Flora's dark blue eyes, disturbed his equanimity and philosophy more than they had been affected by the French batteries, or the lancers' charge at Waterloo. But Jean, although a young man, was an old soldier, and he had not the most remote idea of surrendering himself, body and soul, to a woman, or admitting the enemy into the citadel of his heart, at the first summons. In fact he suspected treachery, or at least an ambushade. He knew his exact position in society; he was fully aware of the great littlenesses that separated him from the heiress of the rich baronet, whose estates spread far and wide over the hills and valleys, and embraced coal and iron mines in their wealth, and he had very cautiously determined that he wouldn't risk an action with the beautiful and wealthy young lady, until he was pretty certain of success. So saying to himself, "We'll throw out our skirmishers before we advance in line," he replied to Miss Flora:

"Really, and was I not right in declining to play gooseberry to you?"

"What do you mean by gooseberry?"

"Monsieur de Trop! Mr. Onetoomany?"

"Captain Gerrard, are you not my friend?"

"Yes, very much your friend, Flora; but you know Lord Stanmore is your accepted lover."

"No, Jean Gerrard, there you are misinformed. I have not accepted him. But what can I do? Advise me."

Jean winced. Those large blue eyes, shining like violets wet with morning dew, made the old lance wound twinge again—they looked right into his heart—and as he could not think what to say, he whistled, and tickled Trumpeter's ears with the lash of his hunting whip. Flora rode close to his side, leaned towards him, and laid her hand upon his wrist.

"Now, Flora, don't touch me, I'm a barrel of gunpowder, and if you put the match to me, I shall go off with a bang. Don't touch me!"

Flora's red lips parted with a smile, and the two friends rode on in silence, which Jean Gerrard was the first to break. He said:

"Lord Stanmore swears he'll shoot any fellow that makes love to you."

"Does he, though?"

"Yes, he does. He showed me his pistols the other day, and explained exactly how he intended to use them."

"That was very kind of him," said Flora, smiling and flashing her eye.

"There's a good many fellows that would not mind being shot, if they were sure of going to heaven afterwards, Flora."

"People say 'A dark man is a jewel in a fair woman's eye. Don't you like Stanmore, he's very dark!'"

Flora answered with a peremptory "no!" and she looked at the sunburnt face of Jean Gerrard with a glance that said, "You are the darkest man I ever knew," as plainly as if she had spoken the words.

"Why don't you send him about his business?"

"I have refused him seven times, Jean Gerrard."

"And you mean to have him at last?"

"Advise me, Jean Gerrard. My father wishes it, and although he will not control me, he endeavors to persuade me. He has taken a great interest in the match, which seems very desirable to everybody except poor Flora Melburn."

Jean Gerrard was bothered. He had finished his education under the Iron Duke, who always prepared for a retreat before he made an advance, and Jean, who looked upon love much in the same way as Wellington watched Massena, knew that he had no lines of Torres Vedras to retire to if he should propose to Flora and be refused.

"There are lots of fellows in love with you,"

"Are there? Who are they?"

"There's Charley Pritchard."

"Don't like him well enough, Jean."

"Fred Hardinge."

"Wont do, Jean."

"Jack Airy."

"No. Is there nobody else, Jean?"

Jean gazed straight between Trumpeter's ears, and rode on in silence for half a minute. Then pulling Trumpeter across, so as to bring Flora's horse to a standstill, he looked full into the anxious eye of the beautiful girl, and said abruptly:

"Who's that fellow that you are always laughing at, because, as you say, his face is all snuff and butter?"

Flora's face suffused, and then turned very pale. Jean Gerrard rode on again, and said:

"A man who loves a woman, does not like to be laughed at, and ridiculed by her, Flora."

"How is a woman to know that a man loves her, if he does not tell her?" Flora inquired.

"By ever so many ways, ever so many things."

"Tell me some of them."

"First of all, a man that really loves a woman, thinks of her happiness more than he cares about his own; he remonstrates with her, when he thinks she is doing wrong, or acting foolishly; he watches over her, as a miser watches over his hoarded gold; he is always trying to do something to please her, and if he fancies that his attentions are troublesome or unwelcome, he keeps out of her way."

Flora smiled wickedly as she replied, "Lor, Jean, why that's just what you do."

"Me! O, I'm old snuff and butter, you know."

"Forgive me for that, Jean?"

"On one condition."

"What is it?"

"Tell me, honestly, can you ever love old snuff and butter?"

Flora did not speak, but somehow or other Jean Gerrard's arm got round her waist, and—No, I'll not tell what happened, something must be left to the reader's imagination.

"And now, Flora, you must speak to your father," said Jean.

"Me! That's excellent."

"Of course, if we are to help each other up the rough hill of life, the sooner we begin the better."

"Well, you must speak to papa."

"No, you, Flora."

"No, no, you, Jean!"

"No, no, I shall have to settle with the lord; you must talk to the baronet."

"My dear Jean, I dare not tell my father, so that's a fact."

"Well, Flora, if I am to tell him you must take care that all the doors and windows are left open, for he will certainly pitch me out of one of them, and I would rather not be forced through the glass or the pannels."

The tete-a-tete was abruptly terminated by the appearance of Sir Edward Melburn and Lord Stanmore, and the lovers separated. That evening, as Jean Gerrard was pacing backward and forward in the old hall at Gerrard Cross, his servant announced Major Goldie.

This gentleman, an officer exceedingly well made up, and attached to the cavalry department at Stafford, in consequence of the unusual magnitude to which his breast was padded, was called the "pewter pigeon."

"Ma deere feller," the major commenced, "this is a deuced unpleasant affair, aw! The fact is, Lord Stanmore is deucedly annoyed at your attentions to Miss Melburn, aw!"

Jean Gerrard was not so impressed by the major's importance as the major desired, and replied carelessly: "Is he, indeed?"

"Yaas, and of coorse you know, as his lordship is the young lady's accepted lover, it is highly improper that you should pay her particular attention."

"But supposing, major," said Jean, with a good-natured laugh, "supposing his lordship is a discarded lover, what then?"

"Really, aw, I cannot, really I cannot, suppose anything so ridiculous."

"It is the fact, nevertheless. I think that I had better see Stanmore, and explain the affair."

"O, aw, impossible, altogether contrary to usage. I act for my principal, and will receive any explanation."

"Major, you'll get no explanation from me."

"And you will persist in your attentions to Miss Melburn?"

"Most assuredly. There, now, don't be in a hurry, don't let us make a mull of the affair. Don't call me out, because I sha'n't go."

"Really, aw," gasped the major, almost petrified with astonishment, "really, this is most extraordinary."

Jean Gerrard laughed gaily, and the major looked angry as he said:

"I hope, Captain Gerrard, you are not laughing at me."

"Not at all, my dear fellow, not at all, I assure you. There, I see Stanmore himself; excuse me for five minutes, I'll be back directly."

Jean Gerrard bounded out at the French window that opened on to the lawn, and ran down to the bottom of the avenue, where Lord Stanmore was impatiently waiting the return of his messenger.

"Goldie has just been with me, Stanmore, and I thought it better that you and I should talk the matter over by ourselves, as I have a high opinion of your judgment, and am sure that you would not unnecessarily make Miss Melburn a subject for the scandal of all the country."

"Certainly, I would not, sir."

"Well, then, I'll tell you a secret that is known only to Flora and myself. We are going to be married."

"Impossible, sir!"

"Nevertheless, quite true. You know there is no accounting for a woman's taste, and it is a fact that if you should be in the church, and your wedding ring half upon Flora's finger, if I should whistle to her, she would come to me. Now just fancy what a pretty life you would lead with that woman for your wife. Think over the matter seriously, and with that excellent common sense for which you are well-known. Flora likes you very much as a friend, so do I; and when we are married, we shall be delighted to see you at all times."

"Captain Gerrard, I am accepted by Sir Edward Melburn as his son-in-law."

"My dear Lord Stanmore, I am accepted by Miss Melburn as her husband. There is no use in the world for us to quarrel about her. If you shoot me, she cannot marry you afterwards, because I am really her husband."

"What, married?"

"No, no, but we are engaged as man and wife, as far as man's and woman's truth can bind us. I would not tell this to Goldie, because I want to make a friend of you. Everything has been fair and above board. Flora told me everything this morning, and I as a man of honor, tell you, confiding in your honor. If we should fight about the matter, we should certainly be laughed at, and I—whatever you may think I don't know—I hate to be laughed at."

"It is not pleasant," Lord Stanmore replied, a little testily.

"Don't take my word for what I tell you, just ask Flora, she will receive you as her friend, as our friend; tell her just what I have said, and if she does not confirm and repeat what I have told you, why then you shall fire at me as long as you like. I hope, however, that that excellent sense for which you are so generally admired, will lead you to the conclusion that your happiness will be best consulted by your continuing to be Flora's friend."

At this part of the dialogue, Major Goldie came down from the house and said, pompously:

"Really, Captain Gerrard, this is a very irregular proceeding, you must be aware that in these affairs, the principals should have no personal communication."

"Such an affair as the present, major," replied Jean Gerrard, "is unusual, and you shall excuse me, if I arrange it according to my own notions. Good evening!"

The next morning early, Jean Gerrard was in Sir Edward Melburn's library.

"What is it now, Jean?" said Sir Edward.

Jean was restless, fidgetty and undecided as to what he should say.

"I want to speak to you, Sir Edward."

"Speak? well, speak."

"I have something particular to say to you, Sir Edward."

"Say it now."

"It must be said, and the sooner it is said the better. Sir Edward—I—" And Jean blurted out, "I love your daughter!"

Sir Edward Melburn whistled.

"And, Sir Edward, Flora loves me."

"The deuce she does!"

Jean could not mistake—Jean saw that the old gentleman was in a towering passion; but Jean had expected a much more violent outbreak, and he continued:

"And so, Sir Edward, I have come to ask your consent to our marriage."

"Ugh, and if I don't give my consent you intend to marry without it, perhaps?"

"No, sir, it is a bad beginning to a husband's happiness, if her wife's first step is made in opposition to her father."

"Hang your aphorisms, sir! Now, Captain Gerrard, you expect Flora will bring you a fortune?"

"I did not think much about it; but I suppose she will."

"Captain Gerrard, you know that I have had a very high opinion of you ; if I had not thought very much of your honor, I should not have permitted you to say half what you have said upon this subject. But, Jean Gerrard, I will not consent that you shall marry Flora."

"Very well, sir. Flora will not consent to marry any one else."

"That's all very fine. You both are excellent calculators, no doubt ; but you are like young bears—all your troubles are before you."

"Sir Edward, they are so far ahead that we never shall overtake them."

"A very fine resolution, Captain Gerrard. Meanwhile, as there is not much more for you and I to say upon this subject, and as we need not express our differing opinions any further, suppose you leave me to talk the matter over with Flora ?"

That morning Jean received a short note from Flora, telling him she was locked into a suite of rooms, consisting of bedroom, sitting-room and library, and that the servants had most absolute orders to prevent his entrance on the premises of Melburn Grange.

Every one who has witnessed a fire in a remote country district, at a distance from every large town, will know that the devastating element is seldom arrested under such circumstances as long as there remains anything that can be consumed, and the reader will not be surprised that when a fire broke out at Gerrard Cross, the thatched roofs, wooden barns, sheds, pig-sties, corn-stacks, and hay-ricks, were consumed with the old mansion of the Gerrards.

Jean Gerrard's premises were uninsured. He looked at the ruins of his lost property as at the destruction of his last chance of obtaining Sir Edward Melburn's consent to his union with Flora, and when one of the many persons from the neighboring village and mining district who had been attracted to the scene, congratulated Jean upon his good fortune, he grimly thanked the facetious gentleman for his ill-timed pleasantry. But when the visitor, a well-known and experienced iron master, persisted in his opinion that the Gerrard Cross would make Jean Gerrard one of the richest men in the country, Jean not only listened to him, but accompanied him to examine the ashes of a stone wall that had been burnt. No great surprise had been expressed when the stone wall caught fire, because the people about knew that it had been built of a sort of bituminous shale that had encouraged the unfortunate mining adventure of Jean's father, but were not sufficiently ignitable for sale. But the astonishment was great when the residue of the wall was declared to consist of nearly pure iron, and every one wondered that a mere accident should have discovered a metallic substance so mingled with inflammable matter, that, without additional fuel, it would fuse itself by the action of fire. The people immediately named the place Golden Hill—and a golden hill it proved to Jean Gerrard. The mere mention of the name unlocked the door of Flora's prison, and Jean and Flora met under the trees in Melburn Grange. A few days afterward Sir Edward Melburn met Jean, and said :

"Have you given up your pretensions to my daughter, Captain Gerrard ?"

"No sir !"

"Look here, Jean Gerrard ! I have heard of your meeting under the trees, and I have heard of your good fortune, so give me your hand ! Now ride over to the Grange to dinner, and settle with Flora about the wedding day."

If the reader should travel in Staffordshire, and should visit Golden Hill, he will see there on the spot where the old mansion of Gerrard Cross once stood, steam engines, furnaces, and all the varied apparatus of extensive iron works ; and if he should receive an invitation to Melburn Grange, Captain Gerrard, now an old man, will give him a reception to his happy home circle.

AN OLD "SALT'S" OPINION.

"You see," Buzzy would say to Fred, "it's not altogether that her figure-head is cut after a perfect pattern, by no means, for I've seen pictures and statues that was better ; but she carries her head a little down d'ye see, Master Fred, and there's where it is ; that's the way I gauges the worth of young women, just accordin' as they carry their chins up or down. If their brows come well forward, and they seems to be lookin' at the ground they walk on, I knows their brains is firm stuff, and in good workin' order ; but when I sees them carryin' their noses high out o' the water, as if they was afraid o' catchin' sight o' their own feet, and their chins elevated, so that a little boy standin' in front of them couldn't see their faces no how, I make pretty sure that t'other end is filled with a sort o' musak that's fit only to think o' dress and dancing."—Day Book.

SMALL THINGS.

The simplest flowers with honeyed sweets are stored,
The smallest thing may happiness afford,
A kindly word may give a mind repose,
Which hardly spoken might have led to blows ;
The smallest crust may save a human life,
The smallest act may lead to human strife,
The slightest touch may cause the body pain,
The smallest spark may fire a field of grain,
The simplest act may tell the truly brave,
The smallest skill may serve a life to save,
The smallest drop the thirsty may relieve,
The slightest look may cause the heart to grieve,
The slightest sound may give the mind alarm,
The smallest thing may do the greatest harm ;
Naught is so small but it may good contain,
Afford us pleasure, or award us pain.—EDMUND HILL.

THE PARTING.

BY ELIZA FRANCES MORIARTY.

We parted when the merry Spring
 Went dancing through her world of flowers;
 The love-birds, that so sweetly sing,
 Were building in the budding bowers,
 And the south wind softly blowing,
 And the streamlets gently flowing,
 Made sweet music down the hills,
 Mid the golden daffodils.

We parted when the morn awoke
 And lightly chased night's shades of sadness;
 Beside the way these words you spoke,
 "In God's good time we'll meet in gladness."
 And we saw the glory quiver
 O'er the laughing, bubbling river;
 Down on rock and hill it fell,
 As we breathed a long farewell.

We parted, and I stood alone,
 Thy words of love and faith repeating;
 The light from out my heart had flown,
 As thus I watched thy form retreating.
 Woodland anthemings beguiling,
 Nature all around me smiling,
 Mocked the grief that o'er me swept
 As, beloved, for thee I wept.

THE YOUNG PRIVATEER.

BY LIEUTENANT MURRAY.

CHAPTER I.

ABOUT the period of the famous tea-party in Boston harbor, when a whole ship's cargo was emptied into the bay by the determined citizens, and when the mother country received a startling and unmistakable hint of what sort of material the Bay Provinces was composed, the opening scene in our story commences. The northern portion of Boston, that region now known as North Street, was then the court end of the town, peopled with the wealthiest and most refined of the inhabitants.

At that period fine residences, with pleasant surroundings, and large, well-cultivated gardens sloping down to the shore, graced what has since become the resort and abode of vice and misery. Where the vile dance-cellars and gin-shops now are, refinement and beauty graced the scene; stone walls and thickly clustering tenements had not entirely excluded vegetation, for here and there noble old trees bent gracefully over pleasant house fronts, and even fruit trees bore grateful fruits, and garden flowers flavored the atmosphere with dainty fragrance.

In the rear of those dwellings lay the beautiful harbor, the islands dotting the bay with fairy-like grace and beauty, covered with thrifty foliage, now entirely gone; but few sails were seen here and there, where forests of masts now lie, for Boston was in its infancy, and gave little promise of the thrifty and rich metropolis of the present day. The people, though restive under the arbitrary rule of the mother country, yet offered no open resistance to the royal sway, but the seeds of revolution were already sown, and would soon burst forth, to grow and strengthen into open revolt.

The residence of Lionel Bancroft, a wealthy merchant, was located in the immediate neighborhood we have described, his vessels anchored within long pistol shot of his garden walls, and a happy family sat around his plentiful board. Adjoining the residence of the Bancrofts was that of Colonel Hugh Browness, a civil and political agent of the home government, who was a strong royalist, while Lionel Bancroft was as ardent a champion of the patriot stamp, and save upon this one topic the two men and their families were the warmest friends. Especially were Herbert Bancroft, an only son, and Lydia Browness, the only daughter of the colonel, dear and intimate friends.

Herbert and Lydia had grown up together, constant playmates in childhood, and still constant companions at the ages of sixteen and twenty, Herbert being just four years the senior of his gentle companion. The intimacy of their children seemed to coincide perfectly with the wishes of the parents, and there appeared to be no turbid waters in their pleasant stream of life and love. They were seldom separated, except by an occasional voyage which Herbert made in his father's vessels, at first as supercargo, but afterwards as second, and then as first officer, until indeed he had been raised to the post of captain at the age of twenty. Self-reliant and manly in every respect, he had proved himself fully equal to the trust, and was indeed a good sailor.

Herbert and Lydia were already formally betrothed, and their young and loving hearts were looking forward to the tender consummation of their happiness, when the bitterness arising between the home government and the colonists began to assume an earnestness that foreshadowed the coming contest. Colonel Browness, as an agent of the throne, was bitterly sarcastic on the matter of politics, while Lionel Bancroft was firm in the support of his principles. The hitherto warm friends gradually became separated in interests and feelings, until all intercourse between the families ceased. Herbert was absent on his last voyage which was to transpire previous to his proposed marriage, at the time when this state of affairs had opened the aspect of which we have spoken.

Soon a British army occupied Boston, the property of the patriotic citizens was seized and confiscated. Rich merchants became beggars, or equivalent to beggars in point of possessions, and Lionel Bancroft, among the rest, lost all. Herbert, fully sympathizing with his father, and the patriot cause, formed a compact with a few daring spirits, and fitting out a schooner of convenient size, rendered himself a constant thorn to the government authorities, by capturing and destroying every small craft that ventured to sea, or was inward bound from Europe. The daring of himself and crew became proverbial, and scarcely a week passed that he did not send arms and ammunition, captured from the enemy, to the patriot army encamped without the city.

Thoroughly acquainted with every bay and inlet upon the coast, his adroitness enabled him to evade the English cruisers, and yet to take advantage of every circumstance that offered in the way of prizes. At length General Washington broke ground on Dorchester Heights, and when he threatened to open fire upon the invading army, it was with some of the very guns and powder which Herbert Bancroft had captured and furnished for his country's cause. Success rendered him too daring, and after months of singular luckiness, and after rendering vast aid to his suffering country, both by crippling the enemy, and by the valuable munitions he captured, young Bancroft was captured by an English cruiser, and himself and companions sent in a convict ship to England, to be treated as criminals of the deepest dye.

His father, Lionel, fell at Breed's Hill; the only sister and mother sank under deprivation and sorrow, and the once rich and happy family was thus dispersed, and save the prisoner, Herbert, had gone to their long rest, where wars, and rumors of wars, are heard no more.

CHAPTER II.

Peace had just been declared in England between Great Britain and the United States, the long and bloody war of our national independence had at length been brought to a close. Commerce, which had been completely stagnated between the two countries, was again about to open, merchants on either side of the Atlantic were eager to exchange their wares, and a fleet of sails were preparing at Liverpool for an American voyage. Seamen were in demand, and good ones very scarce and hard to find. The good ship Sea Nymph was lying at a single anchor, only waiting to complete her crew in order to spread her broad wings for the transatlantic voyage, when a shore boat pulled alongside, and a poorly dressed young man, with a rough, heavy beard, hailed the deck, and asked if a hand was wanted on board the Sea Nymph?

"We want just one more man before the mast, can you ship as a good seaman?" was the query of the officer.

"Ay, ay, sir."

"Where are your traps?"

"I have nothing but what is about me."

"Hey, that don't look just right, but we are in haste now," continued the captain, for such he evidently was, "so tumble aboard, you look as though you might do duty."

In a moment more the new-comer was on the deck, and after a few words with the captain was sent forward to his duty. The anchor was hove up, and sail after sail sent in rapid succession, until the Sea Nymph carried a little mound of foam caused by her speed, under her fore-foot. Before night came on the watches were set, the decks cleared up, and the voyage might be said to be fairly commenced. Jack Foster, as the last comer had given his name, bore a ready hand, and showed that he was no stranger to the deck of a ship, whatever fortune or roguery might have sent him aboard.

The Sea Nymph had a valuable freight of miscellaneous goods, and in the cabin a couple of passengers, who were evidently father and daughter. During the pleasant days of the early part of the voyage, the lady, who was a young and beautiful being, passed much of her time on the quarter-deck, where the captain had a spare topsail rigged as an awning, and under which she sat with her father, and read or chatted pleasantly of the various themes suggested by the wide expanse of ocean, and the trifling variations of the voyage. But this pleasant beginning of the voyage was destined to be of brief duration, and Captain Gore, the commander, found his hands full, in meeting the emergencies of hard weather and contrary winds. In the haste to get to sea, and in the dearth of good sailors, he had been compelled to ship a couple of men as mates, who soon proved themselves notoriously inefficient as officers, and consequently the captain did not dare to leave the deck for a moment in severe weather.

It had been a very threatening afternoon, but the wind had not been heavy; there only seemed to be a storm gathering, but no actual violence had yet been manifested by the brewing storm. The two passengers were standing quietly on the quarter-deck near the captain, who was watching the signs of the weather, when there came a sudden lull, and immediately after a heavy flow of wind struck the ship and careened her so far over that her main yard dipped in the sea, and every one was thrown from their feet. As each one upon deck recovered his position, it became instantly evident, first that Captain Gore had been struck a blow by some substance in his fall, which had completely stunned him, and also terrible to behold, that that fair and beautiful being who had been the light of all eyes a moment before, was now tossed far over the ship's side into the sea!

Consternation seemed to have seized upon every one. There stood the father at the ship's side, with frenzied eyes and outstretched hands towards his child, the two mates stood confounded and silent, the crew looked on in amazement, while the captain lay senseless, if not dead! At that moment a light but manly form was seen to spring into the mizzen chains, at the same time throwing off his coat and hat, as he shouted to the man at the wheel:

"Down with your helm, hard down!"

"Ay, ay, sir," exclaimed the obedient helmsman, instinctively.

"Look alive, men!" continued he who had thus spoken. "Do you sleep? Back the main yard, lively, with a will now. Lay aft here, some of you, and lower the quarter boat, and pick me up!"

These words were uttered in a deep, cheerful voice, but every syllable breathed of authority, and the men sprang to obey, while the form of Jack Foster, for it was he who had come forward at that critical moment, was seen to leap fearlessly into the sea!

The steady stroke of the brave seaman soon brought him by the now half-lifeless body of the fair girl, who had not yet entirely sunk from sight at any moment, the sustaining power of her clothes being sufficient to float her for some moments, but her head was under the wave, and life was fast ebbing away. The arm of Jack Foster, however, was soon about her, supporting her head above the water, and there sustaining it, he slowly but steadily exerted himself to keep the surface of the treacherous element until the boat should reach them.

The ship had drifted some distance before the boat could be launched, but the men bent their ashen oars half double with every stroke, and at length, but not one moment too soon, the almost exhausted seaman and his precious burthen were safely hauled into the boat. Notwithstanding the cheer of gladness which those hearty, whole-souled men poured out at the rescue, yet a thrill of horror passed over their faces, as all beheld the significant sight of a shark's dorsal fin above the surface of the water, just where the two human beings had been but a single moment before!

Father and daughter were soon again in each other's arms. In the meantime, Captain Gore was borne to his cabin, and the passengers and steward made every intelligent effort to revive him. He was not dead, but fearfully stunned and wounded.

CHAPTER III.

THE Sea Nymph had made but indifferent speed, and had been driven at times much out of her course; at the present moment, she was in the vicinity of the Western Islands. Scarcely had the boat been once more hoisted to the davits and secured, after the events described in our last chapter, before ~~she~~ a gale came down upon the ship in earnest, and owing to the circumstances already described, the craft was in a most unfortunate condition to withstand its power. The first squall struck the ship flat aback, and with a crack and snapping of stays, her main to'gallant masts broke off short at the topmast head and came thundering down upon deck. The mizzen to'gallant mast, deprived of its head stays, and strained by the shock, now followed—crashing down upon the poop-deck.

A scene of wild confusion followed. The ship was almost upon her beams' end, and unless speedily relieved, destruction was inevitable. Some of the men, in their desire to do something, and in the absence of all authority, had let go the to'gallant halyards and sheets, and the top-sail halyards, but the yards were pressed so closely to the masts, that they could not be clewed down. Twenty voices were raised, with as many different propositions, when Foster, still dripping with water, sprang upon the quarter deck.

"Silence, fore and aft!" he shouted, sternly. "Lay aft here and shiver the maintopsail, all of ye! Cheerily, men—cheerily! Have ye never seen a squall at sea before?"

These tones thrilled through the crew, and even the mates sprang with the rest to obey the order by clapping on to the main braces. Order after order followed, given in true seaman-like tones and spirit. The ship having been boxed round, the yards were squared, and she ran before the wind until the canvass had been properly reduced, when she was once more laid as near to her proper course as possible.

"Who took the ship out of that squall?" asked the captain of one of the mates who came to him in his berth at this time.

"The fellow rated as Jack Foster."

"Well, sir, do you hear? that man commands this ship until I come on deck again. I heard his orders. He's a true seaman. Send him to me, for I cannot stir from here. I've got a heavy hurt, certainly."

Jack Foster came below to Captain Gore, as he ordered, and after a few words of intelligent and seamanlike conversation, the captain sent for the mates and told them his wishes, and gave them orders to obey Mister Foster. He emphasized the prefix, and look ye, it is Mister Foster, from this time. The heroic sailor was at once transferred from the forecabin to the cabin, and stepped as quietly and unostentatiously into his new position as though he had shipped in that capacity at the commencement of the voyage. Scarcely had this arrangement taken place, and ere Mr. Foster had time to procure dry clothing, even had he been supplied with the necessary change, when duty called him again to the deck.

That startling cry on shipboard of "breakers ahead!" rang through the ship, and as soon as the new officer reached the deck, he saw that the first mate had at once attempted to tack ship, but she would not go in stays under so short sail. The wind was blowing a gale, there was no room to wear, and on—the vessel drove towards the breakers. One quick, intelligent glance sufficed to inform the new commander of the position of everything, and the full extent of the danger.

"Lay aloft, some of you for'ard, and loose the foresail!" he cried, with startling energy.

And in a moment, a dozen brave fellows sprang up the rigging to obey the order.

"Man the fore sheet! Stand by to slack away handsomely on the lee clew garnet and buntlines, three or four of you. Hold fast your bunt gasket till we are ready. Have a care, now!"

"All ready, for'ard, sir," cried out the mate.

"Very well, let fall the bunt. Haul home the sheet. So—belay! Board the fore tack. Take it to the capstan!"

And as the capstan turned rapidly round, the weather clew of the huge sail came slowly down to its place.

"Belay every inch of that. Set the mainsail."

In a most incredibly short space of time the mainsail was loosed and safely set. Then came the prompt order:

"Station for stays. Down with your helm. Hard a lee!"

"Hard a lee!" echoed the men, as each one ran to his station.

The ship's head came slowly to the wind, and in a moment more the head sails were aback.

"Tacks and sheets. Mainsail haul!" was the next order.

The men gathered in the braces hand over hand, as the after yards swung round; and intelligent glances were exchanged among them, as they saw that the ship was successfully going about under the power of a prompt will and good discipline.

"Belay all. Head yards. Fore bowline. Let go and haul!"

In a moment more the head sails had filled on the opposite tack, and the Sea Nymph began to gather headway. Slowly she was brought up to the wind with the helm, until the weather-leach of the topsails trembled, and then many an anxious eye was turned towards the outer point of the reef, which now bore almost directly ahead. It seemed scarcely possible that the ship would pass to windward of it, unless she could lay still nearer to the wind. The quick eye of the new commander saw this.

"We must have the fore to-gallant sail, or go ashore," he said to himself, aloud. "Lay aloft a couple of smart hands, and cast off the gaskets."

The crew watched the expression of his features and sprang to obey his orders. The fore to-gallant sail was started home, and the ship came up still nearer, until the reef bore down under her lee bow.

"She springs her luff," said Mr. Foster, to one of the mates by his side, indicating that the ship had come a point nearer the wind. "Now send me a man that I can depend upon at the helm. Stay, I will trust no one." And walking aft, he took the wheel from the helmsman, and firmly grasping the spokes, fixed his eye upon the extreme point of the reef.

It was an intensely exciting moment. Every one was on deck save the captain—every one seemed to hold even his breath in the intensity of excitement. The ship bounded forward like a race-horse, under the heavy press of canvass and the power of the gale. She is close upon the reef, the spray from the foaming breakers flies high above her main-yard and descends in showers upon the deck, the roar of the elements is deafening, the men cling instinctively to the rigging in anticipation of the impending shock and certain death!

The new officer is the only cool and collected man on board. His eyes change from the reef to the sails, which he has thus far kept a good full, as seamen say. But now, when the ship was actually in the very jaws of death, he on whom all eyes were turned, suddenly whirled the wheel down and luffed the ship sharp up, causing the sails to flap with a most ominous sound, just abreast of the extreme edge of the outermost of the breakers. A breathless moment followed. Then the helm was reversed with lightning-like rapidity, furling the sails just as they were on the point of catching aback! Ere the crew could realize the fact of their safety, the Sea Nymph was rapidly leaving the reef astern!

Days of calm, beautiful weather succeeded the boisterous ones we have described, and the whole duty of command was sustained by the new officer. His intelligence and gentlemanly bearing, notwithstanding the impoverished character of his personal appearance, soon won him the confidence of the lady passenger and her father, and the grateful girl (she was scarcely more than a girl), seemed more than pleased with his delicate though not pressing attentions. Captain Gore gradually recovered from his severe injury, until at last he once more appeared upon deck, but not before the head lines of Cape Cod were in sight.

CHAPTER IV.

It was a pleasant and gay company that were assembled at the house of a worthy citizen a couple of weeks after the safe arrival of the Sea Nymph at Boston. Among the beauty of the scene, floated a light and graceful form, which might have been recognized as the lady passenger who had been so providentially saved from a watery grave, as has been described. The favorite of all that fair company, she engaged all eyes and attentions.

Near one of the doors of entrance there stands the person of a young man, plainly but very neatly dressed, his smoothly shaved face being the very personification of manly beauty, while his lithe and well developed figure gave token of great strength. He was regarding the belle of the evening with fixed attention, and now for the first time had just caught her eye, as it rested inquiringly upon him. He bowed low and respectfully and both drew nearer to each other, while the lady spoke:

"I beg pardon, but I cannot recall your name, sir, though the features are strangely haunting my brain."

"You do not remember me then?" he asked.

"The voice? yes, but the face; here I am puzzled."

"Jack Foster was the name under which shipped in the Sea Nymph."

"Is it possible? I see your beard has entirely disappeared."

"Yes."

"Strange," she continued, "but other memories haunt me now."

"Lydia Browness!" he said, with peculiar emphasis.

She started and looked about her in amazement. She turned her eyes first upon the speaker, then about the room, as though in a dream. At last she placed her hand upon his arm and said:

"Is this possible? Are you—"

"Herbert Bancroft!" was his quiet reply.

She did not faint, though she trembled in every limb. But she placed both of her hands in his, and together they sought a retired nook in the hall.

It would be folly for us to describe their conversation. Years of absence and separation were discussed, and sad experiences of both were related. Two fond hearts were again united. Col Browness was no less surprised than delighted at the discovery, for he had long known that his daughter's heart was buried in her faithful affection for this long lost but now regained companion of her youth, nor did he hesitate, ere many months were past, to bless their union.

THE MOON AND THE WEATHER.

The late Marshal Bugeaud, when only a captain, during the Spanish campaign under Napoleon the First, once read in a manuscript which by chance fell into his hands, that from observations made in England and Florence during a period of fifty years, the following law respecting the weather, had been proved to hold true: "Eleven times out of twelve the weather remains the same during the whole moon as it is on the fifth day, if it continues unchanged over the sixth day, and nine times out of twelve like the fourth, if the sixth day resembles the fourth." From 1815 to 1830, M. Bugeaud devoted his attention to agriculture, and, guided by the law just mentioned, avoided the losses in hay-times and vintage which many of his neighbors experienced. When Governor of Algiers, he never entered a campaign till after the sixth day of the moon. His neighbors at Excideuill and his lieutenants in Algiers would often exclaim—"How lucky he is in the weather!" What they regarded as mere chance, was the result of observation. In counting the fourth and sixth days, he was particular in beginning from the exact time of the new moon, and adding three-quarters of an hour for each day for the greater length of the lunar as compared with the solar day.—French paper.

HELP!

BY S. L. TURNER.

Help me, my God, to see thy way,
My own blind path I would no longer keep;
From thee my fainting heart would, day by day,
Glean precious antidotes to deathly sleep!

Too long this puny war of flesh
Hath vainly racked the 'wildered, throbbing soul:
Thy grace alone can comfort or refresh—
O Saviour, on thy hand my name enroll!

Help now the heart one simple word to learn,
By which thy perfect love may spring within,
And living ever there, in brightness burn—
O, let "abandonment" the treasure bring!

MY FATHER'S STORY.

BY GEORGIE C. LYMAN.

"Mr. Harry is in the parlor, and would like to see you, Miss Lizzie."

"Tell Mr. Harry that I am engaged and cannot see him."

The girl stood looking at me in mute wonder. I felt my face flush, but I did not add to my words, and after a moment's embarrassed silence, she withdrew. Then when she had descended the stairs, I opened the door of my room and listened breathlessly, while she delivered my message.

"Engaged—to me?"

"Yes, sir, that is all she said."

I leaned forward, listening eagerly to the sound of his footsteps as he walked slowly along the hall to the door. He seemed to stand there a moment in puzzled silence, and then he said:

"She is quite well, Mary?"

"Yes, sir, I suppose so."

An instant more and the heavy hall door clanged to, and then I ran to the window and watched him as he walked silently down the street, a look of perplexity and disappointment clouding his handsome face.

"There!" I said, when at last he had disappeared from my view. "Perhaps some one else is uneasy now, Mr. Harry Lynn! A very satisfactory feeling this paying off one's debts."

I returned to my seat and taking my pencil bent over my drawing, but my hand was very unsteady, and there was a strange, uncomfortable choking in my throat. I could not see plainly what I was doing, and at last a great tear splashed upon the paper. I gave up, and had a good cry—sobbing as heartily as a child. When I had grown calmer, I threw myself upon the lounge before the fire, and tried to sleep, that I might forget my trouble. But I was still too much excited to admit of that, and so I lay quiet, thinking sadly of my quarrel with Harry. No, not a quarrel, but what I considered good cause for one. Let me explain.

A few days before, the great tragedienne, Madame R., had arrived in town. I was very desirous of seeing her, and had set my heart upon attending the theatre on the very first night of her appearance. I had expressed this wish to Harry on the day before the entertainment, and had been much disappointed by his reply. He said that there was not a desirable box unengaged, on account of the number of persons who knowing how great the rush would be upon this night, had secured their seats beforehand.

"Besides," he added, "I have engaged to meet my brother and his family at the depot this evening, when the nine o'clock train arrives. They are strangers in the city, and will depend upon seeing me. Now don't feel badly," he said, bending to kiss my clouded face. "You shall certainly go the next time."

I tried to bear my disappointment bravely, but my eyes filled with rebellious tears, and after he had gone I covered my face and had a good cry, which relieved me wonderfully.

But the next night when I rose from the tea-table, my father bade me dress myself to accompany him to the theatre. "I knew how much you wanted to go, Lizzie," he said; "and so I engaged a box for this evening the first of the week."

I was very much surprised and delighted, and should probably have enjoyed the entertainment as well as I had anticipated; but an incident occurred which entirely destroyed my pleasure. As I sat quietly looking around the house upon my entrance, my father bent forward and said:

"Do you know who that very pretty girl is in the second box before us? I had a sister who much resembled her and died when about her age."

I glanced in the direction indicated, and shook my head in answer to my father's question. At the same instant the curtain rose and he did not notice the involuntary start I gave, or my change of color. By the side of the young beauty, with his arm resting carelessly on the back of her seat, and almost embracing her, sat Harry. There was no mistaking him; I should have known those glossy, brown curls with their golden tinge and rich abundance among a million uncovered heads. Only occasionally could I see his face, and that was when he turned towards his companion. How radiantly beautiful she was! She could be hardly more than fifteen, I thought, and possessing one of the most perfect faces and forms I ever saw. The features were regular and expressive, and the complexion so beautifully tinted as to look hardly natural. Her coal black hair was short and curling, and clustered in silken masses about her ivory white brow, and danced in glossy rings against her crimsoned cheeks.

All the evening my eyes scarcely strayed from them. I noted every glance, every whispered word; not a motion of his or a look of hers escaped me. I hardly raised my eyes to the stage, and could not have told at the close of the evening's entertainment whether Madame R. was tall or short, light or dark, a good or an indifferent actress. My father marvelled at my abstraction as we rode home, but I hurried from him when we reached the house, and looked myself in my chamber. I could not conceal from myself that I was jealous of the beautiful stranger, mere child though she was, distrustful of Harry's truth, surprised, grieved, angered and confounded.

I passed a sleepless night, and arose unrefreshed in mind and body. My heart was still sore, and my thoughts full of anger and revenge. So that on the following morning when Harry called I refused to see him, supposing that his own conscience would give him the clue to my displeasure.

What a long forenoon that was! I did not dare to leave my room lest my swollen eyelids and sad face should excite remark. I eyed a severe headache as the cause of my non-attendance at breakfast, and it was a truthful excuse, for my crying, and the restless night I had spent, almost made me sick. But at noon my kind aunt, who had taken care of me from my infancy, sought me out and gained my confidence. Her gentle expostulations and sensible counsel did a great deal towards calming me, and showing me the matter in its true light, as not being so bad as my excited fancy had induced me to believe it. And so after half an hour's cool reflection, I bathed my flushed face and went down stairs, with the humbling conviction that I had been very foolish to make myself so miserable about an act which, because I could not comprehend it, I had taken for granted as being quite dreadful.

When my father came home from the counting-room, weary and harassed in mind, I took my guitar and sitting at his feet sang to him all his favorite songs. Gradually the careworn look faded from his face, and after a while he bent forward and drew me into his arms. There, seated upon his knee, with my cheek laid against his, I told him of what had occurred, and how unhappy I had been. I was sure of his sympathy, as I had always been, but I was not prepared for the look of inexpressible sadness that stole over his face.

"Avoid being rash, Lissie," he said, very earnestly. "This may be, and probably is, a mere misunderstanding."

"But, father," I said, "does it not look like a wilful deception?"

"Not any more than certain incidents once appeared in my own lifetime, Lissie, and they proved to be mere circumstantial evidence."

He paused a moment and then said:

"Put your arms about my neck, darling, that I may know how much you love me, while I tell you a story that may be useful to you."

"You have never heard me speak of Aline Grant. Her name has not been uttered aloud by my lips for more than twenty years. She was my first love; can I confess it to you when you look at me so sadly with the violet eyes of your dead mother? My only love! Your mother was a gentle, childish creature, but seventeen when she died. Aline was a woman ever since I can remember her—quiet, noble-looking, deep-hearted. We were situated precisely as Harry and you are—she an only daughter, I, the confidential clerk of her father. We had known each other since we were children of a dozen years, and were neither of us hardly of age, when with her father's permission we plighted our troth. I cannot tell you how I loved her—but through her I worshipped the God that gave her being. Her nature was not so passionate as mine, but when she put her white hand in mine and said, 'Guy, I love you,' with her clear eyes looking straight into my own, I was satisfied."

"It was while on a visit to some relations in an adjoining town that she became acquainted with a young man named Harry Hunter. He was a very handsome, bright, intelligent sort of fellow, possessing a good reputation, yet with all this I found cause to dislike him. He returned to New York with Aline, and there seemed to exist an intimacy between them that I did not like. She had a playful way of addressing him, and seemed strangely free and easy in his society, I thought, for one of her reserved habits."

"My uneasiness I could not conceal, neither could she help noticing it, but nothing more than an occasional grave look, or an unusually tender caress when I was particularly gloomy, betrayed her knowledge of its existence. Sometimes when her head was resting on my breast, and her dark eyes raised to mine, as we sat alone together of an evening, I would look steadily and searchingly into their clear depths. But their brightness was never shadowed—they never shrank from my questioning gaze. But the subject was never mentioned between us. She never broached it, and I was too proud to do so, knowing that she understood me and kept silent from choice.

"Gradually I came to hate Hunter. He seemed always in my way, and as Aline's house continually. Once I saw them in a store together as I passed by on the street, and often bowed to her as she rode by in her father's carriage, he ever by her side. Between us, his name was never mentioned, and Hunter himself seemed entirely oblivious of my antipathy. His manner to me was always courteous, respectful, and completely free from embarrassment.

"One morning I called at Aline's house, intending to make arrangements to have her attend a concert to be given that evening. I stepped into the house, as I had been in the habit of doing, without ringing, and quietly entered the front parlor, expecting to find her there as usual. But I was mistaken; there was no one there. Hesitating a moment, I heard voices in the adjoining room and listened, wishing to know if Aline was there. Distinctly I heard Harry Hunter say:

"We must be married at ten o'clock, so as to be ready to start for the falls directly after dinner. The train goes out at one. Be sure and look your loveliest, Albie. By the way, don't fail me this afternoon about going to Fay's. I couldn't do a thing without you. I should send home bright blue carpets and yellow window drapery! Au revoir."

"I heard him laugh gaily and Aline answered in a low voice; then a door shut and my betrothed, with a smile on her lips, came forward from the room which was only separated from the one in which I stood, by folding doors. She started on seeing me, and held out her hand with a pleasant, 'Good morning, Guy.'

Almost with an oath I pushed her from me, and burst into a storm of frenzied words. Heaven only knows what I said. I never knew. I have a vague remembrance of accusing her of perfidy, deception and treachery, of reproaching her in the bitterest terms. She did not attempt a reply, did not utter one syllable, and I accepted this as conclusive proof of her guilt.

"At length I rushed from the house, leaving her standing white and still in the attitude she had involuntarily assumed upon my first outburst. I paced my room all that night alternately ly cursing her and myself—half crazed with my sorrow.

"But when morning came, with its cold, gray light, I grew calmer. But my life that had been so bright with my hopes but a few weeks before, was now as dark and cheerless as the coming day. The dreary rain plashed against the windows and the wind wailed about the house, till I thought its incessant moaning would drive me mad. It was the darkest day of my life.

"That evening just at twilight Mr. Grant requested me to go to his house and bring him a package of papers that he kept locked in his private desk. For a moment I was about to refuse, but suddenly remembering that Aline seldom sat in the library and I should not be likely to see her, I went.

"When I had reached the house I passed directly up the stairs to the room I was seeking. Swinging open the door noiselessly I entered, but my heart sprang to my throat! Seated upon a low ottoman by the window was Aline. The graceful folds of her dark, wine-colored dress rested upon the carpet, upon which, at her feet, crouched her favorite dog—an immense Newfoundland. The shaggy head of the animal rested upon her knee, and his great, brown eyes were fixed steadily upon her face. One slender hand supported her cheek as her arm rested on the window ledge, the other lay listlessly in her lap. But her face! I could hardly recognize her. The features were calm and colorless as marble, and to the deep sadness of her eyes my passionate grief was mockery. For an instant her whole appearance was that of a beautiful wax figure shown off to advantage by the dark, rich background of purple window drapery. The next, she was on her feet, her splendid head thrown back, her eyes flashing, the white, jewelled hand pressed against her bosom, the other employed in shaking the dog from her robes. For a moment there was perfect silence, and then guided by, Heaven only knows what impulse, I sprang forward.

"Aline, Aline," I cried; 'how could you deceive me so? How could you deliberately work all this misery? Nay, do not speak. Hear me first. In my blind idolatry, my trust in your truth, my perfect faith in your sincerity, I have borne in silence acts which, had I been less deluded, I should have known were the preliminaries to this—your shame. And now, Aline Grant, how can you stand there, in that attitude of insulted womanly dignity, knowing that I know what I do. What respect, think you, can I have for a woman who has proved herself so utterly base? Who has disgraced and degraded herself below the lowest standard of womanhood? You have not forgotten to blush yet, I see; and I marvel at it. Strange that this token of womanly shame should be left, where so little womanly truth and purity remain?

"Blush! Heavens, how the rich crimson flamed up into her face while I spoke! Her beautiful lips quivered as if she struggled for breath, and she staggered as if my insult had been given by a blow. Then she raised her eyes to my face, and what she saw there—for in my scornful wrath I must have looked like a very fiend—seemed to give her strength.

"Guy Wilmonth, God forgive you for the words you have uttered. Sometime, perhaps he will show you your error; I never shall attempt it. I utter no reproaches, attempt no explanation. And now farewell! May your way never be so dark as you have made mine."

"She swept from the room, and I stood as if spell-bound, and made no effort to detain her. I have never seen her since.

"I do not remember of leaving the house or going to the hotel where I boarded, but I was lying upon the bed in my room when some one tapped lightly at the door. Then it was pushed open and Henry Hunter entered.

"'Wilmonth,' he said, gaily, sitting upon the foot of my bed; 'I've come to be congratulated. I'm to be married to-morrow to one of the most charming girls in Christendom! Hasn't Aline told you about it? How queerly you look!'

"I could have strangled him as he sat there in his gay triumph, but I schooled myself to say as naturally as possible, 'I wish you all happiness.'

"'Thank you,' he replied. 'Aline has promised to attend the wedding and you must not fail to accompany her. Promise,' he cried, laying his hand lightly on my shoulder.

"I shivered beneath his touch, but did not speak.

"'You are cold, and no wonder, with this window open.'

"He arose, closed the window, and came back to his seat.

"'What a dear, sensible girl Aline is,' he went on, in a lighthearted, boyish way. 'I really don't know what I should have done without her these last three weeks. She has excellent taste.'

"Rather puzzled by his words, I made no reply.

"'Mellie is a mere child about such matters, and has left all the purchasing and fitting up of our little establishment to Aline and me. And I flatter myself that we have managed the matter to a charm. Our parlor is a perfect miracle of beauty and cosiness. But promise me to come to the wedding. Aline and myself are going to C—— in the first train, and you must be ready to accompany us. That is my little lady's home, where Aline has been visiting this summer, you know, and we are to be married in church there, and then ho for Niagara!'

"He ran on in this gay manner for some half an hour, and then suddenly remembering an engagement, took himself off. The light his last words let in upon my bewildered brain almost blinded me. I raved like a maniac, striking my forehead with my clenched hands, cursing and loathing myself. I never closed my eyes all that long, wretched night, and when morning came I was raving in the delirium of brain fever.

"It was six weeks before I left my room again, and then I learned that Aline and her father had left the city and were on the continent. They were travelling in the south of France for the improvement of Aline's health. Henry Hunter and his young wife, Mellie Grant, were married, and just returned from their wedding tour.

"I felt too keenly my shame and disgrace ever to attempt a communication with Aline, and crushing back the yearnings of my heart, tried to accept uncomplainingly the lot my own rashness had forced upon me.

"I left New York, and for years toiled persistently in the West—a quiet, disappointed man. I never mentioned the past, and no one knew my history. Then I met your mother—a lonely orphan, and my heart grew tender as I gazed upon her innocent beauty. We were thrown into each other's society much, and she grew to love me with a passionate ardor I had not believed her gentle nature capable of. In time I married her. She was happy with me for one short year, and then at your birth she died. Since, you have been the dearest thing on earth to me. Kiss me, Lizzie—my child, my darling."

I was weeping with him, and pressed passionate kisses upon his brow.

"And you shall always have me, father. I will never leave you."

"I do not wish this of you, Lizzie. All I wish is to see you happy."

We sat together in the great chair, I nestled in his arms, with my cheek laid against his. Only the firelight shed a mellow glow throughout the room: the gas was not lighted all the evening. At length the clock struck ten, and then he kissed me gently and sent me away to my chamber. And when I came down into the room the next morning, rather earlier than usual, he was sitting in the same chair and in the same place, with his eyes fixed on the dying embers.—During the day, I concluded what it was best for me to do, and when Harry called in the evening, I went down to meet him. He saluted me as usual, and we sat down together. Then before I had an opportunity to broach the subject (for I had determined to tell him of what I had seen, and ask an explanation), he observed that he had attended the theatre the evening before, for the purpose of accompanying his niece—his elder brother's only daughter.

"The child was bewitched to go, had already a box engaged, and her father could not accompany her, so I was sent off, and had the pleasure of listening to the little witch's extacies all the evening. These bachelor uncles are mighty convenient in large families. By the way, Julie will make a fine woman if she isn't spoiled by flattery. She has a beautiful complexion, and the handsomest eyes I ever saw."

A hot flush of shame and pleasure crept up to my forehead while he was speaking. I made him no reply, but bent forward to arrange the fire, that he might not see my confusion.

"Don't," he cried, suddenly drawing me back to my seat. "You are making a fire that will soon roast us alive. Sit still; I want to talk to you. Haven't you a confession to make?"

"What do you mean, Hal?"

He put his hand beneath my chin and held my face up so that I could not avoid his gaze.

"What if I should tell you that somebody else had gone to the theatre Wednesday night, and had then and there seen something that had made her very miserable ever since?"

There was a moment of blank silence. Then a quick retort rose to my lips, but the clear dark eyes with their look of grave inquiry were still fixed on my face, and after an instant's quivering of the lips, I broke down.

"You were too bad, Harry!"

"My foolish child—my dear little Lizzie," he said, laughingly, yet drawing me soothingly within his arms.

But I had my cry out, and then felt better, and as willing to laugh as he was. But when I raised my head, I caught sight of a suspicious brightness in his own mocking eyes.

The next October we were married, but I did not leave my father. We all lived together in the old house, and my father became almost as proud of his son as he is of his daughter and her son—my little Guy.

My father was still a handsome man. I thought so for the hundredth time while I watched him one morning as he sat in the sunlight by the parlor window, reading some letters which he had just received by mail. The dark eyes were still keen and clear; the mouth yet proud and firm, and the beauty of the curling chestnut hair not marred by the silver threads that twined among it. My boy crept to him and picked up one of the letters that had fallen to the floor. Fearing that he would tear it, I took it from him. As I did so, my attention was attracted by the extreme beauty of the chirography.

"Father, father!" I cried; "I have discovered a secret. What lady correspondent have you?"

He looked up in surprise, took the letter, and turned strangely pale while he read it. When he had finished he tossed it to me, saying, as he rose from his seat:

"Do not stay to read it now, Lizzie, but assist me to leave town in the noon train."

He was so much excited that I forbore annoying him with questions; but when he had gone, I eagerly perused the letter, or rather note. It read as follows:

"Guy, they say that I am dying. Will you come to me? There is much that should be said between us.
ALINE GRANT."

It was eight weeks before my father returned, and during that time we often heard from him. His letters were short, and evidently hurriedly written; but I gradually learned from them as time passed by that Aline Grant was not to die, and a new sweet hope sprang up in my heart. And the last letter we received before he came, contained the following words:

"Lizzie, do you remember that I told you that Aline Grant was my first and only love? She will return with me. We are to be married tomorrow. Be ready to receive us."

I was wild with joy, and committed so many extravagances that Harry threatened a straight jacket. At the time appointed they arrived, and when she, so pale, and calm, and fair, put out her arms to me, I sank sobbing upon her bosom, like an over-excited child, instead of welcoming her with the dignified ease of a matron as I had planned. And we are so happy together! My father grows blither every day in his happiness, and Aline, with her noble, pure face and gentle eyes is more like a dear, elder sister than a mother, though she often calls me her "dear daughter."

A PICTURE.

And there the fisherman his sail unfurled,
The goatherd drove his kids to steep Ben Gholl;
Before the hut the dame her spindle turned;
Counting the sunbeam as she plied her toll;
For, wake where'er he may, man wakes to care and toil.

A CHAT ABOUT EYES.

BY ANNIE LINDA RAY.

So you wish me to tell you a few of my thoughts
On the subject—we both can agree
That it's better, far better for us to decide,
Since we surely hope always to see.

Yes, I'm talking of eyes—of the blue and serene,
With a tint that might vie with the skies:
So earnest and loving, they thrill with a glance—
True, the blue are oft beautiful eyes!

Now, don't look so sly, though I know you will say
That I truly am thinking of Bill;
Such a killer of hearts seldom comes to my mind:
Don't tease me!—I pray you, be still!

Then the dark eyes so large, and with mischief replete,
I am sure you will own it is true
That the eyes that are bright with a flashing of fun,
Can surpass e'en the handsomest blue.

What care I for Bob? Yes, I know very well
That his eyes are magnificent, too;
But he knows it, and has such a share of conceit—
You may stare, but the glass knows it true.

Then the gray, with the lashes so drooping and dark:
Ah, there you are lost for a name!
Yet I prize the dear owner far more than the rest—
Than riches, or titles, or fame.

What matter the shade of the beautiful orbs,
If the soul through the pure depths can shine?
So look not so earnest, you sunny young truce,
And heed not the color of mine!

A TANGLED WEB.

BY ESTELLE GRAY.

"You see, girls,"—and my aunt composed herself into a story-telling attitude—"you see, my mother died when I was but fourteen, and as I was the oldest, I was left in charge of the four younger children, and a strict injunction from my dying mother to be to them what she had been, as far as lay in my power. Now this would have been a very difficult duty for me to perform, if it had not been that the children were very good and obedient, and helped themselves to a great degree.

"My father was a quiet, melancholy man, who never took much notice of us, and who, when he was in the house, sat gazing with great, dreaming eyes into the fire, and out upon the landscape. Somebody had told me that my father was a disappointed man, though in what the disappointment had consisted, I did not know until long afterwards. At any rate, he never attempted to govern us, and in time I came to regard him in much the same light as I did the children, and to care for him much in the same way.

"My brother Richard was next to me in age, and him I had the most difficulty in managing. He was very wilful sometimes, and often when he looked at me with those great, flashing, passionate eyes of his, a thrill of some unknown but mysterious power ran through me. But I was gentle with him, and I think he loved me better than any one upon the earth.

"Hetty, the next in age, was the beauty of the family; she had the fairest of complexions, deep blue eyes, and hair of that rare golden shade that we read of in novels, but seldom see. She had besides, the sweetest of dispositions, and a great taste for domestic matters, and already she took half of the household burden from my shoulders. The two youngest, Mattie and Esther, were very good little girls, with nothing remarkable about them.

"Time passed on, and I had reached my nineteenth year, and it was just at this period that troubles began to arise in the family. We were very poor, for my father had no faculty for earning money and times were very hard. Sometimes the money brought into the house was barely sufficient to cover the expenses of half a week, and yet we knew that it must answer for the whole seven days. On such occasions I used to take counsel with Hetty, and my little house keeper, as I called her, generally suggested some way by which the few and hardly-earned dollars were made to hold out most amazingly, till a new supply came in. As for Richard, who was now quite old enough to work, he was obliged to remain idle, for times were very hard, as I said before.

"In this state of affairs, I held many a serious conference with myself, and in the end my resolution was taken. I must go away and seek employment, and naturally enough, in connection with this subject, I thought of Lowell and its factories, for there was much talk about them at that time. I talked with Hetty about the matter, and though she cried at the idea of my going away, yet she promised to assume my place in the household, and to take good care of our little sisters. Richard broke out into the most passionate language when he heard of the project. He declared many times that if I went away it would be the ruin of him; and though I sought to know what he meant, he only shook his head and repeated the remark. My father wrung my hand, and said, with tears in his eyes, "God bless you, Anne, you are a good girl."

"Sufficient money to pay my expenses to Lowell had been set aside from the weekly earnings, and this money I secretly put upon Hetty's table; for I would not spend one cent of it upon myself. So one bright morning I set out with the intention of walking to Lowell, a distance of twenty miles from us. I walked along, carrying my little baggage upon my arm and trying to feel as cheerful as possible, though I was very far from being happy, when I heard the sound of wheels behind me, and in a moment more the heavy wagon stopped and a rough, but not unkind voice said:

"If you are willing to ride in my wagon, miss, perhaps I can give you a lift a part of your way."

"I looked up and hesitated, but only for a moment; the stranger was a rough, farmer-looking person, neither very young nor very old, but with such an honest face that I felt that he was one to be trusted. He helped me very kindly into the wagon, and spread his overcoat over the seat to make it more comfortable for me; although I objected to this proceeding, he was obstinate, and as it was rather a warm spring day, I had no great fears about his taking cold.

"We rode on several miles, carrying on a conversation by fits and starts, until—I never knew, girls, exactly how it happened—but I had told the stranger my story, and where I was going. Then we went on in silence for a long time, I, ready to bite my tongue out for being so imprudent, and the stranger evidently in a deep study. At length we came within a mile of Lowell, and there the wagon was to turn off. So I descended from it, and having obtained the needful directions and thanked my companion, I was about to resume my journey, when what do you think the stranger said?"

"Good-by, perhaps," said some one of our circle.

"No," said my aunt, "he made me an offer of marriage, and that in so honest and sincere a manner that I could not be offended, nor did I feel any inclination to laugh. I never knew exactly what my answer was, but I suppose I refused him, for he merely answered 'very well,' and drove off."

"And did you never see him again?" asked the youngest listener.

"That remains to be seen," said my aunt, with an arch look. "Well, I arrived at Lowell, discovered with some difficulty the person to whom I was to apply for work, and then I stood with beating heart to hear my fate pronounced.

"Have you ever done such work?" asked the gentleman, looking towards me with an exceedingly pleasant smile.

"No," said I.

"What makes you think you can do it then?" said he.

"Because I generally accomplish a thing that I set out to do."

"Very well," said he, "you can try."

"By night I was settled in a boarding-house, and in a few days I had learned to do my work almost as well as the other girls. I was homesick enough at first, but I soon got used to the people and the place, and should have been quite happy if I could have heard from home regularly; but that was a somewhat difficult matter in those days. One day I was working away at my loom very busily, when happening to glance up, I saw with amazement that the eyes of all the girls were directed towards me, and turning a little to one side, I discovered the very gentleman to whom I had applied for work. He stood about two feet from me, and held in his hand a letter, which he presently laid down upon my loom.

"From Hetty," I said with delight. And I was about to open it, when I remembered the gentleman, who was still standing by the loom pretending to examine my work, though I believe in reality he was studying my face.

"So you want to read it, do you?" said he, "well, then I won't stay any longer this time." And he turned and went away. Then, for the first time I remembered that I hadn't thanked him.

"You're a lucky girl to make such a conquest, Anne," said Jennie Butler, to me that evening.

"What do you mean, Jennie?" said I, for I hadn't the slightest idea what conquest I had made.

"What do you suppose Mr. Bennett came to your loom this morning for?" said Jennie.

"To bring me a letter," answered I, simply.

"A letter indeed," said Jennie, with a laugh; "you wouldn't catch Mr. Bennett coming to our looms, if we had a cart-load of letters. No, no, he came to see you, and mark my word, Anne, he'll contrive to see you again before long."

"I laughed at the idea, and then tried to dismiss it from my mind, but the more I tried to forget it the more I thought of it. Sure enough, in a few days I met Mr. Bennett again, very unexpectedly, upon my part, at least. Well, affairs went on until it was no uncommon thing for me to meet Mr. Bennett every day, and—well, girls, it's the same old story, he had fallen in love with me, and I went right to work and fell in love with him."

"But you didn't marry him, aunt," said I.

"No," said my aunt, "and I'm going to tell you why. One day, as I sat at my loom, as usual, one of the girls passed by, and said she, glancing at my work:

"'Why, Anne, what a curious mixture of colors you've got there.'

"'Mixture!' said I, 'why, I thought it was all one color.'

"She stared at me in wonder. 'Well,' said she, 'if my eyes don't deceive me, there are three colors there for certain, if not more.'

"I sat quite still for several minutes after she had passed, and then I looked slowly around the room, and you don't know how curious everything looked. It was as if a shadow had fallen right down between me and the objects I gazed at, and consequently everything looked dim. Well, I imagined that I had looked too steadily at my work, and a little rest would cure my eyes, so I gave up work for that afternoon and walked out. But the next day I couldn't see a bit better, nor indeed quite so well; and so it kept going on, until at the end of a week I couldn't see to sew or read. One day I called at the house of a somewhat famous optician in Lowell, and what do you think he told me? That I had a cataract growing over each eye, and that in a short time I should be entirely blind.

"You never could imagine the agony that I experienced when I heard the doom pronounced. I raved—I was very nearly frantic when I thought of the family at home, and when I thought of Mr. Bennett; for of course I saw at once that that beautiful dream was forever dispelled. After a while I grew calm, and then I sat down and slowly and painfully, so painfully that I remember every word now, I wrote a farewell letter to Mr. Bennett, telling him of my misfortune, and begging him never to try to see me again. Then I packed up my things, took leave of the girls, who all pitied and sympathized with me, and that very afternoon I walked into our kitchen at home, to the complete astonishment of Hetty, who at first imagined me to be an apparition. When she was satisfied, however, that I was real flesh and blood, there was no end to her transports of joy.

"Indeed the whole family exhibited so much delight at seeing me, that part of my old cheerfulness returned, and I began to look upon my misfortune with a braver spirit. I said the whole family, but one of its members I had not yet seen since my return, nor had any allusion been made to Richard. That night when the rest of the family had retired, I told Hetty all I knew myself about my blindness, and spoke, though somewhat reluctantly, of Mr. Bennett. Ah, hers was a sunny nature, for though what I had told her made a deep impression upon her, yet gently and skilfully she led me to view the bright side of the matter. In the midst of our conversation there was the sound of an opening door below, and a heavy step resounded through the house. Hetty's face turned deadly pale, and her eyes assumed a look of terror. I asked no questions, but slowly descending the stairs, I passed into the kitchen, and there I saw my brother Richard sitting with his head buried in his hands. I touched his shoulder, and then started back, as those great flashing eyes were turned towards me.

"'What do you want? Let me alone, I say!'

"It needed not these words to tell me that he had been drinking deeply. Already I saw the youthful bloom of his face had departed and he had the manner and air of an habitual drunkard. But I saw it wouldn't do to leave him where he was, so I touched his shoulder again, and again he raised himself in a fierce, desperate way.

"'Do let me alone, will you?'

"'No, Richard, I shall not let you alone. Go up stairs to your room.'

"Though it was clear that he did not recognize me, yet from habit he obeyed the sound of my voice, and rising, he staggered from the room, and we heard him crawling up stairs in a miserably drunken fashion. The next day I had a long talk with Richard, in which I vainly endeavored to make him promise never to drink again. But in vain did I entreat, he declared that it was his fate and he could not escape it.

"In the meantime, a night of utter darkness was slowly but surely settling down upon me. I had taken my last look of all beautiful things of the earth, and even Hetty's face grew dim and faded from my sight. It might have been about a week after I had ceased to see anything, that one day as I sat knitting—for I could knit as well in the dark as in the light—we heard a knock at the door. Hetty ran to the door and opened it, and then I heard Mr. Bennett's voice asking for me. Never in my life had I felt as happy as I did at that moment, though I had forbidden Mr. Bennett ever to see me again.

"I hardly knew what I did or said during that interview, or which was the happiest, Mr. Bennett, Hetty, or I. Mr. Bennett had been absent upon a long journey, and had only just heard of my misfortune, and upon hearing it, had hastened immediately to me.

"One thing he besought me to do, and that was to have my eyes examined, so that we might know whether the blindness was curable or not. I did not give him any definite answer to this, but promised to think of it.

"Hetty was delighted, and she was never tired of praising Mr. Bennett to me. She was also so anxious that I should have my eyes examined that she gave me no peace upon the subject. So one day I found myself in the office of Dr. C—, then one of the most celebrated opticians in the city of Boston. My eyes were examined, and then I waited with outward calmness to hear the decision of Dr. C—. It came at last.

"'Yours is a very peculiar case; I cannot give you a decided answer, because it would be cruel in me to raise hopes that might be dashed to the ground. But I think if the experiment were tried, there would be more chance of your seeing again, than that you would not. Still, the operation would be a very hazardous and delicate one, and would require a great deal of courage, and the result after all might be unfavorable; but, as I said before, I should strongly believe in a favorable result.'

"I thought over the doctor's words very often, and at last I had determined upon my course. It was better, I thought, even with the small hopes held out to me, to undergo the operation, than to sit down contentedly in the darkness. And if the result were unfavorable, yet I could be no worse off than I was now. Mr. Bennett came very often, and was always most cordially received by Hetty and me. I would not hear one word about the renewal of our engagement, until it should have been decided whether I was to see again.

"The winter passed away much more cheerfully than we had anticipated at its commencement, and the first raw, wet days of spring had come. Upon one of these days it had commenced raining in the morning, and had rained violently all day, and the snow that had lain upon the ground had melted and had swollen the streams frightfully. It had been a gloomy day in the house, for somehow I could not help thinking of Richard, who had not been at home since morning. I thought of his brilliant talents of which I had been so proud in his younger days; of his early beauty, which no one would have guessed now, so bloated and disfigured was his face. It was evening, and we had drawn the curtains to shut out all that was disagreeable in the weather. Somehow my thoughts of Richard had made me nervous and anxious, and I was impatient for his return. I was continually listening for his step, and when the clock struck eight, and then nine, and he did not make his appearance, I arose and paced the room, whilst a thrill of mysterious fear, which I vainly tried to check, crept over me. The clock struck ten, and urged by one of those impulses which every one recognizes at times, but which no one pretends to explain, I arose, took down my bonnet and shawl, and prepared for a walk in the rain.

"'Where are you going?' asked Hetty.

"'To find Richard,' was my answer, as I busied myself tying the strings of my bonnet.

"'You don't mean, Anne, that you are going out at this late hour of the night, and in such a storm. Why not wait till Richard comes, he will be here soon.'

"Hetty's argument seemed reasonable enough, but I had a foreboding that would not allow me to keep quiet. So I made no answer to Hetty, but went on with my preparations. I soon found, however, that she was getting ready to accompany me, and then I had positively to forbid her going. In vain she entreated, I was deaf to all entreaties. My father, who had been sitting by the fire, now rose and took down his coat, lit his lantern, and without saying a word to me, or any one, passed out of the door behind me. We went on in silence in the rain, which fairly drenched us, blown hither and thither by the wind, which came every now and then in wild gusts, and going much over shoes in the melted snow and mud. Though I was blind, yet I was so familiar with the neighborhood, that I could find my way at any time about it. So I led the way directly to a deep gully, which I knew to be in the path Richard would take coming home. In ordinary weather, this gully was far from being a dangerous place, for the banks were not very high, and the ground was soft. But I feared that owing to the thaw that had taken place, the gully might be half full of water.

"As I said before, I do not pretend to explain why I went to this place rather than to any other, only that I was impelled to do so. Followed by my father, I walked cautiously along the edge of the gully, pausing every now and then to listen; but the wind blew so wildly that listening was almost impossible. I had reached the extreme edge of the gully and was pausing a moment before I retraced my steps, when amid the storm and the wind I thought I heard a feeble groan; my sense of hearing was very acute, as is usual with the blind, but nevertheless I was not sure but what I had heard was the wind. Again, however, I heard the sound, feebler than before, and coming evidently from the depths of the gully. Without taking further thought, down I slid, preserving myself in some miraculous manner from falling head foremost. I stretched out my hand and it encountered the icy water, but how deep it was I could not learn. Cautiously I crept along, holding by the shrubs and weeds that grew here and there. At length my feet struck against something that impeded my progress, and reaching forward, I placed my hand on what seemed to be a human face, as icy cold as the water about it. I shouted loudly for my father, and while he was creeping along slowly by the aid of the lantern, I had lifted the head in my arms, and was endeavoring to ascertain by the torch, whether life was yet extinct.

"Never before had I appreciated the resolution of my father's character; that night he was a hero in my eyes, and he afterwards told me that I was the only heroine he had ever known. With almost superhuman strength, we dragged the dead body, as we thought it, up the bank, and managed together to convey it home. As we bore our sad burden over the threshold we met Hetty, and never shall I forget her first agonized question:

"Is he dead?"

"He was not dead, but mercifully preserved for a better life than he had led. Wonderfully preserved, too, for if it had not been for his strong constitution, he could never have borne what he did upon that memorable night. Long afterwards he told me the story. He had set out for home the middle of that stormy afternoon, and being in a state of intoxication he had fallen into the gully, which at that time had not much water in it. In vain he tried to extricate himself; in his inebriated state it was impossible. So, sinking back upon the soft ground, he fell into a drunken slumber. But the water rose and recalled him to his senses, and again he made an attempt to escape; he managed only, and that with great difficulty, to keep himself from the reach of the water. Perhaps upon the full recovery of his senses, he might have managed to crawl up the bank, had not a portion of the earth above, worn by the water, fallen down, bearing with it an enormous stone, which fell upon poor Richard's foot. Then, in that hour of agony, the whole of his worthless life passed before him, and he made a vow to himself to lead a better life if he were preserved. Many months passed by before he rose from his sick bed, and then he was lame for life. But never again did intoxicating drinks pass his lips, and now, as you well know, girls, he fills one of the most important offices in the gift of his native State, and has the esteem of all that know him.

"And now I suppose you want to hear about myself. The shock that Richard's danger and sickness gave me, so affected my nervous system, that the operation upon my eyes was deferred till the autumn of that year. In spite of my secret fears, it was successful, as you see, and

I saw again the beautiful earth which I supposed I had looked upon for the last time.

"And, indeed, from this time all seemed to prosper. My father, aroused from his indifference by the events of that memorable night, entered into business with renewed energy, and his family no longer wanted for the necessaries and even the luxuries of life. Richard's talent began to be noticed, and Hetty shortly after married Mr. Bennett, and—"

"Why, aunt," interrupted we, indignantly, "I thought you were going to marry Mr. Bennett?"

"So I was, children," said my aunt; "but I discovered that if I did so, I should destroy Hetty's happiness forever—though she never would have complained if I had done so. But she was handsome, much younger than I, and I saw that Mr. Bennett's eyes often rested upon her; and so, children, I thought it my duty to give up all claim to Mr. Bennett, though what it cost me, I shall not tell even to you."

My aunt, who was "fair, fat and forty," here suspended her story, but I had still another question to ask.

"What became of the farmer-looking man who asked you to marry him, aunt?"

My aunt laughed, and then rose and walked to the window. I gazed at her, thinking her the most beautiful woman of her age I had ever seen.

"Come here, girls, and you shall see the farmer-looking man."

We ran to the window, and there, just dismounting from his buggy, was our father's friend, Mr. George Hayward. We were not at all surprised when, shortly after, our aunt became Mrs. Hayward.

DREAMS.

Sir Wm. Johnson possessed great influence and popularity among the Indian tribes. Without adopting the Indian habits, he gratified the savages by accommodating his manners to theirs. He even descended to imitate and retort their tricks and knavish manoeuvres; and the Indians were better pleased to have their ingenuity foiled in this manner, than to be addressed with the insolence of a grave rebuke. A sachem who came to pay Johnson a visit, announced one morning, that he had dreamed, the previous night, that his host presented him a rich suit of military apparel. Johnson, according to the Indian custom on such occasions, fulfilled the dream; but next morning related, as a dream of his own, that his guest had presented him with a valuable tract of land. The Indian, regarding him with a sly look, replied, "The land is yours, but let us dream no more."—Dwight's Travels.

SPRINGTIME.

BY WILLIS E. FADOR.

Now "the voice of the doves in the land"
Shows that springtime gladdeneth earth;
And the fairies that kiss her soft hand,
Have christened the violet's birth.

How sweet through the sunshine to pass,
And mase on the goodness that sends
Us the blossom, the flower, and the grass,
And perfume that springtime attends.

Though the "winter, now over and gone,"
Carries with it a little white shroud,
We have comforting thoughts while we mourn:
We rejoice while in grief we are bowed.

For the angels that wait at the door
When our darling wee Willie went in,
Said that there he would suffer no more,
That then he was free from all sin.

And though springtime with sunshine and flowers
Finds us childless, sweet memories rise;
And the wings of the swift-speeding hours
Bear our thoughts and our hopes to the skies.

FORTUNE-SEEKING AND FORTUNE-HATING.

BY MRS. M. T. CALDER.

"AND so, Maurice, you think to convince me that this forthcoming visit of Miss Egerton's is of no unusual interest to you. Pshaw, man, for once be candid, and confess the plans for besieging the fair lady, and fairer fortune, are already matured in that cool head of yours."

The speaker, a little slender, young man, pushed away a mass of short, auburn curls from a forehead fair almost as a girl's, and bent his gay, blue eyes curiously upon his companion.

He whom he addressed raised himself from his stooping posture above a workbench, littered with tiny wheels and bands, and screws, and the other appearance of a mimic machine, and shaking off the steel filings from his hand, which seemed like that of a giant beside the effeminate one of the first speaker, answered in a ringing tenor voice by no means belieing the appearance of him whose massive frame was so unusually suggestive of strength and vigor.

"There'll be no convincing you about the affair, Allerton; I'll not take the trouble to argue with you. At present my thoughts are too much engrossed by this new machine of mine to dwell a moment upon Miss Egerton, or her money bags either." And as he finished the sentence Maurice Shelton resumed his work, and began arranging the little wheels and bands as earnestly as if no one had spoken, or was present.

Harry Allerton twisted a delicate curl of steel shaving round and round his finger in nervous embarrassment, casting uneasy glances at the busy workman, gazing, too, at the manly, vigorous form with a sort of envious consciousness of its superiority over his own delicate frame, and then coming closer to the bench, said again:

"You're a queer fellow, Maurice, I'd give considerable for a look inside that scheming brain of yours. I really believe you do care more about that trashy machine than about this wonderful chance of obtaining a beautiful girl and splendid fortune, all at once. Come, tell me all about it. Leave off a minute, do, and tell me about it."

Once more the workman raised himself and turned a flashing black eye upon the speaker.

"Keep in latitudes you're acquainted with, Harry, and not talk to me about trashy machines. What are you driving at, man? Speak out plainly."

"Well, so I will," replied the other, with a light laugh which could not hide the anxious eagerness of his words. "What I want to know is this; if you are going to enter the lists against me, when Miss Egerton arrives, because if you are, I shall give it up, being by this time well made aware of your faculty for succeeding in everything you undertake."

"Be quite at ease, then. You may rest secure from any attempts of mine to win the golden prize. My ambition, at present, lies rather with iron and steel."

"But why," persisted Harry, "you don't mean you are foolhardy enough to despise wealth, and the advantages it confers?"

"Faith, not I," laughed Maurice. "What do you suppose I fire both my brains and fingers at the wheels yonder for, but that I hope my inventive genius may bring me a snug little pile of the glittering ore? I'm a little too much like a church mouse to indulge dielike for wealth."

"Yes, that's a fact, you're poor enough. Worse off by far than I, who am slenderly enough portioned, and that's why I can't understand your indifference. For my part, I frankly admit I am all alert to use every stratagem to win this charming girl, and a magnificent fortune both at once, and shall never cease to thank my aunt for this glorious opportunity. Only think how exceedingly comfortable it will be, to rest secure from the wearisome toil otherwise before us both."

Maurice looked at the glowing, excited face with a bright, self-reliant smile.

"Well, Harry, if it suits you, try for it by all means, and success attend you. But as for me, I'd rather crush this right hand of mine in the vice yonder, than take into it, for life, the hand of a girl to whom I should owe even the purse of Croesus. I want no money with a wife. I want a fortune my own hard labors have won me, and, please God, some time I'll have it."

How strong and powerful he looked, his tall form erect, his head thrown proudly back, and his eye piercing and brilliant as an eagle's! Harry Allerton sighed again as he looked at him, and slowly and thoughtfully turned away from the little workshop.

Maurice Shelton and Harry Allerton were half brothers, and both orphans, residing with their wealthy aunt, Mrs. Carew. Maurice, the elder, was the image of his father, who had been suddenly stricken down, in the midst of health and strength, by a fearful railroad disaster. The youthful widow was soon married a second time, and her younger son inherited her own fragile and graceful beauty, as well as a small competency at the death of his parents. Although widely different in character as well as appearance, the brothers were much attached, and had never been separated, passing through college at the same time, from which they had now been graduated a year or more. Neither had fully decided his future course, although Harry had applied to a lawyer friend of his father's for a chance in his office, and Maurice's passion for machinery threatened, as his worldly, fashionable aunt declared, to throw away entirely the advantages of his college education.

The great event of interest, just then, at the Carews' elegant country seat was the expected arrival of the charming Miss Eagerton, a distant relative of Mr. Carew's, whom, however, he had never seen, since she had been educated in Paris, where her father died, leaving her the sole heiress of a fortune almost fabulous for American merchants to attain. On hearing of the young lady's arrival in her native city, Mrs. Carew, with the shrewd calculation of immediately securing the prize for one of her nephews, partly from affection for them, and partly from an innate love of manoeuvring, had written a warm, motherly letter, urging the lonely girl to make a long visit to their country seat. A grateful reply had been received, accepting the invitation, and adding that she should bring with her her cousin, Flora Eagerton, a namesake of hers, who had hitherto been supported by her father, and still continued with her.

Anabel Carew, the pretty and only daughter of Mrs. Carew, was nearly wild with excitement upon the day of the expected arrival, and although he strove to conceal it, Harry Allerton was scarcely less so, and both marvelled exceedingly at the coolness and carelessness of Maurice, who wandered around in his workman's jacket, while the others, glossy and fine in their extra adornments, waited stiffly beneath the verandah, watching the appearance of the long expected coach.

It came at the very moment when Maurice, still in the odious jacket (it was not so very unbecoming, after all), was nailing up a stray climber of the vine wreathing about the pillared verandah. What perturbed, anxious glances were cast upon the coach door, as the driver slowly opened it. A tall, queenly form, robed in a richly-wrought travelling dress, descended languidly, an elegant lace veil was thrown aside, revealing a fine, rather haughty face, brilliantly lighted by a pair of Italian eyes, and shaded by heavy raven braids.

"The very ideal of my dreams," thought Harry Allerton, as the soft, white hand, sparkling with costly diamond circlets, rested a moment in his, sending a thrill of happiness to his heart.

"A thousand welcomes, my sweet Miss Eagerton," cried the enthusiastic Mrs. Carew. "Nay, but I shall take you to my heart at once, and call you Florence"

"Thank you, pray do, at once. My friends all call me Florence, and my cousin we call Flora, to distinguish her from me. O, I had forgotten her, where is she?"

So had all the others forgotten her, excepting Maurice. He had not yet addressed Miss Eagerton, but when he perceived a little slight thing, in sober gray dress, with a bag and bundle of books in her arms, standing, still hesitating within the coach, his generous heart was at once moved to avert uncomfortable feelings, and advancing at once to the coach door, hammer still in hand, he said, courteously:

"Can I be of any assistance to you? Pray let me take these books for you, and come into the house at once," glancing up at the doorway where the other ladies were disappearing. "My aunt and cousin are so much excited by the honor of this visit that they have lost their usual self-possession. But you may be certain of a cordial welcome."

A tiny snowflake of a hand, with only a plain mourning ring upon it, brushed away a shower of chestnut curls, and a pair of wondrously soft brown eyes looked up gratefully into his face, and then glanced from the coarse jacket to the hammer, inquiringly. He smiled at the look, laid down the hammer, and held out his hand for the books, saying :

"I see I must introduce myself; I am Mrs. Carew's nephew, Maurice Shelton. And you—"

Her smile in return, Maurice compared afterward to a glimmer of mingled moonbeam and starlight, and she answered, simply :

"Miss Egerton has gone into the house. I am only Flora."

"'Only Flora' must permit me to exhibit her subjects in the garden to that queen, by-and-by."

Another smile from the downcast face, and she had skimmed lightly over the lawn and disappeared within the house.

Maurice carried the hammer to the workshop, loitered around a short time, and then, despite his assurance to Annabel in the morning, that she need not look to see him there till evening, exchanged his jacket for a coat, and entered the drawing-room.

Miss Egerton, richly dressed, was there, brilliant, witty and condescending; but as Maurice decided, after a few moments' quiet observation, too showy, and conscious of her own attractions to please him. But she was surrounded by a delighted, admiring trio—Harry, Annabel and Mrs. Carew, who nearly overwhelmed her with attentions and caresses. She was very handsome certainly. But though Venus herself, Maurice Shelton would not allow her beauty to entice him, from the very fact that added such lustre to her charms in the opinion of the world, the golden treasures that sparkling hand could bestow.

So he turned away, looking for the little brown figure of Flora. There she was, half-hidden by a festooning window curtain, the chestnut curls bent down over a portfolio of engravings, unnoticed and uncared for. She gave a nervous start as the deep-toned voice asked pleasantly :

"Have you found 'the Huguenots' yet? I think it the finest there."

"I was just admiring it," returned she timidly, lifting the brown eyes slyly to his, and holding up the engraving, "it is very fine."

"Pictures are always like day dreams to me. I don't choose to indulge myself in the society of either very frequently."

She looked up so wonderingly that the shy eyelids forgot their duty, and he met the full liquid brightness of eyes, that, why or wherefore he knew not, sent a sudden thrill to the stout heart which had never quailed under such artillery before. Yet he recovered his self-possession in a moment and continued :

"Why, your eye asks, so I'll answer candidly? Because I am too poor to afford myself such luxuries. I have to deal with plain matter-of-fact, every day work, and do not think it wise to cultivate enervating tastes beyond my means."

Again she gave a swift, questioning glance more eloquent than words.

"Yes, I dare say, such an honest confession amazes you, used as you are, to the gay society surrounding your brilliant cousin, yonder. It's only now and then you'll come across a frank fellow like me, not ashamed to own his poverty," and he laughed gaily in her face.

"It is refreshing, at least," she answered, smiling back, "to know there is such an anomaly existing. But I don't exactly comprehend," she paused, hesitated and glanced around the luxuriously furnished room.

"Comprehend what?" inquired he. "How any one can acknowledge poverty's grim companionship, and still be gay and cheerful? If you cannot comprehend that, then you have not yet been taught how much more precious are heart and mind and soul, than riches which take to themselves wings."

His tone was grave and earnest, and swinging open a French window looking out upon a flight of steps that descended into the garden, he added gently: "Will you not come out with me and look at the pictures a Divine hand paints every-day for the poor man's eye?"

She glanced at the busy group around the piano, at the farther end of the long rooms, and quietly followed him. He led her some distance from the house, past the blooming flower beds, and gorgeous conservatory, to a rustic arbor, built on a ledge of rocks, from the crevices of which the scarlet heads of a few late columbines peeped out. The rising ground where they stood commanded a fine view of a rippling river, an emerald green meadow, and beyond it a grove of tall, hazy pines, and still beyond them, dark and distinct, against the cloudless sky a rising line of hills, blue and misty through the distance.

"Here," said Maurice, his black eye lighting up with enthusiasm, there is a picture one may gaze upon while he is still at work. The poor man truly has an artist constantly at work for him. What finer gallery can a nobleman boast? Now tell me what it is you cannot comprehend?"

Once away from the drawing-room, her timidity or reserve had vanished. She looked up with a free, fearless glance, and answered at once :

"I did not understand how you could appreciate poverty, living amid the surroundings of wealth, that was all? And yet I confess it still puzzles me that you should look so cheerfully, it seems to me exultingly, upon a life of toil and struggle."

"Yes, that is just the word," he cried, eagerly. "I own it. I do exult in the consciousness of being poor. But why is it strange? Do you see this strong right hand? It is that, and the ardent, throbbing, life-stirring brain and nerve, that shall win me fortune and riches of my own, that I shall owe to no one. And that is why I exult in being poor in the commencement." He paused, threw back his proud head, like a war-horse when he snuffs the far-off battle, and with his eagle eye fixed on the distant hills. "Ay, because I shall win my fortune myself," and then a moment after, his eye advanced upward to the smiling blue and he added, reverently, "God permitting, I mean, of course!"

Had it been a youthful Hercules standing before her, those brown eyes could not have gazed more admiringly, and suddenly a tear came glistening over the lustrous orbs, and laying the little snowflake hand impulsively on his arm, she said:

"I believe you. I like you, and I am sure we shall be friends."

He smiled brightly as he turned toward her. "Thank you. I agree with you, for something has already whispered to me, we shall be the truest of friends, which is more than your cousin, the heiress yonder, can ever say."

"And why, pray?" asked Flora.

"Because," he answered, "her father's heavy coffers lie between."

A pink flush just shone a moment on her cheek, and vanished. He imagined she had guessed the hidden meaning of his words, and to relieve the embarrassment, led the way to the workshop, saying, courteously:

"It may be a novelty for you. If you choose, you may come in, and see the theatre of my ambitious labors."

She followed, interested and quite at ease. He pointed out the half-completed machine, and said, seriously, "There is my hobby, the talisman that is to grant my fairy wishes. See how it looks, so insignificant and grim and unpolished; yet I feel confident if no one steps before me, some day that will bring me both shining gold and perishing fame." His eye was wandering with flattering hopes, his thoughts she saw plainly were far away, forgetful of her presence. "Ay," murmured he, brushing the wheels with a tender hand, "gold and fame, perishing both. Love were better than either. So I mean to win that, too, but not with fortune—no, never with fortune."

She thought he looked as if he had only to speak, and all three were at his bidding. Then as his last words echoed in her ear, the same pink flush dyed her delicate cheek, and looking up into his face she said only—"Well?"

He laughed and shook his head, as if throwing off the cobwebs from his brain.

"I told you I would not indulge myself in dreams, yet here I was lost completely, in a most seductive one in your very presence. Does 'well' mean what more? Why, this is all. I am going to work here and there and everywhere, with what my college education has done for me, but take a profession I went, for these hands of mine must have active work as well as my brain. See how large they are—like sinews of iron, and nerves of steel? Don't you think they would feel ashamed turning over law books, or penning sermons, or resting their huge clasp on emaciated wrists? Pshaw!"

His glance wandered from the hands he held toward her to the little fingers clasping a stalk of columbine. "Ah," he said, smiling, "see the contrast between those soft little fingers, with their pearl and rose-tipped daintiness, and these!" and he took her hand admiringly in his, and spread it open on his palm. "And yet," he added, with a mischievous sparkle in his eye, "they look well together, the contrast is becoming to both."

She blushed crimson this time, and dropping her hand, he led the way to the house, saying as they reached the steps again:

"What an odd conversation we have had for the first! What did you say or do or look, that you have won all my thoughts away from me?"

"Well, Harry," said Maurice, looking up from his book, as late that evening his brother came dashing into the room they shared together. "Are you already on the high road to fortune?"

"I can't tell that, Maurice, but I do know one does not often find an heiress such a charming creature as that. I'm desperately in love, already."

"Gold has a magical way of gilding up common clay," was the dry response.

"For shame, you're a perfect heathen, Maurice. How can you insinuate there is anything common about her?"

"About who?"

"Miss Eagerton, the charming, lovely Florence!"

"Nonsense, Harry; I tell you it's the money bags that have bewitched you. Do you think if they had come into the room to-night, both cottage girls in simple white, you would have lingered longest at the side of that tall, dashing woman, while that sweet girlish Flora was before you? I tell you nay, brother Harry."

"Flora, who is that? I saw no Flora."

"I dare say not. However, I won't quarrel with you for not being in love with Flora. Win the heiress by all means, if you can. As for me, sometime—take care, that's an inkstand your elbow has overturned!"

Gay doings at the Carews made the days and weeks fly swiftly. The house was constantly thronged with visitors much to Annabel's delight and Harry's annoyance. So bright a prize could not be neglected, and the charming Miss Egerton was besieged by a crowd of suitors. It must be confessed, however, her smiles and favors were all bestowed upon Harry, who hardly dared credit his own good fortune. Maurice was scarcely civil, when all the rest were so obsequious and flattering, but was so little in her society, it passed unremarked. And the quiet, humble Flora, likewise, was seldom seen amid their fashionable coterie, which was, however, owing to her own choice, for she was in reality too lovely and refined to miss receiving admiration and attention from the more observing. She seemed to have a distaste for drawing-room pleasures, and preferred wandering with book or pencil through the pleasant country fields about the place. Quite often Maurice was her companion in these pleasant walks. Often and often, too, she might have been found sitting on the bench in the little workshop, while Maurice filed and fitted and arranged his model, chatting merrily with him when he rested, and gazing admiringly upon him when he was busy in calculation or earnest labor.

Singularly enough, too, it came to pass that Maurice felt more satisfied and happy when the quiet little figure was there, intercepting the broad stream of sunshine from the window, and began to realize a strange loss and vacancy, when the seat was empty, and he had the light full and strong upon his work. The day came when he said as much. Little Flora blushed as vividly as the carnation fastening in her simple muslin dress, and said, archly:

"But if it was Miss Egerton, the heiress, you would wish me to go away?"

"Certainly, with Miss Egerton I have nothing to do. I associate only with people of my own rank," was the emphatic reply.

A strange little ripple arched the dimpled lips, and an uneasy flicker disturbed the soft brown eyes. She half rose to her feet, then sat down again, and with averted face returned.

"I can't imagine why you should cherish such an antipathy against poor Florence. Is it a crime for her to be rich?"

"I can't imagine why you need to care!" he said, a little testily. "She has homage enough, without mine. I repeat, I like riches when honorably earned by one's self. To speak plainly, it is only with a wife they are so hateful. I may as well acknowledge, once for all, it is the present fashion of poor young men seeking to mend their fortunes through a wife, that has filled me with such a horror of all young ladies so unfortunate, in my opinion, as to possess fortunes." He looked earnestly towards her, but the chestnut curls still concealed her averted face. "I hope you are not grieved for your cousin. She'll not pine at the coolness of a plebeian like me." And he laughed merrily.

She did not echo the laugh, and remained a long time silent, until all at once she asked:

"Are you as rigorous against concealment, too? Would you not forgive a little innocent deceit practised through friendly motives?"

"Deceit is never friendly," was his grave reply; when, to his astonishment, Flora burst into tears, and before he could recall her, ran away out of sight.

He came upon her again that evening in the arbor, sobbing bitterly. She looked like a fairy in the moonlight—so slender and delicate. But those tears! Ah, when Maurice saw those glistening drops upon her cheek, his heart gave a mighty throb, and lo, the secret he had so resolutely imprisoned there, came rushing forth. For once, his strength and iron will had failed him. Love, that mightiest of magicians, was more powerful than either. Before he was conscious of the act, he had caught in his little hands so tightly clenched, in this inexplicable grief, and whispered softly:

"Flora, dearest Flora, if tears must fall, give me the blessed privilege to kiss them all away!"

The bright moonlight revealed plainly the sudden flash of joy that danced across her face, and then vanished in deeper sadness.

"Flora, little Flora, you who have stolen into my heart and taken a place closer and hotter than ambition, or of fame or wealth, will you not give me some hope that when I have won my way to competency, I may claim a reward from you?"

She tore away her hands from his, wrung them despairingly, and faltered:

"Wait till to-morrow, Maurice. I will tell you all to-morrow." And then she fled away from him.

Lightly as a wild bird, her white robes like its fleecy plumage, she sped along the walks, up the staircase and into the chamber where Miss Egerton had just retired, radiant and blushing from a garden stroll with Harry. The tall, queenly figure was reposing indolently against the crimson velvet easy-chair, the brilliant black eyes wandering dreamily about the apartment, when little Flora came dashing breathlessly to her side.

"So you are here!" cried Miss Egerton, a little sharply. "I was just wanting you. I am tired of this, I say. It is a cruel jest, and it must end. I have enjoyed it hitherto, but the rose has thorns, and I begin to feel them."

"You, Florence?" stammered little Flora, through the rising sob. "What can trouble you?"

"How can one help being foolish, when foolishness is the inherited constitutional weakness of a woman's character? That Harry is bent upon making himself irresistible, and—I'm wretchedly afraid he has succeeded. And don't I know these men are mercenary creatures, every one? Take away the well-invested million, and what do you think will become of Harry Allerton's offer of marriage and declaration of undying love made this evening in the garden to Florence Egerton—Miss Egerton, of Egerton fortunes, you understand?" And the haughty beauty gave a scornful laugh whose jarring bitterness sorely touched the already overflowing heart of little Flora.

Suddenly the latter raised her head and dashed the tears away proudly.

"No, no, Florence, they are not all mercenary. Truly there is one—but let it pass. Keep it still, now, always—dear Florence, I can forego the fortune, but I will not lose him!"

The listener's face was turned towards her in amazement.

"Are you insane, Flora? Who is it you will not lose?"

Whereupon Florence and Flora Egerton, arms interlaced, and chestnut curls and raven braids closely blending, told over to each other, with an odd mingling of smiles, tears and blushes, a long recital—not meant, dear reader, for you or me to hear.

But the next morning, to their mutual astonishment, Maurice and Harry met face to face in the library, whither they had repaired to keep very different appointments. At the same moment the two Miss Egertons came gliding in; but a strange metamorphosis had taken place. The tall, queenly maiden wore the simple muslin, and the tiny sylph was robed in glistening gossamer, the white arms circled with bands of gold and the chestnut curls looped away with a spray of pearl. The gentlemen gazed bewilderedly at the apparition. One could hardly tell which face wore the most blank and pitiable expression, of those astonished lovers.

Then little Flora laid her head on Maurice's arms, and the brown eyes, the soft brown eyes no change could come upon, looked up to his through pleading tears.

"Maurice, dear Maurice, I answer now—I love you. Will it take away the love you offered last night, to know I am Florence Egerton, who commands to-day a million dollars, but will throw them all away to-morrow, if you will not take her with them?"

Poor Maurice! what a trial it was! to have loved, have wooed and won the heiress, after all! He could scarcely understand it yet. But there she stood—the same sweet face and gentle eyes and glossy curls. He loved her; he could not learn to un-love her. What could he do?

And Florence—shivering and trembling, she had turned to the disconcerted Harry.

"I told you last night, Mr. Allerton, you should have your answer to-day; but to-day finds me another person, and you are released from the consequences of all attentions bestowed upon the heiress.

One moment, honor to Harry! only one moment the doubt and hesitation lingered on his face. The next, he had taken respectfully the outstretched hand.

"If another person to-day, fair Florence, let me repeat anew the declaration; and since you are nearer my own station, I shall venture to plead more boldly."

What a smile released the compressed and quivering lips, as the hand was left in his! Then it was little Flora came forward from Maurice's encircling arm, saying joyously:

"She is not quite penniless yet, Mr. Allerton, for half my father's fortune shall be her wedding portion. Nay, nay, dear Florence, not a word. It is only justice, after this dangerous masquerade, and I am only obliging Maurice here, who is longing so much to be poor, that he may work and become rich. After all, it may be a good lesson for each one of us. Fortune-seeking and fortune-hating must both be cured through failure, winning both success."

Not many months afterward, the newspapers were busy over a fashionable marriage festival, where the brides resigned the names that had perplexed acquaintances so long, and were neither Flora nor Florence Egerton again. At the same time came the announcement of the invention of a remarkably ingenious machine, which was attracting the attention of the whole country. So Maurice, fortunate fellow, had won the three—wealth and fame and love!

KEEP HEART.

BY EDNAE E. WATSON.

As bubbles break to rise no more,
As waves dash on the pebbled shore,
With angry surge, or sullen roar,
Then die away,

So some vain charm that won thine eyes
With its gay splendor from the skies,
Like bubbles burst, no more will rise,
Nor longer stay;

So clouds, that darken o'er thy way,
Or grief, that wards can ill portray,
May come, but coming, will not stay,
But pass away.

Then bravely bear all grief and pain,
And know the sun will shine again,
And always brighter after rain,
Its cheering ray.

So sit not down to nurse thy grief,
But seek in duty's round relief,
And all thy sorrows shall be brief
As winter's day.

The soul, full oft by trials tried,
Is thus refined and purified,
And more, to God and heaven allied,
Each added day.

Then conjure up no vanished sorrow,
Nor from the future trouble borrow:
All needful grace shall crown to-morrow,
As 't has to-day.

THE MIDNIGHT MEAL:

—OR,—

A SURREPTITIOUS SEA-PIE.

BY JOSEPH H. WHITMAN.

THE skipper of the bark Undine was one of the meanest men that ever walked a quarter-deck. His men often declared that he would "steal the coppers from a dead nigger's eyes, and then swear because they wa'n't quarters;" and we have no doubt but that the assertion was correct. Certainly, if the man ever existed, who was capable of committing petit larceny under such circumstances, and adding profanity to the felonious act, that man was Captain George Lucas, master and owner of the little bark Undine.

Such being the character of the captain, it was not, by any means, probable that the crew of the Undine would ever become enervated by a profusion of luxuries, or in any danger of apoplexy from high living. On the contrary, they were in far greater danger of being starved to death, for the supply of food for the fore-castle was always exceedingly limited as to quantity, and equally poor as to quality.

During the voyage on which occurred the incident which we are about to relate, the food was even poorer and more grudgingly bestowed than usual. The regular bill of fare, on alternate days, was as follows: For breakfast, bread and beef, with a small quantity of "hot, wet and dirty." For dinner, beef and bread, with bad water ad libitum. For supper, bread and beef again, with a crowning glory to the luxurious repast, a half pot of "water-bewitched and tea-begrudged." On other days, an agreeable variety in the bill of fare was made by changing the order of the dishes at the several meals; thus, for instance, for breakfast, beef and bread instead of bread and beef, etc.

But the landsman reader must not for a moment suppose that bread and beef, on any ship, much less on board the Undine, means anything like the delicious rolls, and light, wheaten loaves, or the juicy steaks and noble sirloins to which he is accustomed. Far from it. Both the beef and bread of the Undine were condemned navy stores of very uncertain age. The salt junk, both in color and closeness of fibre, exactly resembled mahogany, ornamented here and there with stripes of a lively green; and the bread, we will only say that it teemed with animal life to such an extent, that a piece of it, if laid upon the deck, would travel off with great rapidity. By holding a cake of it between the thumb and finger, and giving it a vigorous puff of the breath, it could be instantly converted into impalpable dust.

Notwithstanding the vile quality of the bread, however, it formed the subject of many jocose remarks in the fore-castle, where some of the jolly mariners often declared that it was bread and meat together—a kind of animated sandwich, in fact.

The sleeping and other accommodations of the Undine, were, like their provisions, of the meanest kind; and, to add to the discomforts of their situation, eight able seamen, who composed the crew, were not by any means the only occupants of the vile little dog kennel which was called by courtesy the fore-castle. Innumerable rats and mice infested the apartment, and every available fissure, as well as the folds of the bedding, swarmed with myriads upon myriads of cock-roaches—not the comparatively harmless little insects which occasionally find their way into the abodes of landmen, but immense and ferocious monsters, some of them measuring three or four inches in length, and so bold in their attacks upon the provisions, and even upon the men themselves, as to render them the terror of the fore-castle.

In addition to these troubles, the curse of perpetual dampness hung over the miserable fore-castle. It was built on deck, having two doors opening forward, one on each side of the fore-mast; and the Undine, being in the strictest sense of the term a "wet craft," the briny flood was constantly eddying among the chests upon the floor, and often dashing its spray into the bunks. The reader can well imagine the condition of the Undine's crew was pitiful indeed; but it was not worse than that of many who "go down to the sea in ships," before the mast.

We have sufficient malice in our composition to desire the power to place the author of "A life on the ocean wave," or any of the innumerable fresh-water, fair-weather sailors, who "blow" so exceedingly about the "romance of the sea," for a few days, only, in just such a place as the Undine's fore-castle. How quickly their ideas in regard to salt water would undergo a radical change!

But that which rendered the whole ship's company, both forward and abaft the mainmast, more thoroughly uncomfortable than bad food, wet bunks, and vermin could alone have done, was the fact that Mrs. Lucas, the captain's wife, had accompanied her husband upon the present voyage. Being a great termagant, and, withal, meaner, if possible, than Captain Lucas, who stood in wholesome awe of his better half, the unfortunate bark was under petticoat government of the most obnoxious character.

Although Mrs. Lucas seemed to consider decent food a superfluous luxury for Jack Tar, she was particularly fond of a well-supplied table for her own use; and had compelled her husband and very humble servant to purchase ten pigs and several coops of fowls, as well as numerous cabin stores of the best quality before leaving port. One of the pigs was invariably killed, on Saturday afternoon, and served up on the following day for the cabin table, together with a pair of fowls; but not a morsel of either of these luxuries ever found its way into the fore-castle. There was much grumbling at this, and the feeling of discontent constantly increased, particularly after the scurvy, which might have been prevented by a small amount of fresh provision, made its appearance in the fore-castle.

On the following Sabbath, while the crew were seated at their miserable dinner, the oft-discussed subject of the captain's meanness formed the topic of conversation.

"I say, shipmates, this 'ere stuff aint fit for a hog to eat, let alone a human being," said one of the men.

"True," replied another, "and the worst of it is, that the scurvy will soon put us all on the sick list, unless we have some fresh provisions."

"Shipmates," exclaimed a fine-looking man, who was considered by all the best seamen aboard, "this state of things must not last any longer. We must have better grub, and that soon, or I will not answer for the consequences. I should be the last man to counsel insubordination or mutiny under ordinary circumstances; but in this case, justice to ourselves demands that we no longer submit to be treated like dogs. Come, what say you, will you back me up, if I will go aft and ask the old man to give us something fit for Christians to eat?"

"Ay, ay, that we will, Bob, and fight if it need be, to protect you from the old man's anger," was the unanimous response, for the men had nearly reached the point of desperation.

Bob accordingly hastened aft, and entering the forward cabin, where the captain and his wife, and the two mates, were discussing an excellent dinner, respectfully stated the condition of the men in the fore-castle, and begged for a supply of fresh provisions.

Both mates looked at Bob with an expression that said plainly, "That's the talk, Bob, we are glad to hear you stand up for your rights;" and even the captain seemed half inclined to give the man a favorable answer, but before he had time to speak, his wife had taken the case into her own hands.

"Leave the cabin instantly, you impudent wretch," she exclaimed. "You may be sure you'll get nothing better than beef and bread this voyage, and if you ever again dare to ask for more, I hope Captain Lucas will have you flogged. Do you hear? Go, I say?"

But Bob remained motionless, apparently taking no notice of the woman's command.

"Leave the cabin, Bob, I cannot grant your request, and I advise you never again to be guilty of such a piece of impertinence as coming to me with a demand for fresh provisions," added the captain, taking the cue from his superior officer!

Bob made no reply to this, but, as he turned to depart, he gave Captain Lucas a look which caused that worthy officer to wish, in the bottom of his heart, that he dared disobey his wife, and give the men something fit to eat, lest a refusal should provoke them to open resistance.

Bob immediately reported the captain's answer in the fore-castle, and the many muttered curses upon the head of Captain Lucas and his amiable spouse, which followed, were sufficient indications of spirit which filled the bosoms of the men, in view of this outrageous piece of tyranny.

"And now what do you propose to do, shipmates?" said Bob.

"Anything, Bob," was the reply. "Whatever plan you may approve of, will suit us, and we'll follow you to the death. If you say go aft and put the captain and his wife in chains, and help ourselves to the cabin grub, we're with you."

"No," replied Bob, "we will not resort to such severe measures at present. But I'll tell you what we will do. We will have one good meal in spite of the old man, as good a meal as can be prepared from the stores provided for the use of the cabin."

"Good good," shouted the men.

"We'll have sea-pie with the fixins, in this forecabin, in the early part of the middle watch to-morrow night," continued Bob.

"Bravo, Bob! But how is this to be brought about?"

"Listen to me and you shall know." And Bob proceeded to explain his plan, giving each of his shipmates some particular duty to perform in the way of perfecting the arrangements for a surreptitious sea-pie, to be served up at the midnight hour, on Monday night.

Every one cordially approved the plan, and during the following night some of the men contrived to enter the half-deck, and procure from the cabin stores ample materials for a sumptuous banquet, not forgetting to add to their plunder two bottles of brandy, and a box of figs for a dessert. All these articles were then concealed in the forecabin, ready for use on the following night.

The starboard watch kept the first four hours on deck, on Monday night; but instead of turning in at eight bells, the larboard watch also remained on deck to await a favorable opportunity to commence operations. By two bells (nine o'clock P. M.) a profound silence reigned over the Undine. The inmates of the cabin had all sunk into slumber, and the second mate had stowed himself into a sunny corner by the skylight, and lighted a cigar with the intention of enjoying a quiet reverie, and perhaps, if all seemed to be going along safely, a stolen nap.

And now the members of both watches began to make busy but noiseless preparations for their sea-pie. In the first place, two strong men crept stealthily into the cook's sleeping-room, which adjoined the galley, and seizing the slumbering doctor, quickly bound him hand and foot, and gagged him to prevent his outcries from arousing the people aft; for he was a faithful tool of the captain, and would have prevented the operations of the amateur cooks, if he had not been placed in limbo.

One of the pigs was then caught, and before he had time to utter more than a single stifled squeal, his innocent throat was cut so effectually that he died without a struggle. In the meantime, others of the crew had built a roaring fire in the galley stove, and as soon as the water in the coppers had reached the boiling point, the pig was hastily deprived of his hide and covering, and cut up into pieces of suitable size for a sea-pie. Two of the fattest fowls were also deprived of existence, and prepared for roasting.

For more than two hours the men pursued their tasks without molestation, or discovery; but just as Bob had pronounced the sea-pie "done to a charm," and the fowls "almost cooked," the second mate, who had just awakened from a long nap, chanced to stroll forward. To his surprise, he observed that the galley fire was in full blast, and his surprise was not lessened when, upon entering the galley, he discovered all hands officiating as cooks.

"What in time does this mean, boys?" he asked.

The men promptly explained the matter, telling him that they had determined to have one good meal, let the consequences be what they might.

"I don't blame you a bit, boys," said the second mate, "and I wish I hadn't found it out; but I suppose I shall be obliged to report you to the old man, or he'll give me particular figs."

"We shall eat our sea-pie in spite of the old man, sir," replied Bob. "So you may tell him as soon as you please."

"No, I won't tell him till just before eight bells, so you hurry up and get everything ready by that time." And the second mate returned to the quarter deck.

But the dinner was not quite ready to be placed upon the table, when the bell struck eight, and the captain, who had been aroused a few minutes previous to that time by the second mate, made his appearance at the galley.

"Here's a pretty go!" he exclaimed, in a towering passion. "Come out of that galley, every mother's son of you, or I'll break your heads!" And he was about to enter the galley, when he observed that the men were approaching the door to prevent his progress with drawn sheath-knives in their hands, and very prudently changed his mind, and remained upon the outside.

After vainly commanding the men to come on deck, he hastened aft to procure the assistance of the mate, but was met on the way by his wife, who had learned what was going on forward from the second mate.

"I'll put a stop to their doings," she exclaimed. "I'll teach 'em to kill my pigs, and make sea-pies at night!" And she rushed furiously toward the galley.

Captain Lucas thought that she was drawing it rather strong when she spoke of "my pigs," which he himself had bought and paid for; but he dared not correct the error, and silently followed his enraged spouse to the galley.

"O, you impudent dog, how dare you kill my pigs!" exclaimed the tigress to Bob, who stood in the galley door. And as she spoke, she fixed her nails deep in his cheek.

Bob hastily retreated into the galley, pursued by the fury, who quickly succeeded in tearing a handful of hair from his head. Captain Lucas, perceiving that his beloved wife had gained an entrance into the enemy's camp, attempted to follow her; but the galley door was suddenly slammed in his face, and fastened upon the inside. Immediately after, he heard a smothered scream from the partner of his bosom, and inwardly thanked his stars that she, and not himself, was in the clutches of the enemy.

As soon as the galley door had been closed, one of the men had approached the raging Amazon from behind, and dexterously slipped a large bag—used for boiling duff in—over her head, drawing the mouth of the bag close together around her neck by means of its string. Finding herself so unexpectedly bagged, she began to scream and struggle violently to escape from the grasp of her captors; but, in spite of her efforts, her hands were speedily bound behind her back, after which a whole bucketful of dirty water was poured upon her head, and then the galley door was opened, and she was banded out on deck in the most unceremonious manner imaginable.

Captain Lucas, as in duty bound, sprang to the assistance of his spouse, but he could scarcely avoid laughing aloud for very joy, at the sight of her sorry condition; for she had often given him a striking specimen of her pugilistic skill, which he had not dared to resent. Of course, he gave vent to many expressions of sympathy; but as he conducted her into the cabin, he felt, in his heart, that he could freely forgive the men for stealing and cooking his pig, in consideration of the wholesome chastisement which they had inflicted upon his tormegant wife.

Meantime, the men improved the opportunity offered by the captain's absence from the scene of action, to convey their sea-pie and "fixins" to the forecabin; for although both mates stood by the galley door, they had no desire to oppose the men's operations. A table had been constructed in the forecabin, by placing boards upon several chests set on end; and after driving the cockroaches back, so as to leave the festive board free from these pests, the men proceeded to set out their dishes in tempting array. The sea-pie, which had been made under Bob's immediate supervision, occupied the centre of the table, and was flanked by the two roasted fowls. The remaining surface of the board was covered with various delicacies which had been procured from the cabin stores. Tin pans served for plates; and sheath-knives and spoons performed the onerous duty of conveying huge mouthfuls of food from the dishes to the capacious "potato traps" of the hungry seamen.

Before the men sat down to their feast, they took the precaution to fasten the forecabin doors upon the inside; and when Captain Lucas, after comforting his injured wife to the best of his ability, with words of sympathy and a stiff glass of gin and water, returned forward, he found that his rebellious subjects were "non comestibus." Upon this, he turned to the mate, who stood near by, and exclaimed in a loud voice, expressly intended to reach the ears of the men:

"We will leave them alone, sir, for the present; but let all hands be summoned aft immediately after breakfast, to-morrow morning; and then, sir, we shall see—what we shall see!"

And having delivered these words of terrible import, he strutted majestically aft and retired to his berth.

Before the men in the forecabin had tasted a morsel of the tempting dishes before them, they had set apart a generous share for their two shipmates who were compelled to remain on deck—one at the wheel, and the other upon the lookout; but as soon as the old man had gone below, the mate hastened aft, and, taking the wheel from the helmsman's hands, bade him "go forward and help his shipmates scoff their sea-pie;" while the second mate, in like manner, relieved the lookout man.

"All things earthly have an end;" and the midnight meal of our heroes, although enjoyed with a zest which a well-fed landsman can form no conception of, and greatly prolonged by means of the two bottles of brandy aforesaid, was no exception to this general rule. When every one had become fully satisfied with eating and drinking, the fragments of the repast were carefully gathered up, the table was removed, and everything restored to its wonted condition. Last of all, the captive cook was released from his bonds; after which, the second mate and his watch went below, to spend the two hours yet remaining of their watch below, while the port watch took possession of the deck.

Directly after breakfast, next morning, all hands were summoned aft, and promptly obeyed the call. Mrs. Captain Lucas and her husband (we place these individuals in the order of their respective positions on board), together with the two mates, were standing around the main-deck capstan, evidently holding a council of war. At length Captain Lucas exclaimed :

"Men, you are aware of the fact that you have committed a great outrage, which calls for immediate punishment; but as I am willing to believe that you were so far deluded as to think that your conduct was justifiable upon certain grounds, I have decided to temper justice with mercy, and, if you will reveal the name of your leader, the rest of you shall escape, this time, scot free !"

This "pooty" declamation, delivered in a melo-dramatic style, did not seem to have the effect upon the men which Captain Lucas had expected; for, instead of promptly betraying their leader, and humbly thanking their captain for his clemency, they only winked at each other and smiled contemptuously.

"I give you one minute to decide," continued the captain, with rising anger. "Tell me who is your leader, or I'll flog the whole lot of you within an inch of your lives !"

"You'd better not try to fulfil that threat, captain !" replied Bob, calmly, stepping out from among his companions.

"Better not, eh? You infernal scoundrel, do you know whom you are speaking to? I guess not; but you will know very soon. Here, Mr. Davis," he continued, addressing the mate, "seize this fellow to the sheer pole in the main rigging. Make a spread eagle of him, and give him the end of the main sheet till he can neither move nor speak !"

"If you flog him, sir, you must flog the whole of us; and before you can do that, you must kill us !" exclaimed another of the men.

"What! will you mutiny, you wretches?" demanded Lucas.

"Ay, sir, if there's no other way to settle the matter; and if it comes to fighting, sir, you had better make your will and say your prayers; for we might as well be hung for a sheep as a lamb, and both you and your wife will soon be food for sharks !"

"These are bold words!" cried Captain Lucas, with forced calmness; but, as he gazed in the faces of his men, he began to turn pale and his limbs trembled slightly, for he saw fight in their eyes, and began to realize that they meant just what they said.

"Mr. Davis, why don't you obey your captain's command and flog that villain?" interposed Mrs. Lucas.

"Because I do not see fit to do it, madam," replied the mate, calmly.

"And you intend to disobey your captain?"

"Yes, madam; I do in that respect, most certainly. I will never raise my hand to punish the men for their deeds of last night, for I think their conduct was perfectly right and justifiable."

"So do I," added the second mate; "and as for flogging the men, why Captain Lucas may do it himself, for all me. But I wouldn't advise him to try the experiment."

"Do you hear that, Captain Lucas?" exclaimed his wife, in a furious rage.

"I do; and I am astonished to find that my officers are disposed to justify the conduct of a mutinous crew. However, if they refuse to do their duty, I must do it myself." And he advanced towards Bob with the evident intention of striking him in the face; but the latter quickly drew his sheath-knife, and would certainly have plunged it into the captain's bosom, if the mate had not opportunely sprung between them, grasped Bob by the collar with one hand and the captain's shoulder with the other, and while holding them apart at arm's length—for he was a very powerful man—he exclaimed :

"Have done with this nonsense! You, Bob, put up your knife; and you, Captain Lucas, will do well to send the men for'ard and say no more about the matter."

"Let me go, Davis!" replied the captain, trembling violently, and struggling to escape from the grasp of the mate.

Davis immediately released him, taking care, however, to keep between him and the men; but this precaution was not needed, for the captain had no intention of essaying another attack, and with a face as pale as death, he turned to the men and exclaimed :

"You have got the advantage of me for the time; but your triumph will be a short one, for there will come a fearful reckoning when we get into port. Go for'ard, you villains, and attend to your duty !"

The men were not slow to obey this command, for they would have been sorry to resort to violence, although they would have done so, rather than submit to punishment.

Mrs. Lucas had fainted at the moment when Bob had menaced her husband's life with his knife; and as the men departed from the quarter-deck, the captain silently raised his wife from the deck and bore her below.

From that time forth, no allusion was ever made by the captain, his wife, or the mates, to the events which we have just described; but by the captain's orders, a pig and a pair of fowls were cooked for the fore-castle every Sunday for our dinner.

By the time the Undine arrived in port, Captain Lucas had either forgotten the mutinous conduct of his crew, or had repented of his hasty design of proceeding against them. However that may be, it is certain that no legal measures were taken against them; but one and all deserted the bark and speedily shipped in other vessels, where they found better fare and more comfortable quarters than the Undine had ever afforded, even in her palmiest days.

A SINGULAR CASE.

In Dr. Currie's work, on the authority of Dr. Robertson, Surgeon General of the Naval Hospital at Barbadoes, is narrated the following singular effects of cold water by absorption and its medicated influence upon the body: A gentleman whose name was Weeks, a resident of the island, and a great votary of Bacchus, for twenty years was in the daily habit of intoxicating himself. In this state he was taken to a pond, in which he lay and slept, supported by a negro servant. In one or two hours he awoke, feeling no lassitude, no headache, no debility, no nausea, but cheerful and refreshed, and free from all the effects of inebriation. On one occasion his servant who watched him fell asleep himself, and his master was nearly drowned. He then had a trough constructed, with a pillow to accommodate his head; and on this being filled with cold water, he was thrust therein whenever he was overcome by deep potations. He said his sensations were very pleasant. During one day abroad he alternately got drunk and sober three times before midnight. He revived each time by sleeping in cold water. The last time he was so immoderately intoxicated that his friends took him in a chair, carried him to a pond, immersed him in water to his chin, and there held him for an hour. At home he would sleep in his watery bed one, two and even three hours, and ever experiencing the greatest refreshment. When his wife or family required him, they would wake him up by taking out the plug and allowing the water to escape, when he would pleasantly complain of the "loss of his bed clothes." Sleeping on one occasion in the trough without the water, he was seized with extreme rigor and chills; followed by fever and rheumatism. He lived, however, some years longer, but drank to excess and died of apoplexy in the 64th year of his age.

AFFECTION.

There is in life no blessing like affection;
It soothes, it hallows, elevates, subdues,
And bringeth down to earth its native heaven;
It sits beside the cradle patient hours,
Whose sole contentment is to watch and love;
It bendeth o'er the death-bed, and conceals
Its own despair with words of faith and hope.
Life hath nought else that may supply its place;
Vain is ambition, cold is vanity,
And wealth an empty glitter without love.

NEEDLE-WORK.

There is something extremely pleasant, and even touching—at least, of very sweet, soft, winning effect—in this peculiarity of needle-work, distinguishing women from men. Our own sex is incapable of any such by-play aside from the main business of life; but women—be they of what earthly rank they may, however gifted with intellect or genius, or endowed with awful beauty—have always some little handiwork ready to fill the tiny gap of every vacant moment. A needle is familiar to the fingers of them all. A queen, no doubt, plies it on occasion; the woman-poet can use it as adroitly as her pen; the woman's eye that has discovered a new star, turns from its glory to send the polished little instrument gleaming along the hem of her kerchief, or to darn a casual fray in her dress. And they have greatly the advantage of us in this respect. The slender thread of silk or cotton keeps them united with the small, familiar, gentle interests of life, the continually operating influences of which do so much for the health of the character, and carry off what would otherwise be a dangerous accumulation of morbid sensibility. A vast deal of human sympathy runs along this electric line, stretching from the throne to the wicker-chair of the humblest seamstress, keeping high and low in a species of communion with their kindred beings. Methinks it is a token of healthy and gentle characteristics, when women of high thoughts and accomplishments love to sew, especially as they are never more at home with their own hearts, than while so occupied.—Hawthorne's New Romance.

ANTIQUES.

In no particular has the present generation become more fastidious than in what is requisite for the use of ladies in their own dressing-rooms. Essences, powders, pastes, washes for the hair, washes for the skin, recall the days of one's grandmother, when such appurtenances were thought essential, and were essential; for our great-grandmothers were not rigid in points of personal cleanliness; and it is only uncleanness that requires scents to conceal it, and applications to repair its ravages. Our great-grandmothers wore powder and pomatum, and had their hair dressed three times a week; going to bed in the cushioned structure, after suffering torture for some hours, lest they should, in the weakness of human infirmity, lean back in their chairs. Our great-grandmothers, too, had their white kid gloves sewn to the bottom of each sleeve, lest they should incur the calamity of a sun-burnt arm. Our great-grandmothers were afraid of cold water, and delicately wiped their faces with the corner of a towel no larger than a pocket-handkerchief. There were those amongst them who boasted that they had never washed their faces in their whole span of existence, lest it should spoil their complexions, but had only passed a cambric handkerchief over the delicate brow and cheeks, wetted with elder-flower-water or rose-water.—The Habits of Good Society.

Happiness is not in a cottage, nor in poverty, nor in learning, nor in ignorance, nor in a passive life; but in doing right from right motives.

BEREAVED.

BY IRWIN L. LEIGH.

The winter's drear and chilling blast
Sweeps sadly o'er the little mound,
Where, mid the snow, thy form is cast—
Is cast upon the frozen ground.

The flowers were springing in the vale,
The summer wind was sighing low,
When death drew nigh, and then the wall—
The wall of anguish spoke thy woe.

Thy spark of joy, thy earthly boon
Lies mouldering now beneath the sod:
Why should that tiny form so soon—
So soon have pressed the frozen clod?

Are scarce its gentle accents formed
Sweet words to bless thy throbbing heart,
Death woke thy sense, and thou wast warned—
Was warned that bliss from thee must part.

MY SYREN:

— OR, —

THE DEMON-LOVER.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

"There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamed of in your philosophy."

I.—SALOME.

In the singular, nay, improbable tale which I have now, for the first time, resolved to reveal to the world, I expect not to receive the slightest credence or faith. It is not for this purpose that I thus consent to unbecom myself of the startling secret of my life—far from it. But to the end that those who have so earnestly, perhaps kindly, remonstrated with me, because I have chosen to wrap myself up in an impenetrable garment of repulsion, and who have striven incessantly to compel me to mingle with the world and my fellow-beings—in order that these may understand my motives for doing as I have done, and fully appreciate the fact that I am not ungrateful—I am about to unfold to them and to the world, my narrative. To them and to the world I dedicate it; convinced that whilst they will rigorously discard, as the veriest fiction, every line of it, they will at least pity and respect the misfortunes of one whose mind, as they will erroneously judge, has become thereby shattered.

But first, a word—let me present a theory which has of late been irresistibly forced upon my mind. That there are mysteries around and about us, standing out boldly, even in the eye of the noonday sun, no human creature will dispute. Mysteries all will concede; but capable, all will say, of elucidation upon natural principles. I am tempted to smile derisively at such positions. The truth, I religiously believe, is here; that there are, even in the centre of our most material being, phenomena which can never be reduced to any origin in natural causes, but which are known and comprehended by few, infinitely few, among mankind. There are, as I think, sight-seers, whose unveiled eyes can see almost nightly the fleshless phantoms of an unseen world; and there are phenomena in this life which can be comprehended by few—explained by none. But my tale, when I have told it, will perfectly explain my meaning.

The year 183— found me fairly launched upon a career which bore every promise of being a singularly prosperous and happy one. I was young, and buoyant with hope, wealthy, and had honorably concluded a full university course, and joyfully throwing books and duties to the winds, I hastened away from England, intent upon a full tour of the continent. Chance, more than any special inclination, led me first to Paris; and here commenced the remarkable train of circumstances which have so wonderfully influenced my destiny.

The first circumstance to which I particularly allude, occurred at one of those grand, carnival-like balls, for which the French metropolis is so renowned. As the evening wore on, I retired somewhat apart from the throngs of dancers which crowded the saloons, and leaning carelessly against a marble column, occupied myself with listening to the swell of the music, which seemed to roll upward, and break in great waves of melody against the frescoed ceiling, and in watching the movements of the fast-flitting forms around me.

Opposite where I was standing, and a little distance away, was another column, like that against which I was supported. I stood with my back towards it, but I had in some indefinite manner contracted the idea that it was also being occupied.

"I will conjecture first, and then turn and discover," was my thought. "If any person, who should it be who retires from such a scene of enjoyment, to make himself miserable with his thoughts? Some cynic, like myself, I will engage—but let me be certain."

With the words, I cast a glance over my shoulder, at the place just spoken of. The glance became instantly riveted into a fixed and continued gaze; and changing my position, that I might see it more perfectly, I folded my arms, and bestowed every faculty of my senses upon the rapt contemplation of the remarkable object which I beheld.

This object was a woman—a girl—which, I could not determine, for she seemed to partake so strangely of the distinguishing qualities of both. Her figure was slight and graceful, and yet rounded into a perfect womanly development; so that before her face was fully exposed to my observation, I intuitively began to wonder whether that face were in reality that of childhood or womanhood. In a moment she turned, looking directly towards me; and amid the thrilling raptures of a sensation perfectly new, I confessed to myself that here was a living ideal of beauty—ay, and a more glorious one than I had ever dared to dream of.

That face I hardly dare describe. Ever before me, sleeping or waking, since my earliest boyhood, although I had never yet beheld it until that eventful moment—and ever haunting me since with its weird enchantment, gazing at me as if daguerretyped upon the paper upon which I write, with 'all its wonderful loveliness—how, how can I describe it? If I could, I would give you an idea of an oval, olive, Italian face, set in a frame-work of raven-hued hair—of a clear, translucent complexion, which I fancied might be stained with the shadow of the rich blood beneath—of a forehead like a smooth tablet of alabaster—eyes, dark, glorious, dreamy, passionate eyes, into which you might look and fancy you could see the image of a soul fluttering down in their clear depths, like the shadows of tall trees which seem to lie upon the bottom of some clear, waveless lake—lips which parted just enough to disclose a line of dazzling white beneath—a neck which would not have graced so well the shoulders of a queen—I would tell you of these, and more, I would tell you of her, as I afterwards knew and loved her—but I forbear. Smile, if you please, but I cannot speak of her as I would; language is feeble, speech seems weak and impotent to express what I then felt.

She turned and saw me, and in an instant her eyes seemed to be riveted upon me with all the fascination with which I had looked upon her. She smiled a sweet, sunny smile, and beckoned me to approach. Had a lighted shell laid at her feet, I could not have hesitated; attracted, and yet repelled by an undefinable something in her whole person and actions, for which I could not account, I advanced eagerly to where she stood. The spell of magnetism was upon me; that strange, mysterious agency by which the human will can triumph and be triumphed over. What a mighty, what a fearful phenomenon is this!

With a complete intoxication of delight, I submitted myself to the influences which had thus suddenly surrounded me. Of what we talked, I remember nothing; I merely remember that we did converse together, and that I at length learned that my companion was an Italian countess. I called her Salomé, as she had requested me to do. I learned, too, that her husband had died some months before, and that she had sought refuge from her loneliness in the gay circles of Paris. At length, she took my arm, and we walked together through the saloons. I felt inspired, elevated to a higher level, by the influence of my companion; this brief association with her seemed to endow me with new powers. The consciousness that those dark eyes were constantly upon me, the sound of her voice, the contact of her arm, all thrilled me with emotions unspeakable. If I speak extravagantly, I also speak faithfully, and of a mental delirium completely absorbing.

But this was merely the beginning of my enthralment. Sleeping or waking, my visions were now of one bright presence—and this Salomé. Accident, or more frequently, design, brought us daily together. I strove not to conceal from myself, nor from others, the fact that my life had found its one grand master-passion—love for the beautiful countess. I know not how to account for the perfect submission under which I acted, unresisting as it was, unless upon the principle of that magnetism to which I have before alluded. I was passively fostered into a servitude more grateful than ever before blessed a human creature. The blush, the trembling of the lip, the downcast eye, with which at length Salomé confessed her love, were as heralds to confirm and proclaim my happiness. Never, never had it entered into my imagination to conceive that such happiness was contained upon earth, as I experienced in that moment. We were married without a week's delay, and retiring from the great world of Paris to a suburban villa, where Salomé had sometimes resorted, we prepared to fulfil together our anticipations of wedded bliss. Our acquaintances in the city were few; friends we neither sought nor desired; we were best satisfied to discard everything that might have intruded upon the delightful harmony of our intercourse, and to live in and for each other. And if I linger over these days of unalloyed happiness, it is because their remembrance is so strong as to become almost part and parcel of the substance of the mind itself.

I have said that I was perfectly happy, but perhaps there should be here made a single reservation. Even at this early day, I can remember her to have seen at times, shades of sadness steal over the face of my wife, seemingly denoting the presence of trouble or fear. Yet, when I tenderly questioned her as to the cause of her emotion, she would again recall, with an effort, the brightness to her eyes, and scatter my surmises by a light, joyous laugh. Once, in particular, I saw her, when she must have thought no eye was observing her. She sat leaning her face upon her hand; tears trickled over her cheek, and her lips trembled convulsively. The next instant her head was bowed into her lap, her form swayed to and fro like a willow, and bitter sighs of agony welled up from her breast. In an instant I was by her side, kneeling and clasping her in my arms. She looked up, her head fell upon my bosom, and a torrent of tears fell from her eyes. For a moment, neither of us could speak. As for me, I knew not what to fear; thoughts of impending evil flitted darkly through my brain, and some great sorrow seemed about to overwhelm me. Her voice, as she recovered from her agitation, first aroused me:

"Forgive my weakness, Ethel." And her white arms were wound more closely about my neck. "It is nothing which should cause either of us to fear. Let me keep my secrets, foolish as it is. I will forget it and be happy again."

"You love me, Salome?"

"If I thought you doubted it for an instant, I could take my life. Love you, Ethel? Better, my beloved, than you can ever know!"

The words were spoken in an inexpressibly tender voice. They chased away all doubts; I kissed her, and was once more happy.

II.—THE DEMON.

I have dwelt at some length upon the singular manner of my introduction to Salome, and upon those things that were most notable during the first month of our married life, at the delightful little villa where we had secluded ourselves, simply because I have deemed it necessary that they should properly precede the narrative of the incredible events at which I have now arrived. These are occurrences which are shrouded in mystery still. Lonely and heart-broken, for twenty years I have miserably brooded over this fearful enigma, and vainly—the misfortune which has blinded me, I cannot comprehend.

But let me recur to my story. It was upon a sultry, oppressive afternoon of summer. All the neighborhood seemed resting under the dull, drowsy influence of the heat. There was hardly a sound or a stir of life about the villa; Salome, as I supposed, was in her room, in another part of the house, and I was alone in the drawing-room. I had been lying at full length upon the sofa, reading a favorite author; but as the first insensibility of sleep overcame me, the volume fell from my hand, and I closed my eyes in a doze, which soon strengthened into sleep, deep and unconscious.

How long this slumber lasted, I have no means of knowing. When I did awake, it was with a sudden thrill and shudder which ran through every nerve of my body. The transition from slumber to wakefulness was instantaneous—produced by a sudden and inexplicable conviction of danger, which sped with lightning-like rapidity through my mental being, even while I slept. I awoke; and as I still lay upon the sofa, my eyes fell upon the object which must have filled the very atmosphere around me with the breath of alarm.

It was an object frightful and hideous in the highest degree, standing in the doorway, and glaring upon me with the eye of a basilisk—the figure of an old hag, tall and bony, clad in tatters, and repellant with all the accompaniments which wickedness gives to age; while in her long, skinny fingers, she clutched a gleaming knife! For a full minute she stood thus, actually gloating over me with her evil eye, like a very fiend; and sickening with the very apprehension of danger which had seized me, I lay powerless, bound in the fascination of her dreadful presence. I was as helpless as if bound with cords; with all my frantic exertions, I could not move a muscle. Finally, in my efforts, I uttered a faint cry, and at the sound the hag started fiercely towards me. In an instant she was bending over me, I could feel her hot breath upon my cheek, and the glitter of the upraised knife flashed in my eyes. Breaking, with one mighty effort, the influence which had thus far rendered me powerless, I caught her hand as it descended; driving the weapon with a true aim to my heart. The blow was arrested barely in time; and snatching away the knife, I sprang up to grapple with my assailant. But she was already defeated—turning, with a yell of rage, she fled from the room. She had but fairly disappeared when I reached the door in the pursuit, when my feet were arrested as I met my wife in the doorway, face to face. Recolling in surprise, I exclaimed:

"Good heavens, Salome—she cannot have harmed you! Where is she? Which way did she go?"

"She, Ethel—whom can you mean?" she asked, with an infection of surprise.

"That infernal hag, who would have murdered me! She passed from this door but this moment."

Salome shook her head incredulously. Passing rapidly to the outer door, I looked out, and then made a circuit of the house and out-buildings. Not yet convinced, I returned to the house and thoroughly searched every apartment, and still no living creature could be seen! Half-doubting my own existence I descended again to the drawing-room, revolving this unaccountable occurrence in my thoughts. That Salome must have met the hag, whoever she might be, had the latter escaped by the door, as I was confident she had done, I was well satisfied; that she was not in the house, I was as well assured; and that she had time to spirit herself out of sight during the few seconds in which I spoke with my wife, I knew was impossible. Where, then, was she? The whole transaction had occupied not more than five minutes, and this in broad daylight, and yet I was never before so sorely bewildered. It was inexplicable.

Salome was in the drawing-room when I returned. In a few hurried and excited words, I related to her all that had happened. She was perfectly calm, save a slight trembling of the lips, and smiling as I paused, she said:

"You have dreamed a frightful dream, my dear Ethel, and seen a frightful apparition. Do not, I entreat of you, sleep upon your back in the daytime."

"You disbelieve it, then?" I exclaimed, warmly. "But mysterious as this strange affair surely is, I will always affirm that it was not a dream, but a terrible actuality. And look—as I live, here is the very knife with which she menaced me!"

The weapon still lay upon the sofa, where it had fallen during the scuffle; and holding it up, I exhibited it to Salome. An instant pallor whitened her cheeks, and as I saw that she was about to fall, I hastened to support her.

"O God, this is terrible!" she murmured, and almost immediately lapsed into unconsciousness. Placing her upon the sofa, I called her attendant, and then left the room. Mystery seemed to accumulate upon mystery. Why was it that my wife had exhibited such emotion upon beholding the knife? Was it merely because the certainty of my miraculous escape from a most deadly peril was thus forcibly brought home to her? These and a hundred other questions I asked myself, but left them all unanswered. The whole occurrence was so clouded with doubt, and yet so startling in its nature, as to throw me into a fever of painful anxiety.

Gradually, imperceptibly, as I pondered in secret upon these matters, I was startled to discover that my thoughts had wandered entirely from the mysterious hag, and her fiendish design, and were fixed intently upon the conduct of my wife. And though, in the agony which the discovery caused, I endeavored to pluck the strange suspicion from my heart, I was forced to the conviction that Salome knew, in whole or in part, what had happened in the drawing-room, when she met me at the door!

True, I arrived at this conviction by no process of reasoning; but the conviction was absolute, nevertheless. It was gained partly by reflecting upon her actions upon this occasion; partly, and which I am compelled to add, by the thought of her unaccountable emotion exhibited upon other occasions, which I have before alluded to; and quite as much by the suspicion, perfectly shadowy and intangible, but which I had formed and directed towards Salome. In short, there was no certainty; I merely entertained a baseless presentiment.

In an hour I again sought my wife. Neither of us alluded to the events of the afternoon; I refrained from doing so, because I saw that she was still agitated. Yet her smile was never more sweet, nor her manner more endearing; and once she placed her arm about my neck, and softly whispered the words which I had once asked her:

"You love me, Ethel?"

Doubt and suspicion could not withstand those tender, pleading accents; and I answered with words of devotion such as brought the smile back to her face, and yet, alas, what an enigma was here!

* * * * *

It was several days subsequent to that of my adventure which I have described. Both Salome and myself had retired to our chamber, at the villa, for the night. Sleepless and nervous, I was lying in deep thought, with my eyes half-closed, while Salome lay by my side, apparently in a serene sleep. The room would have been dark, but for the starlight which faintly illuminated it, revealing the pictures and furniture indistinctly.

A slight noise startled me—the first sound that had broken the silence for an hour. Without moving, or further unclosing my eyes, I listened in breathless apprehension. Of late, the slightest of sounds was sufficient to arouse my attention.

Slowly, but perfectly distinct, a human figure now rose between me and the wall. Standing almost erect, it turned its face towards me, and again I saw the fiendish flash of that basilisk eye; the mysterious hag was before me! Hardly daring to breathe, I awaited her movements,

A pitcher, containing water, which my thirst often required upon summer nights, stood upon a stand at the head of the bed; and procuring a small vial, the hag emptied its contents, which seemed to be a white powder, into the pitcher. This done, she shook it, as if to dissolve the powder with the water.

The meaning of these movements flashed upon me with the certainty of revelation; I needed no explanation. Springing to the floor, I made one wild grasp at the fiend who had thus again sought to murder me. Shaking herself free from my hands, she fled—where or whither, I know not, for she disappeared so instantaneously as to defy pursuit. I staggered towards the bed, recoiling in quick and speechless horror—Salome was not there! No, nor was she in the room, though she had been lying by my side not a moment before.

But while I still stood in the middle of the floor, gazing with terror and dismay from the spot where I had last seen the hag, to the empty bed, the chamber-door softly opened, and Salome entered, habited in her night-robe. I turned upon her with fierce and stern words.

"Woman, where have you been—and why did you leave this room?" I asked.

"Do not reprove me, Ethel," was her half-frightened reply. "I must have been walking in my sleep."

"Salome, are you deceiving me? God pity me, this must be a fearful dream! Tell me, woman, temptress, have you leagued yourself with evil spirits to destroy me?"

Again I saw her face grow as white as the drifts of winter; without a word or cry she fell senseless at my feet. Raising her up, I carried her to the open window, and exposed her face and neck to the cool evening air. With a low-drawn, painful respiration, she unclosed her eyes, and as they rested upon my face, her arms tightened around my neck, and her emotion found relief in great sobs and tears of anguish.

"O, Ethel, Ethel, my husband," were her almost inarticulate words, "this agony will destroy me! Would that I might die for you, and end this wretched, miserable life! Trust me, dear Ethel, and love me, if you can, for I am worthy of it."

"Tell me then, Salome—"

"No, no—O, merciful God, ask me nothing!"

With a shudder of terror which thrilled me as deeply as it did her, she closed her eyes and concealed her face in my bosom. And until morning I held her thus, as I might have held an infant. Occasionally she would start in her sleep, muttering confused words; and through the night her slumbers were broken and fitful.—

In the morning I carefully analyzed the contents of the pitcher; my examination revealed the startling and significant fact, that sufficient strychnine had been mingled with the water to cause the deaths of ten men. And this was the draught that had been prepared for me!

III.—THE REVELATION OF DEATH

The villa where we had passed so many happy hours, had grown hateful and irksome to me; I longed to seek peace and rest in some other land. I mentioned my desire to my wife; she concurred passively. And when I added the remark, "We may be happier elsewhere, she smiled a sad, dreary smile. It was as if she had spoken the words, "no hope!"

The next year was passed beneath English skies. Yet, had we compassed the world for a place of rest, we might not have found a spot where the demon could not follow. And though there were intervals when for a time its influence seemed to fail, and something like the old love came back to Salome and me, yet the coming of the hag-fiend was not less certain. My nights were passed without sleep, and daybreak found me weak and faint. My life, indeed, seemed now reduced to a single study; how I could best defend myself from the demoniac efforts which were aimed so perseveringly at my destruction. Innumerable times I saw the hag, haunting my bedside, dogging my footsteps, and employing every art which its demon-nature could invent, to ensnare me. And more than once I escaped death as narrowly as upon the occasion of our first meeting.

Time passed on, and the restlessness of my troubled spirit desired a change. Reckless of the consequences, since no change of location could shield us from the tormentor, I proposed a return to our villa, in France. Salome gave a willing consent; she seemed latterly to depend on me for her very powers of volition. She clung to me like a terrified child, and seemed never to feel secure when absent from my arms.

Once more, then, we were at the villa. All seemed as when we left it, quiet and peaceful; and I sighed as I thought how happily two lives not cursed by fate might be passed here. Bitter was the reflection; but from it sprang into being a sudden energy which I had not before known.

"This happiness may yet be ours," I earnestly soliloquized. "If this evil spirit can by any possibility, and by human hands, be exorcised and slain, I will do the work. I may triumph yet, spite of this long suffering and misery."

I strove to be as wakeful as ever, that night, but nature at last asserted herself within me. Dozing between sleep and watchfulness, the former at last overcame me. Only observing that Salome was slumbering safely by my side, I closed my eyes and was soon lost in sleep.

Suddenly I awoke, recalled to sense by a feeling of strangling and suffocation, well-nigh overpowering. I was pinioned down, as if by a ponderous weight; my throat was compressed with the grasp of a vice; a hot breathing seared my cheek, and two glaring eyes burned from the darkness. The fiend was again upon me; and now, as it seemed, for a final struggle! But as for me, I was unable to resist; my breath came feebly, and I was growing weak and faint. The moment must have been my last, had I not remembered that my pistol lay beneath my head. With a painful struggle I succeeded in reaching it, and the next instant it was discharged full into the breast of the hag! Her hold relaxed, and she fell sideways across my body, the blood bubbling from the wound.

As my strength returned, I raised the body, in order to free myself from its weight, and it was while thus engaged, that the form and face became fully exposed to the light of the lamp which burned upon the stand. Heaven and earth—was I dreaming—and could this last astounding discovery be a reality? For there, slowly bleeding to death in my arms, I discovered, not the hag whom I had thought to destroy, but Salome, my wife!

And she died, there, and in my embrace, but not before I had learned the fearful story which this tragedy concluded. It was, briefly, that she was possessed of two individualities, one represented by Salome, and the other by the hag. Without the action of her will, she was transformed into an entirely different being, possessing attributes and passions as fiendish and hateful, as her own were good and lovely. And this—horrible thought!—this, while she wept and prayed in secret, that this devilish transformation which had thus cast its awful blight over both her life and mine, might be forever broken! There she lay, smiling in the sublime beauty of death, while I strove to warm her cold lips with kisses. I had slain the demon, but with it, such an angel as this earth may never more behold!

Let me pause; my brain is sick and weary with these crushing thoughts. I might relate the dying words with which she blessed me, and how tenderly she looked upon me, even as the light faded forever from her eyes; but I must forbear. This is my story; I have told it, and my heart bleeds anew! * * *

There are two faces forever haunting my dreams; one, hateful with all dark, withering passions—the other, glorious as a seraph's vision of beauty. And amid the shadows of this dark life-mystery, I can receive one ray of light, cherished in my inmost heart—the memory of the loved, the lost, the sainted Salome!

A DAMP FESTIVAL.

On the 12th of April, the last day of the Burman year, Mr. Johnson and myself were invited to bear a part in a sport that is universally practised throughout the Burman dominions on the concluding day of their annual cycle. To wash away the impurities of the past, and commence the new year free from stain, the women on this day are accustomed to throw water on every man they meet, and the men have the privilege of retorting—a license which, as you may imagine, gives rise to a great deal of fun, particularly amongst the young women, who, armed with long syringes and flagons, endeavor to throw water over any man who passes, and in return receive the water with perfect good humor. But you must be told that dirty water must not be thrown, nor must a man or boy lay his hands upon a woman or girl; moreover, if a woman declines to take part in the sport, she must not be molested, for it is taken for granted she is ill.

Well, on the 12th of April, about one hour before sundown, we went to the house of the governor, and found his wife had provided to give us a damp reception, for in the hall there were rows of water jars, with bowls and ladles ready to hand. Upon entering the hall, we were each presented with a bottle of rose-water, a little of which we poured into the hands of the governor, who sprinkled it over his own vest of fine flowered muslin. The lady then made her appearance at the door, giving us to understand that she did not mean to join in the sport herself, but made her daughter, a pretty child in the arms of a nurse, pour from a golden cup some rose-water, mixed with sandal wood, first over her father and then over us. This was the signal for the commencement of the sport, for which we were prepared by being dressed in white vestments.

About fifteen young women then rushed into the hall from the inner apartments, and surrounding the governor, myself, and Mr. Johnson, deluged us without mercy, and, of course, laughing heartily if we appeared at all distressed by the water flung in our faces. At length, all parties being tired, and completely drenched, we went home to change our clothes, and in the way met many damsels who would willingly have renewed the sport, had they received encouragement from us; but truly we had had sufficient for that day, especially as it came from antagonists whom politeness prevented our repaying in full. When we had changed our clothes, we returned to the governor's, and were entertained with a dance and a puppet show till the early hour of morning.—The White Elephant. By William Dalton.

DIED LAST NIGHT!

BY MRS. E. B. EDSON.

Died last night! a sunny, fair-haired child,
 A mother's firstborn, wildly worshipped one,
 Whose little grave casts shadows o'er her path,
 Which the bright sunshine never can outrun;
 Whose little hand bright links of love hath brought,
 With sunny brow and witching smile, her darling one!

Died last night! while maiden grace and loveliness,
 And fresh and guileless purity its blessed sunshine shed
 O'er her young heart, and lighted all the way,
 And fell in rippling glory o'er her bright young head,
 So sinless and so pure, that a kind angel came
 And wrote her name among the early dead.

Died last night! in manhood's stalwart prime,
 Ere age hath wrought one shadow on his polished brow;
 Ere slackened pulse or sluggish blood betrayed
 The faintest shadows of the well-kept vow
 Which Time hath registered, but which he eludes,
 By going in his perfect manhood now.

Died last night!—the early morning bells
 Chimed out on the still air his ripened years;
 His palsied limbs bathed in immortal youth:
 His silvered locks a glory-wreath appears—
 And casts a holy radiance o'er the upturned face,
 Unquenched by floods of bitter, burning tears!

A LEGEND OF SORRENTO CASTLE.

BY HOWARD LIVINGSTON.

A DEEP bay window in the west room of the Castle del Sorrento held two figures, that showed clear and distinct in the bright rays of a clear October moon. One was of a youthful cavalier, with a profusion of dark curls shading an olive brow and cheek. The other was that of a fair-haired girl, whose white arms and hands looked still whiter in the moonlight, and whose soft low tones contrasted strangely with the passionate voice of the youth.

"It is in vain, Julio," she said, softly. "My grandfather has threatened me with imprisonment in the lowest cell of the castle, if I do not receive the count as my husband. I am watched momentarily by that horrid Montani whom my grandfather employs, I believe, expressly because I dislike him so much; and whom I have only eluded now because he believes me fast asleep in my chamber."

"And there is no hope, Armida?"

"None, Julio. This hour must be our farewell. Think of me sometimes in the lonely cell to which I am doomed; for, believe me, I will never marry the count."

"Nor shall the cell be your portion, dearest! Trust me, I will find some way to help you avoid it."

"Ah, Julio, you know not the resolute character of my grandfather. Once determined upon a matter, he will move heaven and earth to accomplish his wishes. It was so with my poor mother, whom he married to a man older than himself; and I feel sure that already the chain is tightening around me."

She looked up mournfully into his eyes, with such an expression of keen, unmitigated anguish at that moment, that Julio's heart was more deeply touched by her sorrow than by his own. It was a hard fate indeed, that of a sweet, childish thing like Armida, with no alternative from a prison, save that of marrying an old and disagreeable man. For Count Luani was of a stern, unyielding and dictatorial disposition; and Armida knew how unceasing would be his watch upon her very words and looks. Better a hut in the Alpine solitudes, with Julio Adimari, than the splendid palace of Luani with its morose and selfish master.

Armida's grandfather, the Count Carafi, had become very poor from some cause unknown to the public or even his own family. Men whispered that the confidential servant, Montani, held a rod above his head for some deed committed long ago; and that the drain upon the old man's estates found its way into the pockets of Montani. It was well-known that the latter held a sharp oversight upon Armida, and that he was eager that she should marry the rich old count who claimed her hand upon the strength of her grandfather's promise.

Years ago, the Count Carafi, in a moment of uncontrollable rage and jealousy, had killed one who had been his bosom friend, but who had crossed him in an affair very near to his heart. Montani was the only witness to the deed which was performed in the dark forest belonging to the Donati castle, where Montani was keeper. The count succeeded by dint of extravagant promises, in whiling him away from the Donati, and securing him in his own service; but he had in turn become Montani's slave. Knowing that he could at any time bring him to ignominy, he was forced to submit to the most galling and humiliating restraints from his own servant. Montani knew his advantage and pursued it without mercy. The scheme of marrying the young Armida to the count originated wholly with him. Carafi's purse was running low, and the estate was already heavily saddled with debt. Montani's hopes of obtaining money in future, were at a low ebb; when suddenly the Count

Luani appeared, to raise his drooping spirits by falling in love with the grandchild of his friend.

Already had Armida's heart been touched by the mute devotion displayed in the countenance of Julio Adimari. Both young in years, and timid from the strict seclusion in which they had lived, they exchanged no word of love, until the terrible announcement of her grandfather's wishes sent Armida, pale and tearful, to consult her only friend, how best to avoid the coming evil. This interview disclosed to them the state of their own and each other's hearts; and for awhile they lost sight of their unhappiness; but at the meeting above recorded, Armida's apprehensions could not be concealed; Count Carafi having that morning threatened to confine her until she was willing to submit to his decision. Montani had desired him to do this; and the poor old count, haunted by his crime and hunted down by his implacable enemy, had consented to employ any means to bring Armida to terms, that Montani's avarice might suggest.

It was evening when Montani himself led Armida to the tower which he had graciously substituted for the lower cell which he had threatened. Her grandfather could not endure to go with her himself; his heart was not yet dead to emotions of tenderness, and he could not inflict upon his child the punishment which he had consented should be the penalty for her disobedience. The thought of her mother, whose young life had been sacrificed to the same insatiable avarice, arose to his mind, and he left the castle to avoid hearing the cries which he imagined she would raise in her progress to her prison.

He had mistaken her spirit. To all Montani's taunts, she preserved a dignified silence, and on reaching the room, she pushed away the arm that would have guided her in, and entered with the step of a princess. Two or three hours had added years to Armida's experience. She was no longer a child—but a woman whom suffering had made stronger and more mature. She looked around the room, to which a small lamp gave a feeble light. A table on which it stood, held a jar of water and a basket of thin cakes. The count had pleaded with Montani for a little fruit, but he had failed to provide it. He had no idea of making her abode more comfortable than could be helped; and his low mind conceived that Armida could be touched by things of mere personal gratification.

A small couch was the only bed provided for her; and this was hard enough to suit the strictest anchorite. There was a brazier, in which coals were smouldering; but the warmth was doubtful. Armida looked out of the window. The small crescent moon showed her a lake beneath the tower. There was no way of escape, and she would probably see no one but the hateful Montani—perhaps not for months. Of one thing she was certain. Julio would be watching the castle, and she could at least place her light where he could see her figure, as she moved about the room. The tower was at the extreme western end of the castle, while the count inhabited the eastern part. Even in the day time, she could be seen; for the tower was so high that no precaution had been taken to have the windows grated; and it was so small that there would not have been sufficient light without burning a lamp all day, had there been any bars.

Stern as was the Count Carafi, the thought of his grandchild shut up in this dreary place worried and oppressed him. Contrary to Montani's advice, he visited her and tried to persuade her to do as he wished in regard to the Count Luani.

Had Armida been at first disposed to listen, there was an object at that moment meeting her view that would have effectually prevented her. A boat was upon the lake, and her heart told her that the fisherman who guided its oars was Julio himself. Trembling lest her grandfather should recognize him, or Montani's ceaseless vigilance detect his disguise, she forbore making the signal which she doubted not he was seeking from her; and, when, after rowing several times across the lake, he disappeared behind a cliff, she was rather gratified than disappointed, so great were her fears. It was something to have even this mute token of his love, and she knew that he would be there as often as prudence would warrant him in coming.

Fortunately she had a pencil and a piece of white cloth about her. She wrote a few brief words, wrapped it around a bit of light wood that would be likely to float, and dropped it in the lake. The fisherman looked up and caught it as it fell, for the boat was just then beneath her window. He pressed it to his lips in token that he knew the writer, and again shot away behind the cliff. The next day he came again—but this time the pencil was broken; though a telegraphic communication was opened through the hands that inspired confidence and hope.

When Montani made his customary morning visit, she was sitting always in the same spot, her head leaning upon her hand and her face turned away from the window. She asked him for a pen and ink, and he, hoping that she was about to write her willingness to accede to their plans, unwittingly consented to furnish her with writing materials. The moment he was gone, she commenced writing these words—"Come by moonlight. I will be prepared to descend to you." Throwing it into the lake and waiting to be assured that Julio had read it, she fell on her knees and uttered a fervent prayer for freedom.

The door suddenly opened, and Montani's face looked in upon her. She started in dismay, feeling for a moment that even Julio was not safe against this man's vengeful wrath. But this time his cunning was at fault, although he had certainly heard the prayer she had uttered. Fortunately, he did not go to the window, for already Julio was holding the handkerchief in his hand, and she dreaded lest he should have been watched as he picked it up.

"The poor, dear child!" said Julio, to himself. "Does she think it possible to come down to me from that high tower? But I will rescue her from her imprisonment, or die in the attempt!"

The next day, a tall, brown gipsey made her appearance among the servants of Count Caraffi, offering to tell their fortunes. Anything out of the common course of their terribly dull and quiet life at the castle, was eagerly caught at; and even Montani did not object to having the woman taken to the servants' hall and delivering her sage oracles. Among those assembled, was a little waiting maid who had often accompanied Armida on her excursions in the neighborhood. The child's eyes were red with weeping for her mistress's confinement. The gipsey very naturally deferred telling this girl's fortune until the last, on account of her being younger than the others; and the older ones had hastened away to compare notes upon what she had told them, leaving little Alice and the gipsey entirely by themselves. Their conversation was carried on in a low tone. After a few brief words, the woman said:

"Now do not start or show any agitation at what I say. You love your mistress, do you not?"

Spite of her warning, the gipsey saw that Alice trembled all over and was about to speak.

"Hush! you will injure her if you do not obey me. Do you wish to release her from her confinement?"

It was well that the face of Alice was turned away from the open door that separated the apartment from that in which the servants were now at work. She eagerly expressed her assent, and the gipsey went on.

"Are you admitted to her room?"

"No, but please God, I shall see her to-night."

"How?"

"I dare not tell."

"No harm shall come to you. I, too, wish your mistress to be free. She was kind to me once, and I owe her jailer a grudge."

"Her jailer?"

"Yes; Montani. He is her jailer, not her poor old grandfather. You see, Alice, that I know all. Now tell me, how you will manage to get to her?"

"I am almost afraid; but I am dying to see her, and as you seem so friendly, perhaps I may trust you."

"You may indeed."

"Well, then, I have concealed the duplicate key of the tower. It was dropped by the count this morning, and I—O, what have I been saying?"

"Hush, my child. I, too, will confide in you. Meet me in the wood at noon, and I will tell you who I am. Not another word!"

"Alice!" shrieked the old housekeeper. "Alice, come! It has taken twice as long to tell your fortune as it did the rest. Come away to your work!"

And Alice was obliged to go, and the gipsey soon disappeared, leaving the servants in amaze that she did not contrive to steal even a chicken, as those of her tribe usually did when they came to the castle.

Punctually, the little maid kept her appointment; but, to her surprise, no gipsey was there. But one met her there whom she was equally glad to see—the Signor Adimari; and to him she related her sorrows, her hopes and her fears, that the gipsey had deceived her.

"Nay, Alice, the gipsey is true. I will pledge life and honor that she is so. Have you got the key?"

"Yes, signor, here it is."

"Give it me then, my good girl, and have no fears. Now go, for you may be suspected."

Alice gathered the herbs which she had promised the housekeeper, and departed. How long were the hours of that weary afternoon to the faithful little maid! But night came at last, and she was summoned to await on Montani, for he had assumed his dly state. She had been his attendant, though a reluctant one, since Armida's confinement. She had told this to Julio, and he had taken advantage of the circumstance, to give her a powder for Montani's wine, which he assured her would do him no farther harm than to make him sleep profoundly until morning. At ten, the house was still. Alice stole out of it, as Julio had directed her, and waited at a distance. Then, as the echoes from the old tower had died away, Armida, who was holding her nightly watch by the little window, saw Julio's boat drawn up close to the castle wall beneath her window, and long before she could plan what to do or how to communicate with him, the key was noiselessly turned in the lock and he stood before her. Not a whisper passed between them, as the moon faintly lighted their passage down the winding stairs, and along the narrow strip of pathway to the river. The boat was soon rocking on the water, and then Armida threw off the gipsy hood, in which he had enveloped her head and, for the first time, saw that Alice too was beside her.

Montani slept soundly until his strange non-appearance set the household wondering. When he awoke, it was broad noon, and his first thought was of Armida. He went instantly to the tower, and his rage at not finding her may not be described.

The old count secretly rejoiced that she had escaped. He believed her safe, because Alice, too, was missing, and he felt assured that the little maiden had possessed herself of his key to free her mistress. He inwardly exulted that Montani could no longer touch him through the sufferings of his grandchild.

Now he resolved to do what he ought long before to have done—to confess his long-ago crime at the feet of royalty, and rid himself of the incubus that had weighed upon him so long in the tyranny of Montani.

Committed so far back in the past, he readily found his pardon. The dead man had no friends to revive the memory of the crime, or to require his life or liberty to appease vengeance; and royalty not only accorded a full and free pardon to the aged count, but also banished his tormentor to a distant shore.

These tidings reached Julio and Armida in their hiding-place, and brought them back to the home where Caraffi's heart was yearning for his lost child. Enough was left of his possessions to make them all happy, although Montani had done his best to rob and despoil. No one but little Alice ever suspected that the gipsy fortune-teller was other than she seemed. Even the old count always believed that Alice planned the escape of her mistress.

The Count Luani solaced himself with a more willing bride—one far more suitable to his age, and who brought him untold wealth to compensate for her want of beauty and intelligence.

The pleasantest things in the world are pleasant thoughts, and the greatest art in life is to have as many of them as possible.

FAIRY STORIES.

All a child wants at first is a "story," about good or bad people matters not—whether with or without a moral. Every impression must be conveyed in the broadest coloring and simplest outline. The young mind instinctively refuses to perplex itself with nice distinctions of right and wrong. Brave little Jack attacking the cruel giants, Cinderella's unkind sisters punished by seeing her exaltation, and, in fact, the general tenor of old-fashioned fairy lore, where all the bad people die miserably, and all the good people marry kings and queens, and live very happy to the end of their days, furnish as much moral teaching as can be well taken in at the age of six or seven. And the intellectual, like the physical appetite is not a bad gauge of its own capacity of digestion. Therefore, we cannot help suggesting that there may be some little mistake in the flood of moral and religious literature with which our hapless infants are now overwhelmed; here every incident is "usefully applied," and the virtuous and the wicked walk about carefully labelled "This is the good," "This is the bad," so that no child can possibly mistake one for the other. And, without wishing to blame a very well meaning class of educators, it may fairly be questioned how far it is wholesome to paint children going about converting their fathers and mothers, and youthful saints of three-and-a-half prating confidently about things which we are told, "the angels themselves desire to look into," yet cannot or dare not. We honestly confess that we should very much prefer "Jack the Giant Killer."—The Age of Gold.

HABITS.

Like flakes of snow that fall unperceived upon the earth, the seemingly unimportant events of life succeed one another. As the snow gathers together, so are our habits formed. No single flake that is added to the pile produces a sensible change. No single action creates, however it exhibit, a man's character; but as the tempest huris the avalanche down the mountain, and overwhelms the inhabitant and his habitation, so passion, acting upon the elements of mischief which pernicious habits brought together by imperceptible accumulation, may overthrow the edifice of truth and virtue.—Herder.

PROVERBS WORTH PRESERVING.

Hasty people drink the wine of life scalding hot.—Death is the only master who takes his servants without a character.—Content is the mother of good digestion.—When pride and poverty marry together, their children are want and crime.—Where hard work kills ten, idleness kills a hundred men.—Folly and pride walk side by side.—He that borrows binds himself with his neighbor's rope.—He that is too good for good advice, is too good for his neighbor's company.—Friends and photographs never flatter.—The Modern Esop.

SYMPATHY.

The heart that bleeds
From any stroke of fate, or human wrongs,
Loves to disclose itself, that listening pity
May drop a healing tear upon the wound.—Mason

The Florist.

Gather ye rosebuds while ye may,
Old Time is still a-flying;
And this same flower that smiles to-day,
To-morrow will be dying.—HZAARCK.

Root-grafting Roses.

The process of root-grafting roses may now be performed, and it is the best method of increasing the hybrid perpetuals, though it may be safely practised with all roses. The roots generally used are those of the manetti, and splice or plain grafting the mode most practised. Prepare clean pieces of root about one inch, or an inch and a half long; pare off a thin slice smoothly at one end, to which the graft, prepared in a similar manner, must be adjusted. Apply the two surfaces, taking care to have the edges, or at least one edge, coincide; hold firmly with the thumb and finger until strongly tied with cotton twist; then smear with grafting composition, or common grafting paper coated with a mixture of tallow, beeswax and resin, such as is employed in fruit-tree root-grafting; insert the grafts in pans of sandy loam, and place in a gentle bottom heat.

The Chrysanthemum.

The chrysanthemum is the pride of the amateur's garden; it is a flower easy of culture, and within the means of all. It grows by the cottager's porch and in the rich man's conservatory. It is used to form the bridal wreath, as well as the villager's nosegay. Gold is not its prevailing color now as of old. We have delicate white, soft yellow, pleasing blue, bright red, dusky brown, and all shades of these.

Soil for Flower-Beds.

The soil for flower-beds should be neither too light nor too heavy. If too sandy, though the plants will come forward rapidly, yet in our hot dry summer weather they will require too frequent watering. If too heavy, it will be troublesome to work, and will be apt to cake and harden after rain. For manure, leaf mould, rotted sods and charcoal dust are excellent.

Verbenas.

The seeds of verbenas are a long time germinating—sometimes a month, but they are pretty sure to come up. Sow in pots in the house, covering the seeds with a very little earth, early in the spring. They can be transplanted into the garden as early as any verbenas grown in hot-houses. If they do well, they will blossom in July.

Edging for Flower-Borders.

The very neatest edging for flower-borders in a small garden is box. Great pains should be taken in keeping it evenly clipped, as severe formality is absolute necessary in box edgings. No old-fashioned garden was ever thought complete without its neat boundary rows of box.

The Dielytra Spectabilis.

This elegant flower is that becoming a universal favorite. It was introduced from Japan via England, about ten years ago. As it forms a fleshy or tuberous root-stock, it is very easily propagated by division or cuttings.

Birds' Eye.

This little plant, the botanical name of which is primula farinosa, is very pretty, and should be cultivated in soil which has a large proportion of peat, and kept moist.

Arranging a Garden.

It is frequently found that in small gardens, and particularly those walled in, one part of it gets very little sun; perhaps one of the walls gets none; scarcely anything does well near that wall. It is a good plan to make the principal path near that wall. In this case a little border, not more than a foot wide, should be made for the purpose of planting ivy or climbing roses, or anything to cover the wall, and next that the path; the edging to the path should be London pride, thrift, or white Arabis. The other part of the garden which the sun reaches should be flower-beds for things which cannot thrive without it.

Influence of Flowers.

Why does not every one have a geranium, a rose, a fuchsia, or some other flower, in the window? It is very cheap, next to nothing, if you raise it from seed or slip, and it is a beauty and a companion. As charming Leigh Hunt says, "It sweetens the air, rejoices the eye, links you with nature and innocence, and is something to love. If it cannot love you in return, it cannot hate you; it cannot utter a hateful thing even for neglecting it, for though it is all beauty, it has no vanity; and living, as it does, purely to do you good, and afford you pleasure, how can you neglect it?"

Timely Hints.

Never work with bad tools. The difference between the work done in a month would buy a set of new ones. Have a place for every tool and never leave one out of its place. Never fill a pot so full of soil but that it may hold water enough to go through it; every pot should have an inch of space above the compost. Never grow a bad variety of anything if you can help it. It takes the same room and wants the same attention as a good one. Cover all seeds with at least their own thickness of soil, but as some gets washed off, you must allow for it.

Bee Larkspurs.

The bee larkspur has become a very large family, called delphinium; of this one of the best is delphinium formosum. The seed of this sown when asters and stocks are sown, and similarly treated, will bloom the first year. The flowers are large and bloom in spikes, the color intense blue, the height about a foot. It is the richest of all perennials for the open border; the roots part for increase, but if left in the ground, it spreads and throws up more spikes.

German Asters.

German asters should be raised in a hotbed in February or March, pricked out when the plants have two or three leaves, and transplanted into the open garden in May, where they will make a very fine appearance in September and October. They should be grown in light rich soil, or in loam and thoroughly rotten dung.

Whitlavia Grandiflora.

This flower is appreciated wherever it is cultivated. It has a profusion of rich blue bell-shaped flowers, and blooms perpetually, beginning when the plants are but four or five inches high and continuing all the summer and autumn.

Idly of the Valley.

This delicate and fragrant flower requires rather a moist soil, which should be tolerably light. The plant is increased by dividing the roots, which are very numerous; and though it is generally supposed to like the shade, yet it will not flower well unless it has plenty of light.

Curious Matters.

Preserves.

It is not generally known that at Coppet, on the Lake of Geneva, the residence of the late Madame de Stael, and her father and mother, the celebrated Monsieur and Madame Necker, the latter are not there buried, but preserved in a huge vat of spirits of wine. The curious, and they are not few, rush there to see this most painful as well as most disagreeable of sights. It was so much the desire of Monsieur Necker that he and his wife should be pickled in this strange manner, that, fearing his own family might not carry out his wishes, he left a certain sum to be paid yearly to the town for the support of a certain quantity of spirits of wine for that purpose. The vat is placed in the grounds close to the house, and partially hid by trees, which his grandson, Monsieur le Baron de Stael, had planted round it.

Anecdotes of Beards.

Among the curious anecdotes of beards, the oddest is that told of the eminent John Mayo, a painter, at the court of Charles V., whose beard was so long that he could stand upon it. This cataract of hair he kept tied up with ribbons to his button-holes, sometimes unfastening at the emperor's wish, opening the doors and windows that it might blow into the faces of angry courtiers. Another famous beard was that of a Bavarian merchant, who kept it enclosed in a velvet bag, to prevent it from dragging on the ground. An old writer, of more gravity, we fear, than veracity, asserts that the inhabitants of Hardenburgh had formerly the singular custom of electing the burgomaster who had the longest beard and biggest foot.

Is it so?

The St. John's News says:—"A gentleman of intelligence and observation informs us, from all the information he can obtain from medical men now having many cases of small pox under treatment, that there is no house in the city where gas is burnt, of the ordinary consumption, in which the disease has yet found lodgment. The gas, it is supposed, is a powerful disinfectant, and hence there is no contagion within the circle of its influence. He says that a person burning gas may contract the disease abroad and take it home with him; but it will not be communicated to any other member of his family."

Mode of getting Practice.

Dr. Richard Mead, of England, was the first to introduce the custom of having himself "called out of church;" but he practised this ruse under more favorable advantages than most could. His father was a clergyman, with a large congregation, and when the doctor was summoned out, would say, "Dear brethren, let us offer a prayer for the poor sufferer to whose relief my son Richard has been called." In this way the son gained notoriety.

Curious Formation.

Some months ago, Mr. John Johnson of Lockhaven, Pa., had the middle finger of his right hand amputated close to the lower joint joining the hand. The wound soon healed over, and almost immediately a new finger commenced growing from the stump of the old one; and six months from the time the finger was amputated, Mr. Johnson had a new and full grown one in its place, with the exception of the nail, which is just commencing to grow.

Remarkable Discovery of Specie.

A Hanover correspondent of the Abington Standard says: "Remarkable discoveries have been made in the dwelling of Mrs. Hannah Robbins, since her decease. A tin pail filled with silver was found under her bed, and a kettle full of specie was also discovered. Some of it was mouldy and dusty with age, evidently having been undisturbed for years. The amount of specie thus discovered is $1800. In addition to this, a thorough examination of the premises has brought to light a quantity of the old continental money, laid down in tobacco leaves. As this is of no value, it was not counted. All her property goes to a grandchild—the only survivor of a once numerous family."

Singular Phenomenon.

A geological singularity occurred lately in Savoy, which will attract the notice of the geologists. At Orcler, in the mountain chain above Thonon, a part of the ground sank, and in its place a lake formed. The high chestnut trees disappeared entirely, with the piece of ground on which they stood, and in their stead rose trunks of trees to the surface, which had evidently long been under water, and which must have belonged to a species of tree not known about the country. At the same time a little brook has formed, that carries away the superfluous water of the lake.

Singular Effects of Camomile.

A decoction of the leaves of common camomile will destroy all species of insects, and nothing contributes so much to the health of a garden as a number of camomile plants dispersed through it. No green-house or hot-house should ever be without it, in a green or dried state; either the stalks or the flowers will answer. It is a singular fact that, if a plant is drooping and apparently dying, in nine cases out of ten it will recover if you plant camomile near it.

Growth of Hair.

"A young lady friend of mine," says a correspondent of the London Field, "was recommended by a coiffeur to use sage water. She was obliged to discontinue its daily use as it made her hair too thick. Pour boiling water on the sage leaves, and let them remain some time in the oven or near a stove; strain and apply to the roots of the hair daily. If any pomade is needed, an equal mixture of coconut and olive oils, with a little perfume, is very efficacious."

That "That."

In thirty-one words, how many thates can be grammatically inserted? Answer, fourteen. He said that that that that man said was not that that that one should say; but that that, that that man said, was that that that man should not say. That reminds us of the following says and saids: Mr. B., did you say, or did you not say, what I said you said? because C. said you said you never did say what I said you said. Now, if you did say that you did not say what I said you said, then what did you say?

King Bladud and his Pigs.

The city of Bath has a curious and somewhat comic tradition that the old British king, Bladud, being reduced by leprosy to the condition of a swineherd, discovered the medicinal virtues of the hot springs of Bath while noticing that the pigs which bathed therein were cured of sundry diseases prevailing among them.

A remarkable Book.

Perhaps the most singular bibliographic curiosity is that which belonged to the family of the Prince de Ligne, and in France. It is entitled, "Liber Passions Nostri Jesu Christicum caracteribus nulla materia compositis." This book is neither written nor printed! The whole letters of the text are cut out of each folio upon the finest vellum; and being interleaved with blue paper, it is read as easily as the best print. The labor and patience bestowed on its completion must have been excessive, especially when the precision and minuteness of the letters are considered. The general execution, in every respect, is indeed admirable, and the vellum is of the most delicate and costly kind. Rodolphus II., of Germany, offered for it, in 1640, 11,000 ducats, which was probably equal to 60,000 at this day. The most remarkable circumstance connected with this literary treasure is, that it bears the royal arms of England, but it cannot be traced to have ever been in that country.

Measuring the Waves.

The height of waves has been often exaggerated, some stating that they are often higher than the masts of the tallest ships, and others speaking of them as "mountains high." The late Dr. Scoresby has left us some data of the height and velocity of waves, which may be relied upon as nearly accurate, and which will give a more correct idea of the subject than the fantastic description of the poet. In a great gale the waves average forty-one or forty-two feet in height; but as the vision was often disturbed by the tops of breaking waves, which rose much higher, the doctor placed the average at fifty feet. The average rate of the kind of waves known as "rollers," he found to be nearly the same in the Southern Ocean as in the Northern Atlantic—the former running at the rate of 54.84 feet per second, or 33.9 geographical miles an hour, while in the latter, from experiments made by the doctor in 1847, he found the rate to be 32.67 miles per hour.

Singular Detection.

Between Orleans and Nevers, and not far from Cosne, on the Loire River, in France, lies the village of La Celle. In this village, standing at some distance from any other building, is the Giraffe Hotel, the proprietor of which acquired wealth very rapidly, and, to the villagers, most unaccountably. Recently a railroad was projected, to run through La Celle, and "mine host" of the Giraffe offered to have that part of the road which was to pass over a tract of land in his vicinity made at his own expense. This disinterested offer was not accepted, but laborers at once placed upon the spot, who, in the excavations necessary to make the proper grade, exhumed no less than twenty-five human bodies, some of which were recognized as merchants and travellers who had mysteriously disappeared after remaining for a night at the "Giraffe."

Deformed Skulls.

Considerable discussion took place, lately, at a meeting of the Ethnological Society, in London, in regard to some deformed skulls found at Wroxter, near the Severn, but on an elevation of from thirty to forty feet above the level of the river, and about two feet below the ground. Many took the ground, that continued pressure since death had produced the singular shape of the skulls; but others seemed to think they belonged to a distinct race of beings. The meeting adjourned without coming to any decided expression of opinion on the subject.

Curious Suicide.

The Akron Beacon gives the following particulars of the suicide by drowning of Mrs. Ann Dumbford, an Irish woman, in Tallmadge. The circumstances are very singular:—"She had recently given birth to an infant that did not survive its birth, and the anguish she experienced as to the destiny of this unbaptized offspring drove her to insanity. She left her bed at an early hour in the morning, and walked more than a mile barefoot over snow, frozen ground and ice, to the canal, got a rail from a fence, broke a hole through the ice, and plunged in. She was tracked from the dwelling to the spot, and the shawl floating in the hole indicated where the body was to be found. She was about thirty-five years old."

Foreign Bodies under the Eyelid.

The following simple process for removing foreign bodies from beneath the eyelid is recommended by M. Renard:—"Take hold of the upper eyelid near its angles, with the index finger and thumb of each hand, draw it gently forward, and as low down as possible, over the lower eyelid, and retain it in this position for about a minute, taking care to prevent the tears flowing out. When, at the end of this time, you allow the eyelid to resume its place, a flood of tears washes out the foreign body, which will be found adhering to or near the lower eyelid."

Bearded Women.

Michaëlis states that, in 1783, there lived at Dresden a bearded virgin. Her beard grew from each side of her chin, was three inches long, and of snowy whiteness. She cut it at first every month, then every fortnight, afterwards twice in the week. On her upper lip was a moustache of short black hair. She had a powerful voice, sat enormously, and was bold and courageous.—Elbe narrates that during the reign of Maria Theresa, a woman, who served in the army for many years as a hussar, and rose to the rank of captain, had a strong moustache.

Curious Anecdote.

Towards the close of the Revolution the owners of the North Church, in New Haven, sent to Boston for nails to make repairs with, when one of the kegs sent in return for the order was found to contain Spanish silver dollars. The deacons wrote to the Boston merchant that there was an "error in shipping the goods;" but he answered that the nails were sold as he bought them of a privateersman, and he couldn't rectify mistakes. So the silver was melted up and made into a service of plate for the church, where it is in use at the present day.

An ingenious Missionary.

The Rev. Mr. Hurlbutt, of Canada, a missionary among the Indians in British America, lately delivered a lecture in Detroit, giving an account of his labors among that people. Among other things, he exhibited a portion of the Bible printed in the language of the Cree nation, one of the tribes in the Hudson Bay region. This language he reduced to writing, inventing characters for the purpose. He then cut type from wood with a common knife, made a press himself, and then printed the book.

The first American Carriage.

The first carriage said to be built in America, was built in Dorchester, Mass., by a man named White, for a private gentleman in Boston. It was copied from an English chariot, though much lighter, and was a credit to its maker.

The Housewife.

Perpetual Plum Pudding.

Three pounds of stoned raisins, three pounds of brown sugar, three pounds of currants, three pounds of grated bread, three pounds of suet shred very fine, three pounds of eggs, one pound of citron, three tablespoonful of flour, quarter of a pint of wine, quarter of a pint of brandy, two nutmegs, a little mace, and a teaspoonful of salt. Mix the ingredients well together, and divide into six equal parts; tie each part in a separate cloth; put them in water already boiling, and boil four hours. If they are to be kept, hang them in a cool place, and when wanted for use boil them again from one to three hours, according to the time they have been hanging.

Silver Cake.

Two cups of fine white sugar, two and a half cups of sifted flour, half a cup of butter, three-quarters of a cup of sweet milk, half a teaspoonful of soda dissolved in the milk, the whites of eight eggs, and a teaspoonful of cream of tartar; flavor with peach, vanilla or rose-water; stir the sugar and butter to a cream, then add the whites of the eggs beaten to a stiff froth, add the flour, then the milk and soda; stir the whole together several minutes, then add the cream of tartar and spice.

Gold Cake.

Take the yolks of the eggs, after using the whites for the silver cake, beat them to a stiff froth, and mix them with a cup of sugar and three-quarters of a cup of butter previously stirred to a cream; add two cups of sifted flour, half a teaspoonful of soda dissolved in half a cup of sweet milk; when well mixed, stir in a teaspoonful of cream of tartar; flavor with peach, almond or lemon. Bake both it and the silver cake in pans.

To make Brilla Soup.

Take a shin of beef, cut off all the meat in square pieces, then boil the bone three hours; strain it and take off the fat, then put the broth to boil with the pieces of meat, a few carrots and turnips cut small, and a good sprig of thyme, some onions chopped, and a stick of celery cut in pieces; stir them all till the meat is tender. If not cooking brown, you must color it.

A Spring Dish.

Upon a toasted bread place a layer of well boiled spinach about an inch thick; upon this place at equal distances poached eggs. This forms a pretty, light and nourishing dish; but be careful that the yellow of the egg is not broken, or the appearance will be lost, and the eggs not worth eating.

Bread Cake.

To one pint of stale bread, crumbed fine, add five eggs, two teaspoons of flour, half a cup of butter, and one quart of milk. Soak the bread with the milk. Make in a batter, and bake as buckwheat cakes.

For Stomach Ache and Dysentery.

If not of too long continuance, a wine-glass of super-carbonate soda every half hour, not to exceed six times, will cure.

Ink-Spots from Mahogany.

Touch with oil of vitriol, for a moment or so, till gone, then wash off with warm water.

Pigeon Pie.

Border a large dish with fine puff-paste, and cover the bottom with a veal cutlet, or tender steak, free from fat and bone, and seasoned with salt, cayenne, and nutmeg; prepare with great nicety as many fresh-killed pigeons as the dish will contain in one layer; put into each a slice of butter, seasoned with a little cayenne; lay them into the dish with the breasts downwards, and between and over them put the yolks of half a dozen hard-boiled eggs; stick plenty of butter on them, season the whole well with salt and spice, pour in some cold water for the gravy, roll out the cover three-quarters of an inch thick, secure it well round the edge, ornament it highly, and bake it for an hour or more in a well-heated oven.

Rice Bread.

Take one pound and a half of rice, and boil it gently over a slow fire in three quarts of water about five hours, stirring it, and afterwards beating it up into a smooth paste. Mix this while warm into two gallons, or four pounds of flour, adding at the same time the usual quantity of yeast. Allow the dough to work a certain time near the fire, after which divide it into loaves, and it will be found, when baked, to produce twenty-eight or thirty pounds of excellent white bread.

Black Ink.

Take of Aleppo galls bruised, one pound and a half; green vitriol, twelve ounces; powdered gum arabic, eight ounces; rasped logwood, eight ounces; soft water, two gallons and a half. Boil the galls and logwood in the water till it be reduced to two gallons, then add the remaining articles, and put the whole into a convenient vessel, stirring it several times during the day, for fourteen or fifteen days, at the end of which time it will be fit for use.

Furniture Paste.

Scrape two ounces of beeswax into a pot or basin; then add as much spirits of turpentine as will moisten it through; at the same time powder an eighth part of an ounce of resin, and add to it, when dissolved to the consistency of paste, as much Indian red as will bring it to a deep mahogany color; stir it up, and it will be fit for use.

Arrowroot Drops, or Biscuits.

Half a pound of butter beaten up to a cream, seven eggs well whisked, adding seven ounces of flour, six ounces of arrowroot, and half a pound of loaf sugar; mix all well together, and drop on a clean tin, size of a shilling; bake in a slow oven.

Egg Butter.

One quart of good molasses well boiled with half of a lemon rind, eight eggs well beaten and stirred in slowly; boil fifteen minutes, add the spices preferred, and put away for use.

Fried Peppernuts.

One pound of sugar, quarter of a pound of butter, seven eggs, a teaspoonful of soda dissolved in sour milk, and as much flour as will make a soft dough. Make them in rings, and bake in lard.

Spots on Cloth.

To take spots produced by acids from cloth, calico, or any other fabric. Touch with volatile sal ammoniac or spirits of hartshorn, and they will disappear.

Borax.

The washerwomen of Holland and Belgium, who get up their linen so beautifully white, use refined borax as a washing-powder instead of soda, in the proportions of a large handful of borax powder to about ten gallons of boiling water; they save in soap nearly half. All the large washing establishments adopt the same mode. For lace, cambrics, etc., an extra quantity of the powder is used; and for crinolines (required to be made very stiff), a strong solution is necessary. Borax, being a semi-neutral salt, does not injure the texture of the finest linen.

Muffin Pudding.

Rub the tin mould with butter. Stick in the butter suitana or stoned raisins so thickly that no part of the mould be visible, unless you wish it to appear white in parts. Lay in the mould six or more sponge biscuits; and mix together two teacupful of cream, four yolks of eggs, one glass of brandy, and sugar. Pour this into the mould and boil it. Serve with sweet sauce. It can be eaten cold as trifle.

Lemon Gingerbread.

Grate the rinds of two or three lemons, and add the juice to a glass of brandy; then mix the grated lemon in one pound of flour, make a hole in the flour, pour in half a pound of treacle, half a pound of butter melted, the lemon-juice and brandy, and mix all up together with half an ounce of ground ginger and quarter of an ounce of Cayenne pepper.

To cap Bottles.

To cap bottles or jars with bladder, so as to be perfectly tight, always put the bladder, after wetting, with the inside to the bottle, and no escape can be made. The reason is, all fluids enter the bladder from the vessels of the exterior. It has no other manner of entrance. Fluid must enter only this way, and it has only one to escape.

Stewed Beefsteak.

Fry a tender steak in the usual way, but lightly, with the onions, turnips and carrots; then stew, and it will be better flavored than when in a large mass. It may be done with or without the carrots and turnips; if without them, the gravy must be flavored with anchovy sauce, and thickened with a little flour or arrowroot.

To cure Chilblains.

To effectually and speedily cure chilblains, even of most aggravated character, if not cracked, take sassafras bark, and make a weak immersion. Add a little to a decoction of "tencapitolls," or "asphes rhamedolls," and bathe slightly night and morning, and the cure is positive, never failing.

To remove Glass Stoppers.

To remove a glass stopper, if fixed in any bottle so as not to be removed, pour a few drops of sweet oil around the same; set in the sun, and it will soon work down and release the stopper.

To cure Burns or Scalds.

Cover them at once liberally with wheat flour, sweet and nice, and let them remain. They will heal rapidly, and all heat be drawn out.

To restore the Color of Piano Keys.

By applying fine sand-paper to the yellow keys of the piano, the color may be restored.

To keep Suet.

Suet may be kept for a twelvemonth thus:—Choose the firmest and most free from skin or veins, remove all trace of these, put the suet in a saucepan at some distance from the fire, and let it melt gradually; when melted, pour it into a pan of cold spring water; when hard, wipe it dry, fold it in white paper, put it into a linen bag, and keep it in a dry, cool place; when used, it must be scraped, and will make an excellent crust, either with or without butter.

Lemon Cake.

Beat six eggs, the yolks and whites separately, till in a solid froth; add to the yolks the grated rind of a fine lemon and six ounces of sugar dried and sifted; beat this quarter of an hour; shake in with the left hand six ounces of dried flour; then add the whites of the eggs and the juice of the lemon; when these are well beaten in, put it immediately into tins, and bake it about an hour in a moderately hot oven.

Imperial Gingerbread.

Rub six ounces of butter into three-quarters of a pound of flour; then mix six ounces of treacle with a pint of cream carefully, lest it should turn the cream; mix in a quarter of a pound of double-refined sugar, half an ounce of powdered ginger, and one ounce of caraway seeds; stir the whole well together into a paste, cut it into shapes, and stick cut candied orange or lemon-peel on the top.

To sweeten Pie-Dishes.

When these have long been used for baking, they are apt to impart an unpleasant taste, in consequence of the portion of oily matter they imbibe from the butter or lard. To purify them, place them in a boiler or large kettle of cold water, throw in a few hot ashes or cinders, and boil for an hour.

Dysentery.

Take Indian corn roasted and ground in the manner of coffee, or roast meal browned, and boil in a sufficient quantity of water to produce a strong liquid like coffee, and drink a teacupful, warm, two or three times a day. One day's practice, it is said, will ordinarily effect a cure.

Soft Corns between the Toes.

Wrap the toe on which the corn is, and one next adjoining, in soft linen or cotton, firmly, and let it remain. In a week the cure will be effected.

To grease Boots, Leather or Harness.

First let the leather be well dampened or pliable wet. Then the leather after greasing or oiling will be pliant; otherwise not.

To Cure Ruptured Navels in Infants.

Take a piece of adhesive plaster the size of a silver dollar, and apply over the navel until a permanent cure is effected.

To cure the Poison of Ivy.

Chew freely and swallow limbedly the leaves or green twigs of the white pine.

Sting of a Bee or Wasp.

Apply at once strong potash water, if obtainable; else saleratus water.

Editor's Table.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

PRACTICAL JOKING.

We have time and again denounced, in no unmeasured terms, the practice of practical joking, more especially those kinds which consist of experiments on the nerves of unhappy victims. Many and many a timid person has been ruined for life by the sudden shock of an alarm given by some thoughtless buffoon. There is now in a female lunatic asylum at Hammersmith, says the London Court Circular, a lady of exquisite beauty, who was driven mad by being suddenly startled by her maid. The lady's name is H—, and she resided with her husband, Mr. H—, a wealthy sharebroker, at a splendid mansion in Cavendish Square. One evening, a few months ago, she strolled in the dusk into her husband's library, to procure a book. The lady's maid saw her enter the apartment, and in a mere frolic concealed herself behind the curtains belonging to the window, until her mistress had placed her hand upon the work she came in search of, when she suddenly sprung upon her with a loud shout. The lady was so astounded by the shock, that she was struck almost senseless. Delirium ensued; confirmed madness followed, which has ever since continued without abatement, to a degree dangerous to all who approach her, and it is more than probable that she will never recover her reason.

A CITY OF THE DEAD.—Greenwood Cemetery, Long Island, N. Y., was first opened in June 1840, since which time the mortal remains of 60,650 persons have been buried in the enclosure.

A SHARP BOY.—A shopkeeper in Bond Street, Liverpool, advertised lately for a sharp boy. One applicant grounded his qualifications of sharpness on the fact of his having cut from four places.

HIGH PRICE.—Horseflesh must have been dear in England in the time of Richard III., for he offered his "kingdom for a horse" and there were no takers.

ENCOURAGING.—As you rise in life so does the envy of the world increase—the man who makes a reputation, makes enemies.

THE OLD OAKEN BUCKET.

The origin of Woodworth's popular song is given in a late number of the "Home Journal," on the authority of a private letter to one of the editors, as follows: "It was written in the spring or summer of 1817. The family were living at the time in Duane Street. The poet came home to dinner one very warm day, having walked from his office, somewhere near the foot of Wall Street. Being much heated with the exercise, he poured himself out a glass of water—New York pump water—and drank it at a draught, exclaiming, as he replaced the tumbler on the table: 'That is very refreshing, but how much more refreshing would it be to take a good long draught, this warm day, from the old oaken bucket I left hanging in my father's well, at home!' Hearing this, the poet's wife, who was always a suggestive body, said: 'Selim, why wouldn't that be a pretty subject for a poem?' The poet took the hint, and, under the inspiration of the moment, sat down and poured out from his very soul those beautiful lines which have immortalized the name of Woodworth."

WHAT IS FAME?—Dick Turpin has been made the hero of an English opera, so that his works live after him. He travels along the road of fame as rapidly as he went over that from London to York. It is a caustic practical comment on the nature of fame when Mr. Turpin is as immortal as Mr. Howard, or the Duke of Wellington, or Lord Byron, or Gibbon, or Sir H. Davy, or Scott, or William Pitt, or Lord Nelson, or Luther, or Washington.

AWFUL IF TRUE.—The Philadelphia Ledger, speaking of glove-makers, says "they generally prepare their own skins for making gloves." Glove-makers must be a short-lived race if they have to flay themselves alive to supply customers.

WHAT A FALL!—A man three years ago invested $30,000 in real estate in St. Paul. He lately sold it for just $1800.

A GOOD ONE.—Why is the world like a piano? Because it is full of sharps and flats.

THE POETRY OF COMMERCE.

It is a common error to suppose that all poetry is contained in books; that everything outside of books must necessarily be prosaic. But there is a poetry of life, as well as a poetry of literature; a poetry of action, as well as a poetry of repose. There are living poets who have never written a line, and lives of action that are unpublished epics. In fact we live, move and have our being in an atmosphere of poetry, though we may be unconscious of it all our lives, just as Moliere's comedy hero had been speaking prose all his life without knowing it. Let us take, for example, a commercial life. Most people are apt to consider commerce and poetry to be "wide as the poles asunder;" but a more critical examination will convince them of their error.

Follow the history of commerce, from the most distant epochs. In the infancy of the world, its caravan slowly penetrated the arid deserts of Asia and Africa, and linked together the scattered members of the human family in those vast regions, as they do to-day. Commercial colonies spread the Greek civilization on the shores of the Mediterranean, and drew the bold adventurers of Tyre and Carthage to the north of Europe and the south of Africa. The mediæval cities, protected by their ramparts, defended the elegant arts against the iron yoke of feudal power. For many centuries the Hanseatic cities were the bulwark of liberty and property in the north and west of Europe.

The representative system germinated in the municipal franchises of the communes. At the revival of letters, the "merchant princes" of Florence welcomed to their palaces the banished arts of Greece. In the 15th century, the enterprising spirit of commerce developed that movement which drew Columbus to America, and inspired Vasco de Gama to double the Cape of Good Hope, till that time called the Cape of Storms, and invested with appalling horrors.

Since then, the modern system of international laws is solidly based on the interests and rights of commerce, and the necessity of securing them. Commerce spreads the treasures of the new world among the nations of the West; it gives a new strength to civil and religious liberty; by degrees it extends the colonial system to the extremities of the earth, carrying with it the elements of future independent and civilized republics.

But why should we dwell upon past centuries? What is it that renders the civilization of to-day so powerful and vital? Is it not the universal development of commercial relations, thanks to which all the products of sea and land, of mines, orges and looms, all these which Nature furnishes us in her exhaustless bounty, all those which art and tireless industry create, reach the general market where supply and demand meet? In whatever region the liberal hand of Providence has placed a desirable product within the reach of man, in whatever region human skill is exercised, whether it covers with its perfumed foliage the mountains of China, whether it shines in the auriferous sands of California, whether buried in the deep abysses of Arctic seas, or ripens in the fertile plains of southern lands, beneath the ardent rays of the sun, whether it issues from the workshops of the English or American Manchester, commerce, the ruling power of the globe, attracts everything to itself for the purpose of applying it to the use and benefit of nations.

The white-winged messengers of commerce are also the white-winged messengers of gospel truth and peace. It is more than gold or silver, more than implements wrought by human hands, that commerce sends to distant islands and to strange and distant peoples. The light of religious truth and civilization is scattered broadcast in the desert places by the merchants of the world. Well may the men who embark in this mission, who give to it their fortunes, their intellects, their hearts—well may they be called "merchant princes," and we are fully justified in speaking of the "poetry" of commerce.

WAGES IN FRANCE.—Wages in France, especially in the Southern departments, are said to be higher than at any period since the first revolution. In consequence, considerable difficulty is found in obtaining substitutes for the army, and some discontent is felt in Paris respecting this.

AN ARMY OF SCHOLARS.—The enrolled Sunday-school scholars under the pastoral care of the Methodist Episcopal Church are 800,000, a number equal to the population of the city of New York.

MECHANICAL-CURIOSITIES.

It is only on reviewing the history of mechanism, that we can realize how much mental toil and valuable time and labor men of genius have wasted on toys for grown children. The construction of automata has ever been a favorite occupation of men of a mechanical turn. The earliest automaton on record, is the pigeon made by Archytas of Tarentum, 408 years B. C. Plato tells us that this artificial bird flew a considerable distance and alighted at the point from which he was launched. In 1260 Albertus Magnus, Archbishop of Ratisbon, and a Dominican, made a machine in the human form which saluted visitors in a few articulate words. He was rewarded for his labors by being accused of sorcery after his death. De Kempelen, one of the cabinet ministers of the emperor of Austria, exhibited a similar automaton to the Parisian Academy of Sciences in 1703, which articulated several long phrases. In the same year the Abbé Mical exhibited his talking heads, which were endowed with yet more wonderful educational powers. The learned Kircher and the philosophic Gassendi assure us that John Muller of Konigsberg, surnamed Regiomontanus, made an eagle which circled round the emperor Frederick in a circumference of five hundred paces, and ended by alighting on the spot from which he had started. Muller also constructed, says the same authority, an iron fly which flew about the room and alighted on the hand from which it had taken its start.

According to some chroniclers of the 16th century, when Henry III. made his solemn entry into Cracow in 1573, after his election to the throne of Poland, a mechanical prodigy no less remarkable was seen, and which did not less astonish the crowd. Wherever the king went, he was followed by a white eagle, constructed with such art, that he did not cease to float over Henry's head, beating his wings, during the whole ceremony. Cornelius Drebbel, a Dutch mathematician, made, in imitation of the famous statue of Memnon, a musical machine which wound itself up at sunrise, and played a continuous symphony so long as the rays of the sun fell upon it.

Vaucanson, acting on this idea a little later, produced his flute-player, whose renown, as the journals of the day attest, was not less than that of the duck. The artificial duck, it is well known, plumed itself, quacked, waddled, devoured and even digested food by means of a chemical solution by which the interior of the machine was charged. Every one has heard of Maelzel's automaton chess-player. This, however, has ceased to be a mechanical marvel; it was only an ingenious deception.

Maelzel's automaton trumpeter was first exhibited in Paris in 1808. It was exhibited, in this city, together with his chess-player, mechanical rope-dancers, and speaking puppets, about thirty years ago. The trumpet-playing was very good. Every one has heard of Pascal's arithmetical machine, which performed a number of calculations, but which has been surpassed by the calculating machines of modern times.

The Jesuit Maimburg makes mention of a golden tree in the possession of the emperor Theophilus, laden with little artificial birds, which produced a concert similar to the song of nightingales, and thereby astounded all Constantinople. The Journal des Savans for 1840 speaks of two automata no less wonderful. The first was an artificial horse which could go over smooth ground seven or eight leagues a day; the second was a statue of iron, constructed by a prisoner, which, having issued from the prison, went and presented a petition to the emperor of Morocco in his palace and then returned again. John Walk, in his Latin discourses, speaks of a brazen spider made by a German clock-maker, which moved and imitated life so naturally that it was difficult to believe that it was not an actual spider. But Vaucanson seems to have surpassed all his rivals in this line. Besides his flute-player and the famous duck, he made, for Marmontel's tragedy of "Cleopatra," an asp, which crawled upon the bosom of the actress who played the heroine, and hissed; which induced a wag, who was asked what he thought of this wretched play, to answer: "Faith! I'm of the same opinion as the asp."

AN ERROR OF THE PRESS.—In one of the Scottish editions of Buchan's "Domestic Medicine," there is an astonishing misprint, in which a prescription, containing one hundred ounces of laudanum, instead of that number of drops, is recommended!

A BRUTE'S THOUGHT ABOUT WOMEN.—It matters very little how ugly she may be, a woman never sees a pretty one excepting in the looking-glass.

QUEER.—It is somewhat singular that women are rarely if ever inebriated when it is known they are so fond of their glasses.

---

SCOLDING.—The very worst use a woman can make of her tongue is to scold.

MINDING ONE'S OWN BUSINESS.

Whatever faults John Bull may have, he has many noble qualities and traits; and among the latter—we speak of J. B. socially, not politically—that of minding his own business. Bayard Taylor says when he first visited London, he was compelled by his circumstances to put up at a humble chop-house which was the resort of actors, hackmen, sailors and pawnbrokers' clerks. Yet the people "respected his silence and reserve" and asked him no impertinent questions. He intimates pertinently that he should have fared differently in the United States; and he is right. Here a crying nuisance to which native and foreigner both are subjected is a constant cross-questioning and prying into his affairs. "What may I call your name?" "What may you follow for a living?" "Come here to settle?" etc., etc. Such are some of the rude questions put to a stranger which, if he does not choose to answer, his self-constituted inquisitors set him down either as an ill-bred person or a suspicious character, totally unconscious of the fact that they themselves are guilty of the grossest ill-breeding. No man of any refinement or delicacy can look at one of these eager-eyed, voluble Paul Pry's without a shuddering disgust. It is useless to palliate such a breach of minor social morality by calling it "intelligence," "smartness," a "thirst for information," etc. It is nothing but the insolent curiosity of gossips in breeches, and the sooner such a low habit is abandoned, the better for the good name of our people. Every man's own business is quite enough for him to attend to.

FATE OF AN ENGLISH PAUPER.—A pauper in a Liverpool workhouse, kept for many hours without food, tried to swallow his dinner whole and choked to death in the attempt. His hunger was so sharp he could not wait for the nurse to cut up his food, and was too infirm to do it himself.

WHALEERS AND CRITICS.—The whalers, says Turner, have a superstition that when they are going to harpoon a whale it is their duty to put their best jackets on. A good hint for the critic when he is going to strike a heavy fish.

CONJUGAL DIALOGUE.—"Don't you think, wife, that tobacco-smoke would kill the mosquitoes in our room?" "It might; but it would kill me first."

A HARD TASK.—It is not half so difficult to tempt a man into crime as to coax him out of it.

BUYING FLOUR.

It is about as difficult a job to buy good flour as to buy a good horse. Let us tell our housekeepers how to go to work with it. First, look at color; if it is white, with a slightly yellowish or straw colored tint, buy it. If it is very white, with a bluish cast, or with black specks in it, refuse it. Second, examine the adhesiveness; wet and knead a little of it between your fingers; if it works soft and is sticky, it is poor. Flour from spring wheat is likely to be sticky. Third, throw a lump of dry flour against a dry, smooth, perpendicular surface; if it falls like powder, it is bad. Fourth, squeeze some of the flour in your hand; if it retains the shape given by the pressure, that too is a good sign. Flour that will stand all these tests is safe to buy. These modes are given by old flour dealers, and we make no apology for printing them, as they pertain to a matter that concerns everybody, namely, the quality of the staff of life.

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.—In this long established and real specific, the dyspeptic has a ready relief from all the evils incident upon indigestion. This remarkable preparation is also a sure cure for liver complaint, general debility, and all the various diseases which arise from weakness of the stomach and digestive organs. Especially in the spring of the year the Bitters form a pleasant and never-failing tonic, and as there is no spirituous compound in their preparation, there is no reaction to their bracing and strengthening effect. We have known of remarkable cures effected by the Bitters in cases of sick-headache, jaundice, flatulency and the like. They may be found everywhere.

AN OLD SAW.—A person asked a Grecian philosopher what he thought was the proper time to dine. "Sir," said the ancient, "the proper time of dinner with the opulent is when they choose; with the poor man, when he can."

A GRACEFUL JOKE.—At a public dinner three gentlemen having stood up at the same moment to say grace, Sidney Smith, who was present, called them "the Three Graces."

WITS IN COMPANY.—Men of genius are often dull and inert in society, as the blazing meteor when it descends to earth is only a stone.

INFANT MORTALITY.—Out of every five infants born in London two die before they are five years old.

THE BATTLE OF LIFE.

There is nothing surer than that there is no absolute peace in this sublunary life of ours. There are armistices and truces, halts on the march, periods of repose at bivouacs, moments of rest and jollity, but these are only episodes in the history of a stern campaign. On this side of the grave, we can only sleep on our arms. At any moment, the bugle-call and drum-beat may summon us to action: The sons of men are the grand army perpetually marching on, perpetually fighting. In their pathway, obstacles rise at almost every step; there are batteries to be taken, heights to be stormed, victories to be achieved. But there is a stern joy in this incessant strife; without it, our energies would sink, our strength waste away, our very virtues become merely negative qualities.

It requires years to realize this truth. Poets, and all the young are poets at heart, figure in a very different scene. To them life is an Arcadia, with eternal summer shining on its flowery meads and fragrant groves, peopled with the gentlest beings, filled to repletion with paradisaical lures and joys. No tempests ruffle the calm waters of the fancied Eden; no storms silence the music of its happy voices. Vainly do the pioneers on the march send back chilling reports of the desolate character of the tract they have travelled; only personal experience can teach a man the delusion of his dreams.

But how criminal it is in those who have charge of the young recruits who are destined to take part in this great strife, to conceal the dangers and duties which lie before them; to lull them into security and inaction; to lap them in luxurious ease, and sap the foundation of their moral strength. Even if we cannot convince the young that there is a hard fight before them, we can prepare them for the combat. We can teach them energy, self-denial, self-control and self-development. We can strengthen their minds and indurate their muscles; we can train them to take a pleasure in struggling with and overcoming obstacles. If the fortune of war favors them, then they are all the better prepared to enjoy it; if, on the contrary, they form no exception to the common rule, they are able to fight their way gallantly through the world. They ought always to be in "condition."

The English system of education for boys is a sensible one. At a suitable age, mama's petted darling, whom the winds of heaven are not permitted to visit too roughly, is sent from home and thrown into the vortex of a great school, no bad image of the world itself. It is, in fact, a world in miniature, made up by the youthful representatives of various classes, rich and poor, noble, gentle and common. And here begins the strife which pre-figures the contest in the great theatre of the world; a sham-fight, as it were, preceding the great battle. Here a boy must stand up for himself, or go to the wall. He learns, to be self-reliant, and to help himself. He makes friends and enemies just in proportion to his qualities. All boys are born democrats, and in the play-grounds the son of a peer is no more than the equal of the son of a commoner. If he puts on the airs of a domineering bully, his self-conceit is thrashed out of him. In this little world, genius, courage, manliness and honor are sure to meet with ultimate recognition; sloth, cowardice, effeminacy and baseness, to be branded as they deserve. Right, to be sure, does not triumph over might without hard fighting; and is it not so in the great world? The fight between Tom Brown and the "Slogger," so graphically described in "Tom Brown at Rugby," is but typical of the great battles that history records—of such a strife, for instance, as that between Italy and Austria. The literary emulation of the schools is a preparation for the emulation developed in the grand careers of the profession, of politics and diplomacy. There are evils, and great ones, in the system; but we believe the good counterbalances the evil. The character of the English people, liberally construed, justifies their general plan of education.

In France, a different system of education and preparation for life prevails. There boys are subjected to a constant surveillance, night and day, in school and out of school. Teachers dog their footsteps and accompany them in every act of duty or relaxation. They are never left to themselves, and consequently acquire no habits of self-control and self-reliance. Hence, when emancipated from school, they require, as citizens, a very strong government, and a government which shall take a paternal care of them; which shall mark out and define the limits of their actions, which shall dog, by its spies, their footsteps by night and day. In those things with which government does not interfere, as in the pursuit of their private pleasures, Frenchmen exhibit a lamentable lack of self-control. We are confident that we are correct in attributing many of the defects of French character, as contrasted with the good qualities of their neighbors across the channel, to the peculiarities of their system of education. And let us remark, in this connection, that we recognize many excellent qualities in the French, and many unamiable qualities in the English, but so far as aptitude for the battle of life is concerned, the bold Britons must, take the lead. Female education, in France, is established on an equally false basis. Until their marriage, French women are subjected to a rigid police discipline. They are brought up in ignorance of what life really is, and ignorance is the most vulnerable armor in the world. Many of the most inestimable privileges of youth are denied them, and every one knows into what wild license too many French women rush, when the pressure of their educational ligatures is removed.

In this country, the young are left more to themselves; and consequently young men emerge into the arena of life far better fitted to cope with its requirements and vicissitudes. They have fought with buttoned foils and with gloves; when they handle the cold steel, and clench the naked hand, they know what to do. The great evil of this system is the precocious development of individuals—the growth of "old heads on young shoulders." But this is an incidental and partial evil. Look at the great mass of the American people, with their strength, self-reliance, independence and energy, and say whether they have a superior on the face of the globe. Compare them with any people you may select—compare their achievements with those of any other nation, and, though you may theorize, you will find it impossible to substitute any living example of higher strife. In the great Battle of Life, there are no more energetic combatants.

BAPTISM OF A DYING GIRL.

The Albany Express says: "On Sunday morning several young folks were baptized at Rev. Dr. Magoon's church. The first person who was baptized was a young girl, perhaps sixteen years old, in the last stages of consumption. She was literally arrayed in her grave clothes, it being understood that the white robe in which she was baptized was to be worn by her when she was placed in her coffin. She obtained her mother's permission to be baptized and then acquainted her pastor with her desire. She was brought to the pool in the arms of her uncle, attended by her mother, and lifted in the arms of the pastor, who gently immersed her head, after repeating the usual words. The scene was very affecting, causing some of the spectators to sob with emotion. She was so far gone that it was feared she might expire during the ceremony, yet after it was performed she expressed a wish to be brought to the church in the afternoon, to partake of the Lord's Supper, which was granted. After the supper, when in another room, she sang the doxology, 'Praise God,' and when in her carriage Dr. Magoon asked her how she felt, she whispered, 'I have fought a good fight.'"

"SEEING WARREN."—A very good story touching this capital comedian is to be credited to the Saturday Evening Gazette: "Mr. Veri-green came down from the country, and went to see Warren at his benefit, Warren sustaining five characters. 'How did you like the performance?' I asked. 'Purty well,' said he; 'but that Warren's nonsense kind o' bothered me, so't I couldn't hardly make out the story. I should think he'd see that folks laugh at him.'"

SKETCHES OF LYNN, MASSACHUSETTS.

On this and some of the succeeding pages of our Magazine, we have placed a series of sketches illustrative of localities in Lynn, one of the most pleasant and flourishing cities in the neighborhood of Boston, drawn on the spot by Mr. Kilburn, noted for the fidelity of his delineations. Mr. Alonzo Lewis, the "Lynn Bard," in his "History of Lynn," one of the best town histories ever written, says:

"Lynn is one of the earliest towns planted in Massachusetts. Its settlement was begun in 1629. Among the authorities for assigning the settlement to this year, is the Rev. Samuel Danforth's almanac for the year 1647. He gives a list of the first towns settled in this State, to which he prefixes these words: 'The time when these townes following began.' By several ancient manuscripts it appears that the settlement must have commenced as early as the 1st of June.

"1629. The first white men known to have been inhabitants of Lynn were Edmund Ingalls and his brother, Francis Ingalls. A record preserved in the family of the former, says, 'Mr. Edmund Ingalls came from Lincolnshire, in England, to Lynn, in 1629.' The first settlers numbered five men with their family, probably comprising about twenty persons. 'They did not settle at Sagamore Hill,' says Lewis, 'because the Indians were there; nor on the common, because that was a forest; but coming from Salem, they selected a 'faire playne,' somewhat less than a mile in extent, where they built their rude cottages, and 'had peaceable possession.' John Wood appears to have been the principal person, and from him the village has ever since been called 'Wood End.' There the soil of Lynn was first stirred by the white man—there, surrounded by Indians, they laid the foundation of a town."

In 1630 fifty persons, with their families, settled in Lynn, each occupying from 10 to 200 acres, and some of them taking up even larger tracts of land. "They were principally farmers," says Lewis, "and possessed a large stock of horned cattle, sheep and goats. For several years, before the land was divided, and the fields fenced, the cattle were fed in one drove, and guarded by a man who, from his employment, was called a hayward. The sheep, goats and swine were kept on Nahant, where they were tended by a shepherd. Nahant seems to have been sold several times to different individuals by 'Black William (an Indian)' who also gave it to the plantation for a sheep pasture. A fence of rails, put near together, was made across the beach near Nahant, to keep out the wolves, as these animals do not climb. When the people were about building this fence, Captain Turner said, 'Let us make haste, lest the country should take it from us.' The people of

Lynn for some years seem to have lived in the most perfect democracy. They had town meetings every three months for the regulation of their public affairs. They cut their wood in common, and drew lots for the grass in the meadows and marshes. These proved very serviceable to the farmers by furnishing them with sustenance for the cattle; which was probably the reason why there were more farmers at Lynn than in any other of the early settlements. Mr. Johnson says, 'the chiefest corn they planted, before they had plowes, was Indian grain—and let no man make a jest at pumpkins, for with this food the Lord was pleased to feed his people to their good content, till Corne and Cattell were increased.' Their corn, at the first, was pounded, after the manner of the Indians, with a pestle of wood or stone, in a mortar made either of stone, or a log, hollowed out at one end. They also cultivated large fields of barley and wheat. Much of the former was made into malt for beer. They raised considerable quantities of flax, which was rotted in one of the ponds, thence called the Flax

Pond. Their first houses were rude structures, covered with thatch, or small bundles of sedge or straw, laid one over another. A common form of the early cottage, was eighteen feet square, and seven feet front, with the roof steep enough to form a sleeping chamber. The better houses were built with two stories in front, and sloped down to one in the rear; the upper story projecting about a foot, with very sharp gables. The frames were of heavy oak timber, showing the beams inside. Burnt clamshells were used for lime, and the walls were whitewashed. The fire places were made of rough stones, and the chimneys of boards, or short sticks, crossing each other, and plastered inside with clay. The windows were small, opening outward on hinges. They consisted of very small diamond panes, set in sashes of lead. The fire-places were large enough to admit a four-foot log, and the children might sit in the corners and look up at the stars. People commonly burned about twenty cords of wood in a year, and the ministers were allowed thirty cords. On whichever side of the road the houses were placed, they uniformly faced the south, that the sun at noon might 'shine square.' Thus each house formed a domestic sundial, by which the good matron, in the absence of the clock, could tell, in fair weather, when to call her husband and sons from the field; for the industrious people of Lynn, then as well as now, always dined exactly at twelve. It was the custom of the first settlers to wear long beards, and Governor Winthrop says, 'Some had their overgrown beards so frozen together, that they could not get their strong-water bottels into their mouths.' 'In very hot weather,' says Wood, 'servants were privileged to rest from their labors, from ten of the clock till two.' The common address of men and women was Goodman and Goodwife; none but those who sustained some office of dignity, or were descended from some respectable family, were complimented with the title of Master."

What a contrast this picture of the early settlement presents to the Lynn of the present day, the cliffs the eagle built their nests; the wild cat and the bear rested in their branches, and the fox and the wolf prowled beneath. The squirrel made his home undisturbed in the nut-tree; the wood pigeon murmured his sweet notes in the glen; and the beaver constructed his dam across the wild brook. The ponds and streams were filled with fish; and the harbor was covered with sea-fowl, which laid their eggs on the cliffs and on the sands of the beach. The Indian name of the town was Saugus, and by that name it was known for eight years. The root of this word signifies great or extended, and it was probably applied to the Long Beach. Wood, in his early map of New England, places the word 'Saugus' on Sagamore Hill. The river on the west was called by the Indians 'Abousett,' the word Saugus being applied to it by white men."

Bears, wolves and Indians were the terror of the more timid among the settlers. "At this 1630-1631 time," says Mr. Lewis, "there was with its diversified pursuits, its dense population, its universal comfort and occasional elegance and luxury, with all the appliances that wealth, science, and the arts have supplied. We realize by such a contrast the immense progress that the arts of civilization have made in two hundred and thirty years; yet possibly, there are not a few who will regret the simplicity of manners which characterized the old New England settlements. One of the earliest acts of the settlers was the organization of a military company. This company possessed two iron "sakars or great guns." Lewis says, "the first settlers found the town, including Nahant, chiefly covered by forests of aged trees, which had never been disturbed but by the storms of centuries. On the tops of the ancient oaks which grew upon no bridge across Saugus River, and people who travelled to Boston were compelled to pass through the woods in the northern part of the town, and ford the stream near the iron works, three miles north from the railroad bridge. The following extract from a letter written by Mr. John Endicott of Salem, to Governor Winthrop, on the twelfth of April, illustrates the custom. Mr. Endicott had just been married. He says: "Right Worshipful, I did hope to have been with you in person at the Court, and to that end I put to sea yesterday, and was driven back again, the wind being stiff against us; and there being no canoe or boat at Saugus, I must have been constrained to go to Mistic, and thence about to Charlestown, which, at this time, I durst not be so bold, my body being at present in an ill condition to take cold, and therefore I pray you to pardon me."

The first church at Lynn was organized June 8, 1632. We proceed to gather a few more interesting items from Mr. Lewis's History. At a court held in 1633, 'Mr. Thomas Dexter was ordered to be set in the bilbowes, disfranchised and fined X£ for speaking reproachful and seditious words against the government here established.' The bilbowes were a kind of stocks like those in which the hands and feet of poor Hudi-bras were confined.

— 'The knight
And brave squire from their steeds alight,
At the outer wall, near which there stands
A Bastile, made to imprison hands,
By strange enchantment made to fetter
The lesser parts and free the greater.'

One of these elegant and commodious appendages of the law was placed near the meeting house; there it stood, the terror and punishment of all such evil doers as spoke against government, chewed tobacco, or went to sleep in a sermon two hours long. However censurable Mr. Dexter may have been, his punishment was certainly disproportioned to his fault. To be deprived of the privilege of a freeman, to be exposed to the ignominy of the stocks, and to be amerced in a fine of more than forty dollars, show that magistrates were greatly incensed by his remarks. If every man were set in the bilbowes, who speaks against government in these days, there would scarcely be trees enough in Lynn woods to make stocks of. The magistrates of those days had not acquired the lessons which their successors have long since learned, that censure is the tax which public men must pay for their adventitious greatness. "In the year 1637 the name of the town was changed from Saugus to Lynn. The record of the General Court, on the fifteenth of November, consist of only four words, 'Saugust is called Lin.'"

Here is a description of ancient Lynn from "The Wonder-Working Providence," a work written by Edward Johnson of Woburn, and published in 1651:

"Her situation is neere to a River, whose strong freshet at breaking up of Winter filleth all her Bankes, and with a furious Torrent ventes itself into the sea. This Towne is furnished with Mineralls of divers kinds, especially Iron and Lead, the forme of it is almost square, onely it takes two large a run into the Landward (as most townes do). It is filled with about one Hundred Houses for dwelling. There is also an Iron Mill for constant use, but as for Lead, they have tried it but little yet. Their meeting-house being on a Levell Land undefended from the cold Northwest wind, and therefore made with steps descending into the earth, the people mostly inclining to Husbandry, have built many Farms Remote. Their Cattell exceedingly multiplied. Goates which were in great esteeme at their first comming, are now quite banished, and now Horse, kine and sheep are most in request with them."

The longevity of the early settlers of Lynn is noticed by Mr. Lewis, and accounted for. "Boniface Burton died in 1669, at the great age of 113 years; an age to which no person in Lynn since his time has attained. Joseph Rednap lived till he was 110 years of age, in the full possession of his faculties. In the year 1635, when he was in his 80th year, we find a vote of the town granting him lands at Nahant, for the purpose of pursuing the trade of fishing; and he seems as enterprising at that age, as if he were just beginning active life. Henry Styche was an efficient workman at the iron foundry in the year 1653, and was then 103 years of age. How many years longer he lived history has not informed us. Christopher Hussey was pursuing his active and useful life in 1685, when he was shipwrecked on the coast of Florida, at the age of 87 years. This great longevity and the general good health of the early settlers may probably be referred to the regularity of their habits and the simplicity of their diet. They seldom ate meat, and they generally retired to rest soon after sunset. A pitch pine torch in the chimney corner served to illuminate the common room until the family prayer was said, and then the boys and girls retired to their respective chambers, to undress in the dark. Nor did they steam themselves to death over hot iron. Cooking stoves were unknown, and no fire was put into a meeting-house, except the Quaker, till 1820." The reader who is curious to learn more of the history of Lynn, is referred to Mr. Alonzo Lewis's work, which is fairly entitled to be called a model town history.

The first of our engravings represents High Rock, with the famous Moll Pitcher's house in the foreground. Concerning the renowned fortune-teller of Lynn many romantic stories have been told, and she has figured in song, story and drama. Dr. Jones, of this city, made her the subject of a very effective piece, still played sometimes with great success, the incidents of which he afterwards worked up in the form of a novellette. The name of Moll Pitcher is almost as familiar as that of Norma of the Fifful Head, the fanciful prophetess of Scott's "Pirate." Had our Lynn sorceress flourished a little earlier, it is certain that her innocent impostures of fortune-telling by palmistry, the cards or coffee-grounds, would have consigned her to the tender mercies of the pious inquisitors of Cotton Mather's time, and probably that worthy divine would have assisted at an auto da fé of which Moll would have been the central figure. As it was, we believe she entirely escaped persecution. In the background is seen High Rock, a remarkable eminence on which the Hutchinsons (singers) built a cottage, and erected a pagoda, seen in the view. A splendid view of Lynn, the bay, the ocean, Boston and the neighboring towns is obtained from the summit of High Rock.

Our second engraving represents the Central Congregational Church on Silsbee Street. It is a fine specimen of Gothic architecture, with a spire of 160 feet. In the foreground is the crossing of Silsbee Street over the Eastern Railroad. Our next view represents the Exchange Building, on Market Street. It is of brick, and makes no pretensions to architectural elegance, but it is spacious, and well adapted to its present purpose. The lower part is occupied by stores of various kinds, and there is a noble hall in the upper part. The fourth view delineates the South Common, so called. It is beautifully shaded by trees, and encloses a fine sheet of water. The church seen in the centre of the picture is the First Congregational, corner of South Common and Vine Streets. The Rev. Parsons Cooke is the pastor. The other church is the Second Universalist. The fifth engraving of the series delineates the High School, a substantial and commodious structure erected at a cost of about $7000, under the superintendence of a building committee appointed by the town, March 16, 1850. It was dedicated January 8, 1851. An appropriate address was delivered by Rev. B. Sears, secretary of the Board of Education, and addresses were also made by Messrs. Hood, Shackford, and Jacob Batchelder, Jr. The house is warmed and ventilated in the best manner. It is thoroughly built; and though without any superfluous ornament, is in good taste, and provided with ample accommodations. The main school room is about forty-six feet square and sixteen feet in height. The two recitation rooms are each twenty-two by twenty-five feet. These are furnished with settees, and the school-room with Wales's patent desks and chairs. The whole cost of building, grading, fencing, seats, apparatus, etc., was about $9500. The appropriation by a vote of the town for this object was $12,000. It is intended that there shall be, at this school, a three years' course of study. In order to enter, pupils are required to pass a good examination in the elementary studies pursued at the grammar schools. And those pupils who complete the prescribed three years' course of study, shall be entitled to receive a diploma, signed by the teachers and also the school committee. At the present time, there are seats provided for one hundred and twenty scholars. This school has, since its opening, maintained the highest reputation, and it is, undoubtedly, an institution of which the city may boast, as one of the best in the State. The school is, we believe, under the instruction of one principal and two assistants. The pupils receive the best instruction, without money and without price. They are removed from the annoying presence of smaller students; and, in the commodious rooms provided for them, they can prepare themselves, by an extended course of mathematical, philosophical and classical studies, for the responsibilities of active life.

We add another engraving, representing the Lynn Station on the Eastern Railroad, which intersects the city. It is a fine commodious brick building, and contains, besides the usual railroad offices, Kellogg's printing-office and a book-binding. Our last view is a picture of Lynn Beach, one of the finest beaches in this country, with the rare advantage of the water on both sides. This connects the city with Nahant. An excellent road has been built at a great expense, so that the driving is good at all tides. On pleasant summer evenings, with carriages and equestrians, it presents a most animated spectacle. There is much travel through Lynn, by way of old Eastern Road and the Salem turnpike, while about twenty trains pass daily on the Eastern Railroad, which intersects the city. The north-western part of Lynn is a mountainous forest, the most thickly settled part being a plain between the hills and the sea. From the Lynn Directory, a reliable compendium, we obtain the following particulars: For the first century after the settlement of the towns in New England, there seems to have been no census taken, or, if the inhabitants were numbered, no record has been preserved. In 1638, when Boston was "a village containing 20 or 30 houses," it is certain that Lynn had more than 100 families. Being a farming town, including a territory six times larger than Boston, it naturally invited settlers; and after the opening of the iron works, the number was greatly increased. But as many families afterwards moved away to form new settlements, the number of inhabitants at no time exceeded 2000. The first recorded census was taken in 1765, when the number was 2198. The following table exhibits the census as taken at eight periods: In 1765 it was 2198; 1790, 2291; 1800, 2837; 1810, 4087; 1820, 4515; 1830, 6138; 1840, 9367; 1850, 13,613. It will be seen that for twenty-five years, the increase was only 93. From 1790 to 1800, the increase was 546, or a fraction less than 25 per cent. From 1800 to 1810, after it had become decidedly a shoemaking town, the increase was 1250 or 44 per cent. Between the years 1810 and 1820, after Saugus, with its 748 inhabitants, had been separated from it, the increase was found to be 1176, or about 28 per cent. From 1820 to 1830, the increase was 1623, or 36 per cent. In 1830, the map and history of Lynn were printed, and being widely circulated and extensively noticed in public papers, perhaps they had some influence in giving a new impulse to the place, by calling attention to it; and the increase for the next ten years was 3229, or 51 per cent. From 1840 to 1850, the increase was not quite so rapid, being 4036, or 43 per cent. We have heard the present population estimated at 18,000.

The inhabitants of Lynn for the first century were mostly farmers, but gradually they gave their attention to the manufacture of women's shoes, and that is now the principal business. The stock for the shoes is cut in the larger buildings, called manufactories, by men termed clickers. The upper parts are then tied in packages and given to females, who reside at their own homes, to be bound. They are then returned to the manufactories, where they are put together in bundles with the soles, and distributed to the workmen, who make the shoes in small—quite too small—shops, usually at or near their own homes. The workmen are called cordwainers, or more properly cordovaniers; the word being derived from the Cordovan leather, originally manufactured at Cordova in Spain, from goat skins brought from Morocco in Africa. When the shoes are finished, they are packed at the manufactories, in wooden boxes, usually containing about sixty pairs, and sent to all places where there is a demand for them. A few of the nicer sort of shoes and buskins are packed in paper boxes of a smaller size. This branch of business was pursued before the Revolution. The sales were then chiefly confined to New England, but since that period the business has been greatly extended, and shoes are now exported in large quantities to almost every part of the United States. It is estimated that at the present time there are about 150 manufactories in the city, giving employment to 10,000 persons, more than half of whom are females; and that 4,500,000 pairs of ladies and misses' shoes are annually made, amounting in value to about $3,500,000. From 400,000 to 500,000 pairs are also purchased from neighboring towns. Besides the above, there are manufactories of leather, morocco, cotton, prints, chocolate, glue, machinery, tinware, etc. Lynn has some vessels engaged in the whale fishery. In 1853, two ships arrived here, bringing 1656 barrels of sperm oil, 2120 barrels of whale oil, and 28,000 pounds of whalebone. The cod and mackerel fisheries are also carried on, and there is a considerable amount of coasting trade. There are two banks in Lynn, with a capital of $250,000, a Savings Bank and two insurance offices.

Lynn became a city in 1850. It is nine miles from Boston, and occupies a pleasant situation. Its boundaries embrace a delightful variety of scenery, field, forest, pasture, cultivated land, rock, beach and bay, while the thickly settled portions abound in beautiful buildings, and exhibit every evidence of thrift and prosperity. Altogether, it is a fair specimen of many of the New England inland cities, and its nearness to Boston makes it a desirable residence for the business man.

MARRIAGES AMONG THE DRUSES.

The Druses are a powerful tribe inhabiting a portion of the mountainous range of Lebanon, or Libanus, in Syria. They are neither Mahomedans nor Christians, but have a peculiar creed of their own, made up from some of the tenets and doctrines of the two faiths.

Their women are generally very beautiful, being fairer than the other inhabitants of Lebanon, and they are distinguished by the most lovely dark blue eyes, long, raven tresses, and teeth of pearly whiteness. The men generally marry at from sixteen to eighteen years of age; they take but one wife, and always choose partners from their own tribe. The bride is generally from thirteen to fourteen years old. Three days before the wedding, the bridegroom, accompanied by his male friends, goes to the house of his intended, and demands her in a formal manner from the hands of her father, who formally gives his consent. Then they agree upon the amount of dowry which the husband shall settle on his wife. The bride is led forth a moment, closely veiled, accompanied by her mother, who vouches for the purity and honor of her daughter. The bride then presents her husband with the khanjar, or dagger, which serves at the same time to show the protection she expects to receive from him, or as an instrument of punishment, should the declaration of her mother be false, or should she subsequently break her marriage vows.

The bride, attended by the women, spends the day gaily in the bath; while the bridegroom and his friends amuse themselves with horsemanship, or in drinking coffee and smoking chibouk at the house of the bride's father. This continues for two days; on the third the bride is conducted, with considerable ceremony, to the house of the bridegroom, closely covered with a red gold-spangled veil, which, in the nuptial chamber, he removes, and presents her with a tantoor. This he places upon her head, where it remains both night and day, while life remains.

The Druse possesses absolute power to divorce his wife, first paying the stipulated dowry.

Nevertheless divorces are exceedingly rare, and they seldom take place at all, except for very serious causes. If a woman is guilty of conjugal infidelity—which is extremely uncommon—she always pays the penalty with her life. The husband sends his wife back to her father's house, and with her the khanjar which he had received on his marriage, but without the sheath. This notifies her disgrace does not attach itself to her husband, but to the relatives of the wife, and can only be washed out with her blood. The father sits in solemn judgment over the wife, at her husband's house, and if the evidence is sufficient, her doom is pronounced. A father's love is of no avail, a mother's shrieks cannot stay the hand that strikes, nor a sister's tears mitigate the punishment. The executioner, generally the eldest brother, severs her head from her body, and the tantoor, with a lock of her hair steeped in blood, sent to her husband, testifies that the deed has been accomplished.—Notes and Queries.

A DOG EXPRESS.

Daniel Henshaw, Esq., recently read a very interesting paper on "Statistics and Anecdotes of Travels" before the New England Historic and Genealogical Society, which has since been printed in the Gazette. He states that before the establishment of stage lines, people were sometimes greatly perplexed for means of transmitting messages and letters of importance. On one such occasion, the following very ingenious and extraordinary mode was adopted with entire success: A family living over fifty miles from Boston, who had removed from there a few years before, taking with them their favorite dog, Rover, had several times made their annual visit there, always accompanied by the same faithful animal. The necessity of sending a letter to Boston had now become urgent in the extreme, and indispensably necessary; yet there seemed no possible way of transmitting it but by procuring some one to go on express, which at that time was next to impossible. While they were deeply perplexed in contriving ways and means, some one said, perhaps more in jest than in earnest "send Rover." Now Rover had proved himself on many occasions intelligent and faithful beyond others of his race, and the idea took at once. It was decided at any rate to try the experiment of sending Rover as a bearer of despatches, provided he could be induced to undertake so arduous and hazardous a mission.

The letter was accordingly prepared, and while they were fastening it around his neck, the old dog would roll up his eyes in deep thought, as if pondering on the magnitude and responsibility of his charge, while he seemed to say—"I understand the business perfectly, but dislike the undertaking, and must beg to be excused." And when the crisis came, he did beg and plead most piteously. But, after pointing to the east, the command was peremptory—"go!" and away he went in good earnest, not on the old circuitous travelled road, but on a bee line, across lots, determined to make short work of it, and probably not stopping for rest or refreshment till he reached his place of destination, which was a little before daylight the next morning. There were two houses in Boston, not far apart, where the old dog felt equally at home. He gave notice at the first by howling and scratching at the door; but the family, not understanding the purport of so unseasonable a call, refused to respond, and he soon repaired to the other, where the surprise and indeed an old friend, the representative of long absent friends, at a distance, and bringing glad tidings from afar. The fame of this achievement soon spread among the friends and through the astonishment at seeing the old dog with his message was indescribable. He was welcomed and greeted with as much joy and gladness as if he had been an old, intimate friend, just returned from a long and dangerous sea voyage. He was neighborhood, and Rover became the lion of the day. This is believed to be the only instance where a quadruped has ever acted as bearer of despatches, or post for carrying letters alone and so great a distance.

NOTED AMERICAN SCENES.

On page 16 will be found an accurate delineation of the great reservoir, St. Louis, Missouri, one of the sights a stranger is usually taken to see in that flourishing and wealthy city. It is in the upper part of the city, a solid and costly structure. St. Louis is supplied from the Mississippi River, the water being pumped up by steam and forced into the reservoir shown in our engraving, whence it is distributed to all parts of the city. It is taken out from a point above all the sewers, and where the current is the swiftest, so that the supply is the purest that can be obtained. The water-works are city property and the expense of them is defrayed by the water-tax, as in most other cities. The well-water of St. Louis is peculiarly clear and limpid in appearance, and a stranger would be apt to contrast it favorably with the dark, muddy river water, but it is impregnated with limestone, and on that account unwholesome, while the Mississippi is said to be very healthy.

The next picture in this set, on page 17, is a very striking view of the bridge over the Monongahela at Pittsburgh, and not only embraces a correct delineation of this structure, but gives a good general idea of the city. The bridge connects Birmingham with Pittsburgh. It is 1500 feet long, is a noble structure, and highly creditable to the city. One of the famous river steamboats is accurately delineated in the foreground. The spectator will not fail to notice the long columns of smoke which are so characteristic of this busy place. The total consumption of coal for the city in 1854, was 22,305,000 bushels—enough to account for a cloudy canopy.

The engraving on page 19 is a view of the famous Western Penitentiary of the State of Pennsylvania, a strong castellated building, situated in Alleghany City, which communicates with Pittsburgh by means of three substantial bridges, built on piers. It is an immense structure, in the Roman style of architecture, and is located on the western border of the city. It was completed in 1827, at a cost of $183,000. Pittsburgh, as our readers are aware, is situated at the confluence of the Alleghany and Monongahela Rivers, which here unite to form the Ohio, 357 miles west of Philadelphia. The city is principally built of brick, and the only drawback to a residence here arises from the fumes of the bituminous coal, of which vast quantities are consumed. The principal benevolent institutions of the city are the Mercy Hospital, the Western Pennsylvania Hospital, the United States Marine Hospital, the House of Refuge, and the poor-houses of Alleghany and Pittsburgh. Among the literary and educational institutions may be mentioned the theological seminary of the Associate Reformed Church, in Pittsburgh, and the Western Theological Seminary in Alleghany City. The Mercantile Library, and other literary associations of Pittsburgh, are quite noted. There are upwards of fifty schools in the city, with 12,000 pupils. There are some twenty-five newspaper and periodical publishing offices in Pittsburgh, and the city supports, we believe, twelve dailies. There are two or three newspapers in Alleghany City. A Chamber of Commerce was established in Pittsburgh in 1850. It is dangerous, however, to attempt the statistics of a place that grows so rapidly, and has such elements of prosperity within it. There is no limit to the manufacturing capability of Pittsburgh. Wood, coal and ores abound in the vicinity, and may be obtained with little expenditure of labor and capital. In this respect, there is no place in the world so favored. According to the latest published statistical account to which we have access, the manufactures of the city and vicinity employ 400 steam engines. One of the largest establishments is the Fort Pitt works, which, in 1853, consumed 3225 tons of pig and wrought iron, producing, among other things, 10 blast cylinders, 10 first class steam engines, and 150 freight cars. Several iron steamers have been built at these works; and from 1842 to 1847 there were cast, bored and mounted here 633 cannon, weighing, in all, 1787 tons, and 22,189 shot and shell. The total amount of pig iron, blooms and scraps, consumed in Pittsburgh, in 1853, was estimated as follows: For steam engine foundries, 9250 tons; other foundries, 19,275 tons; and rolling mills, 93,850 tons; total, 127,375 tons. The people of Pittsburgh are largely interested in the copper mines of Lake Superior. One copper-smelting establishment, consuming 1000 tons of Lake Superior ore annually, is in operation here. There are forty salt wells in the vicinity of Pittsburgh, producing from 6000 to 80,000 bushels of salt annually. We have not space to enumerate the various manufactures, such as glass, cotton, cloth, chairs, oil cloths, surveying instruments, Venetian blinds, etc., carried on here. According to the census of 1850, there were 819 manufacturing establishments in Pittsburgh, and 120 in Alleghany City, employing 10,253 hands, and producing goods to the value of $11,883,427. In 1854, the manufactures amounted to the sum of $20,990,338. The commerce of the port is very extensive. By means of navigable waters, railways and canals, it stretches its arms to the east, west, north and south. When the various railways now in progress are completed, Pittsburgh will be the terminus of nine distinct and independent routes, of which five will be trunk lines. In steam tonnage it is the third city in the Union, being surpassed only by New York and New Orleans. January 1st, 1854, the steam tonnage of the port was put down at 75,505 tons. Pittsburgh stands upon a triangular plain, enclosed by the Alleghany and Monongahela Rivers and by several hills. In its outline and features it has been thought to resemble the city of New York. Along the Monongahela River, the streets were laid out at right angles to each other. The surrounding hills are filled with iron, coal and limestone, the working of which constitutes the chief employment of the inhabitants. These hills are generally graceful in form and present a variety of pleasing combinations. In fact, all the environs of Pittsburgh are remarkable for their beauty and fertility. The limits of our article have only permitted us to take a passing glance at the immense business of this thriving city. Volumes might be occupied with its statistics and details. No traveller, American or foreign, should fail to visit it, and personally examine it. It affords a most interesting field of study, and unites a great variety of attractions, in the city proper, its suburbs, the adjoining landscape, the mines, etc.

HORACE VERNET, THE ARTIST.

The portrait we have inserted on page 20, is a correct likeness of the celebrated Horace Vernet, one of the most famous of the modern French school of painters. He is depicted in his working costume. His long face, lengthened by his pointed beard and prominent features, together with the gravity of his expression, reminds us of the "Knight of the Rueful Countenance." But there is nothing Quixotic in the character of Horace. He is entirely wanting in that lofty religious character which fills with pureness and beauty the works of the early masters; yet he is rich in qualities deeply attractive and interesting to the people, especially the French people, of our own day. He displays an astonishing capacity and rapidity of execution, an almost unparalleled accuracy of memory, a rare life and motion on the canvass, a vigorous comprehension of the military tactics of the time, a wonderful aptitude at rendering the camp and field potent subjects for the pencil, notwithstanding the regularity of movement, and the unpicturesque uniformity of costume demanded by the military science of our day. Before a battle-piece of Horace Vernet (and only his battle-pieces are his masterpieces), the crowd stands breathless and horrified at the terrible and bloody aspect of war, while the military connoisseur admires the ability and skill of the feats of arms, so faithfully rendered that he forgets he is not looking at real soldiers in action. No poetry, no romance, no graceful and gentle beauty; but the stern, dark reality as it might be written in an official bulletin, or related in a vigorous, but cold and accurate, page of history. Such is the distinguishing talent of Horace Vernet—talent sufficient, however, to make his pictures the attractive centres of crowds at the Louvre Exhibitions, and to make himself the favorite of courts and one of the illustrissimi of Europe.

The Vernets have been a family of painters during four generations. The great-grandfather of Horace was a well-known artist at Avignon, a hundred and fifty years ago. His son and pupil, Claude Joseph Vernet, was the first marine painter of his time; and occupies, with his works alone, an entire apartment of the French Gallery at the Louvre, besides great numbers of sea-pieces and landscapes belonging to private galleries. He died in 1789, but his son and pupil, Antoine Charles Horace Vernet, who had already during two years sat by his side in the Royal Academy, continued the reputation of the family during the Consulate and Empire. He was particularly distinguished for cavalry battles, hunting scenes, and other incidents in which the horse figured largely as actor. In some of these pictures the hand of the son already joined itself to that of the father, the figures being from the pencil of Horace; and before the death of the father, which took place in 1836, he had already seen the artistic reputation of the family increased and heightened by the fame of his son. Horace Vernet was born at the Louvre on the 30th June, 1789, the year of the death of his grandfather, who, as painter to the king, had occupied rooms at the Louvre, where his father also resided; so that Horace not only inherited his art from a race of artist-ancestors, but was born amid the chef d'œuvres of the entire race of painters. Of course, his whole childhood and youth were surrounded with objects of art; and it was scarcely possible for him not to be impressed in the most lively manner by the unbroken artist-life in which he was necessarily brought up. It would appear that from his childhood he employed himself in daubing on walls, and drawing on scraps of paper all sorts of little soldiers. Horace's youth did not pass entirely under the smiles of fortune. He had to struggle with those difficulties of narrow means with which a very large number of young artists are tolerably intimate. He had to weather the gales of poverty by stooping to all sorts of illustrative work, whose execution we fancy must have been often a severe trial to him. Any youth aiming at "high art," and feeling, though poor, too proud to bend in order to feed the taste (grotesque and unrefined enough, it must be allowed,) of the good public, which artists somewhat naturally estimate rather contemptuously, might get a lesson of patience by looking over an endless series of the most variedly hideous costumes or caricatures of costume which Horace was glad to draw, for almost any pecuniary consideration. A series of amusingly naïve colored prints, illustrating the adventures of poor La Vallière with Louis XIV., would strengthen the lesson. These were succeeded by lithographs of an endless variety of subjects—the soldier's life in all its phases, the "horse and its rider" in all their costumes, snatches of romances, fables, caricatures, humorous pieces men, beasts, and things. In short, young Horace tried his hand at anything and everything in the drawing line, at once earning a somewhat toughly-woven livelihood, and perfecting his talent with the pencil. In later years, the force and freedom of this talent were witnessed to by illustrations of a more important character in a magnificent edition of Voltaire's "Henriade," published in 1825, and of the well-known "Life of Napoleon," by Laurent.

It was at this time that he turned to the line of art for which he felt himself naturally endowed, the incidents of the camp and field. The "Taking of a Redoubt;" the "Dog of the Regiment;" the "Horse of the Trumpeter;" "Halt of French Soldiers;" the "Battle of Tolosa;" the "Barrier of Clichy, or Defense of Paris in 1814" (both of which last, exhibited in 1817, now hang in the gallery of the Luxembourg), the "Soldier-Laborer;" the "Soldier of Waterloo;" the "Last Cartridge;" the "Death of Poniatowski;" the "Defence of Saragossa," and many more, quickly followed each other, and kept up continually and increasingly the public admiration. The critics of the painted bas-relief school found much to say against, and little in favor of, the new talent that seemed to look them inimically in the face, or rather did not seem to regard them at all. But people in general, of simple enough taste in matter of folds of drapery or classic laws of composition or antique lines of beauty, saw before them with all the varied sentiments of admiration, terror, or dismay, the soldier mounting the breach at the cannon's mouth, or the general, covered with orders, cut short in the midst of his fame. Little of the romantic, little of poetical idealization, little of far-fetched style was there on these canvasses, but the crowd recognized the soldier as they saw him daily, in the midst of the scenes which the bulletin of the army or the page of the historian had just narrated to them. They were content, they were full of admiration, they admired the pictures, they admired the artist; and, the spleen of critics notwithstanding, Horace Vernet was known as one of the favorite painters of the time.

In 1822, entry to the exhibition at the Louvre being refused to his works, Horace Vernet made an exhibition-room of his atelier, had a catalogue made out (for what with battles, hunts, landscapes, portraits, he had a numerous collection), and the public were admitted. In 1826 he was admitted a member of the Institute, and in 1830 was appointed Director of the Academy at Rome, so that the young man who could not so far decline his antiquities as to treat the classic subject of the Royal Academy, and thus gain the Academy at Rome, now went there as chief of the school, and as one of the most distinguished artists of his time. This residence for five years among the best works of the great masters of Italy naturally inspired him with ideas and desires which it had not been hitherto in his circumstances to gratify. And once installed in the Villa Medici, which he made to resound with the voices of joy and revelry, splendid fêtes and balls, he set himself to study the Italian school.

A series of pictures somewhat new in subject and manner of treatment was the result of this change of circumstances and ideas. To the Paris Exhibition of 1831 he sent a "Judith and Holofernes," which is one of the least successful of his pictures in the Luxembourg, where it hangs still, with another sent two years after, "Raffaello and Michael Angelo in the Vatican." This is perhaps the best of his works at the Luxembourg, all being inferior; but it has a certain dry gaudiness of color, and a want of seriousness of design, which render it unfit to be considered a master-work. One unquestionably preferable, the "Arresting of the Princes at the Palais Royal by order of Anne of Austria," found its way to the Palais Royal, the king seeming to know how to choose better than the authorities of the "Gallery of Living Painters." A number of other pictures testified to the activity of the artist's pencil at Rome: "Combat of Brigands against the Pope's Riflemen," "Confession of the Dying Brigand," also at the Palais Royal, but also we fear destroyed by the popular vandalism of the 24th February; a "Chase in the Pontine Marshes," "Pope Leo XII. carried into St. Peter's." The favor of the public, however, still turned to the usual subject of Horace Vernet—the French soldier's life; finding which, on his return from Rome, he recurred to his original study. In 1836 he exhibited four new battle-pieces, "Friedland," "Wagram," "Jena," and "Fontenoy," in which were apparent all his usual excellencies.

The occupation of the Algerine territory by the French troops afforded the artist an opportunity of exhibiting his powers in that department most suited to them. A whole gallery at Versailles was set apart for the battle-painter, called the Constantine Gallery, after the most important feat of arms yet performed by the French troops in Africa, the taking of the town of Constantine. Some of the solitary and extraordinary, we might say accidental, military exploits in Europe of Louis Philippe's reign, are also commemorated there. The "Occupation of Ancona," the "Entry of the Army into Belgium," the "Attack of the Citadel of Antwerp," the "Fleet forcing the Tagus," show that nothing is forgotten of the Continental doings. The African feats are almost too many to enumerate. In a "Sortie of the Arab Garrison of Constantine," the Duke de Nemours is made to figure in person. Then we have the "Troops of Assault receiving the Signal to leave the Trenches," and "The Scaling of the Breach." There are the "Occupation of the Defile of Teniah," "Combat of the Habrah, of the Sickak, of Samah, of Afzeum." In fine, there is the largest canvass in existence, it is said, the "Taking of the Smalah," that renowned occasion when the army was so very near taking Abd-el-Kader; and the "Battle of Isly," which gained that splendid trophy, the parasol of command. Besides these great subjects there are decorations of military trophies and allegorical figures, which seem to have been painted by some pupil of Vernet. These battles were first of all exhibited to the admiration of Paris in the various salons after their execution, and were then sent off to decorate Versailles. There are also, in the Gallery of French History, at Versailles, several others of his, such as the "Battle of Bouvines;" "Charles X. reviewing the National Guard;" the "Marshal St. Cyr," and some others among those we have already named. In them the qualities of the artist are manifested more fully, we think, than in any others of his works. They are full of that energy, vivacity, and daguerreotypic verity which he so eminently displays. There is none of that pretension after "high art" which has injured the effect of some of his pictures. The rapidity of their execution too, in general, was such, that the public had hardly finished reading the last news of the combats, when the artist, returned in many cases from witnessing the scenes, had placed them on the canvases, and offered them to popular gaze. Yet the canvasses are in many cases of great extent, and often, the figures of life-size. But the artist rarely employs the model, painting mostly from memory, a faculty most astonishingly developed in him. He generally also saves himself the trouble of preparing a smaller sketch to paint after, working out his subject at once in the definite size. Of course with more serious and elevated subjects, worked out in a more serious and elevated spirit, such a system would not do. But for the style of subject and execution required by Horace Vernet's artistic organization, these careful preparations would not answer. They would only tend to diminish the sweeping passion of the fiery melée, and freeze the swift impulsive rush of the attack or flight. Vernet has several times attempted Biblical subjects, but they have never succeeded so well as to add anything to his fame as a battle painter. "Judah and Tamar," "Agar dismissed by Abraham," "Rebecca at the Fountain," "Judith with the head of Holofernes," "The Good Samaritan," have rather served to illustrate Arab costume and manners (which he makes out to be the same as, or very similar to, those of old Biblical times), than to illustrate his own power in the higher range of art. In the midst of painting all these, Horace Vernet has found time, which for him is the smallest requisite in painting, to produce an innumerable mass of pictures for private galleries, or at the command of various crowned heads; which, with many of those already mentioned, are well known all over Europe by engravings. "The Post of the Desert," "The Prayer in the Desert," "The Lion Hunt in the Desert," "Council of Arabs," "Episode of the Pest of Barcelona," "The Breach of Constantine," "Maseppa," and a host of others, together with landscapes, portraits, etc., have served both to multiply his works in the galleries of every country in Europe, and to make him one of the most popular of living artists. His only daughter was married to Paul Delaroche, now deceased, so that the celebrated line of painters who have borne his family name, is destined to end with him.

AMUSING NAVAL ANECDOTE.

Shortly before the declaration of the war of 1812, against Great Britain, Captain — commanded a ship which sailed from the United States to Portsmouth, England, by the way of the West Indies. A number of British naval officers stationed at one of the West Indian Islands, had been ordered home, and took passage in this ship. Conversation during the voyage turned frequently upon the prospect of war between the two countries. "If," said the English officers, "war should take place, we shall capture every ship in the American navy. It is impossible that we should fail!" To this accustomed braggadocio of John Bull, the captain simply replied, "Gentlemen, you may live to find yourselves disappointed." This English spirit of boasting was kept up during the entire voyage, without, however, disturbing friendly feelings. They reached Portsmouth in safety, but had only been in port a few weeks, when the startling news arrived that Hull had taken the English frigate Guerriere, commanded by Captain Dacres. The day after the reception of the news, the old captain purchased a white hat, small clothes, etc., and went to the navy yard to which his passengers had been ordered. He found them grouped together talking over the serious news. "Good morning, gentlemen," said he, "have you heard the news?" "O, yes, captain, we suppose you refer to the victory of Hull?" "Not at all, gentlemen; my news is that Hull has been broken by a court martial!" "Why, captain, you are not in earnest—what do you mean? We are astonished, indeed!" "Yes," continued the captain, "the American congress passed a resolution that if an American frigate did not take a British frigate in fifteen minutes, the commander should be cashiered; and you know it took Hull just seventeen minutes and a half to take the Guerriere!" His audience dispersed as if the riot act had been read, greatly mortified. As for the captain, he made it a rule to mount his white hat and shorts and call at the navy yard, as news of each successive victory of our gallant navy reached him, to congratulate his former boasting English naval friends.

TIME'S CHANGES.

BY ANNIE LINDA HAYE.

The glorious springtime comes again,
The April showers return,
And with them come the anguished thoughts
That in my heart will burn:
Will burn and glow with whirling power,
Until with sudden pain,
I feel a void, an empty room—
Where art thou, Ernest Vane?

Three long, long years—the longest time
My life has ever known—
Have passed since last I saw thy face,
And heard thy last earth-tone:
Since, mid the orchard's leafless trees,
We laid thee down to rest;
And there I watched the earth-cloids laid
Upon thy coffin'd breast.

That bright brown curl with death-damp wet,
Still in my Bible pressed,
Of thee is still a cherished trust,
Since thou art with the blest.
That leaf—thy own geranium tree
With leaves was bright and green—
Reminds me still of that bright past,
And tells me what has been.

Ah, could you leave me? Life has been
A waste and desert drear,
Since I have lost the truest one
My soul has loved so dear.
Be still, sad heart! thy murmurs cease,
For mid the ransomed blest
He lives where none can trouble more,
And weary souls can rest!

MY BOARDER.

BY MARY A. KEABLES.

At the age of forty-five, I was left a widow. Fifty found me grayer, paler, more wrinkled and bent, less cheerful and hopeful, than when the coffin-lid was closed for the last time over Evered's white face. At forty-five, I was tired of life; at fifty, I wished—nay, prayed for death. Do you ask me why? Simply because my aimless life had grown to be a burden almost too heavy to be borne. I was weary—I longed to lay it down, and rest—rest by Evered's side, in the grave.

I was comfortable enough—in my way. Although far from being wealthy, a competence was left me after my husband's affairs were settled—a low, brown wooden farm-house a quarter of a mile from the village—low and brown, to be sure, but nevertheless roomy and comfortable.

A tenant occupying a part of it, carried on the farm; while the rest, five large, well-furnished rooms, were left to me.

Two rooms in front were separated by a hall, a parlor and sitting-room; the former opened into a large spare bed-room, and the latter into a dining-room, while the kitchen formed a wing beyond. In the sitting-room was my bed and library, a small round table upon which I breakfasted, and by which I read and sewed, two or three old-fashioned cane-seat chairs, an easy one in which I sat, a small coal stove, a neat dark rag carpet of my own making, chintz curtains, and a couple of plaster of Paris figures upon a mantel-shelf each side the clock, completed the furnishing of the room. One of these figures was a Cupid, the other a Madonna. I was not a Catholic, and I but kept the little image for the sake of the one who gave it to me—poor little Madge.

Why do I say poor little Madge? She is richer far than I, for, while I am roaming over the wide earth friendless and alone, she is wearing a diadem in heaven. But as I said, this Madonna was her gift, and for her sake, it seems almost like a link connecting me with the angels. A pretty tortoise-shell kitten that purred upon the brodered rug in front of the stove in the winter, and upon the window-sill in the sun long summer days, was my only companion. I wished for none other; I wanted to be alone—ALONE!

I wish I could forget those long, dreary, miserable five years—those aimless, passionless five years, during which my life became so great a burden; but I cannot. They are stamped upon my heart as with a seal of fire; they have burned down—down—into my very soul. Bid me forget my early happiness! As well might I, as the living death I experienced during that time.

As I said, fifty found me grayer, paler, more wrinkled and bent, less hopeful and cheerful, than at forty-five. And now for my story.

"I should think it would be pleasant for you to have a boarder—a young lady, for instance," said my tenant's wife, Mrs. Brown, to me one day.

She had found me sitting moody, dreamy, silent—watching the shadows as they played over the carpet, and up and down on the cheaply papered wall.

"Ah!"

That was my only reply. I wished to tell Mrs. Brown I was capable of attending to my own business, but I did not. Sorrow, instead of making me better, had soured my whole disposition. I believe I disliked the whole race of human beings, because of my own destiny; I do not know.

"Yes," said Mrs. Brown, turning the seam of the sock she was knitting, and then looking straight into my face; "yes, I should think a boarder would be lots of company for you. Now you have your three meals a day just as regular as if there was half a dozen of you, and any one, to see the sights of cakes and pies, and jellies and preserves, you everlastingly keep on hand, would think there ought to be more than one to eat them. But what makes you cook so much, Mrs. Ellison?"

I wanted again to tell her I was capable of attending to my own business; but I did not. I simply replied, yawning:

"O, to pass away the time, Mrs. Brown!"

"Lor sakes! to pass away the time? Why, goodness knows that goes fast enough! or I guess you'd find it so, if you had an old man and four overgrown lads to make and bake for. Sakes alive, if the days were three times as long, I shouldn't complain, I'm sure!"

Mrs. Brown paused, to bind off the heel of the stocking she was knitting, while I watched the shadows. Then she commenced taking up the side stitches, and counting; then she took off three from the instep needle, and began again.

"Why don't you, Mrs. Ellison?"

"What?"

"Why don't you take a boarder?"

"And why should I?"

"For company. Aint you dreadful lonesome?"

"Lonesome!" Could that be the great misery that I felt day after day, and week after week? Was I lonesome? No, that could not be. I did not wish for company, and so I told Mrs. Brown.

"Well, I couldn't live that way no how, and it's my opinion, Mrs. Ellison"—here she paused to narrow—"it's my opinion, Mrs. Ellison, you would feel better if you had some kind of company. But you're so particular, I suppose you'd be in an agony for fear the chairs would be set askew, or a speck of coal dropped on the zinc, or that there would be some little noise to disturb you. I guess if you had a husband and four overgrown lads, you'd get bravely over that—I do!"

There she was, again talking of her husband and overgrown boys! Hard working, uneducated, careworn, as was Mrs. Brown, how gladly would I have changed places with her, had that been possible! She had some one to love, some one to love her, something to care for, something to live for, while I had nothing! No, Evered was dead; and beneath the cold sod, long ago, was laid a sunny head, and white hands folded over a pulseless bosom. Lips that called me "mother" once, were dust now. I was alone!

"Good night, Mrs. Ellison," said Mrs. Brown, having knit into the instep needle, and rolled up her work. "I suppose it's no use to ask you to come in and see me, but I thought I'd just run in and tell you about the shed, for husband says it leaks too bad for the cattle this fall, and he—"

After my tenant's wife had gone, I sat down again and watched the shadows. But I was not thinking of them; I was wondering if, after all, I was not lonesome, and if a boarder—a real nice, quiet lady boarder—could be tolerated or no. I wondered if another plate at the table (for the little round table was large enough for two) would not look more cheerful and homelike; if another to help eat the delicacies with which it was overspread, would not give me more of an appetite for my own food; if a face looking at me from across the table, a plain, pleasant, yet sober face—one neither too long nor too short, neither too round nor too narrow, too fair nor too dark—one neither ugly nor beautiful, but a pleasant medium between the two—one framed in by dark, smooth, glossy braids of hair—one with curving brows, dark, hazel, or gray eyes, and a mouth neither too large, so as to be masculine, nor too small, to look old maidishly prim—could be tolerated! I found myself thus framing, in my mind's eye, my ideal boarder. Yes, I thought I could tolerate such an one—perhaps.

But then—she might love company; she might want to do sundry little washings and ironings; she might have a fashion of leaving her articles of wearing apparel upon the floor, or upon the chairs; she might visit, and keep late hours; she might meddle with my plaster of Paris figures, or want to keep back my chintz window-curtains that I studiously kept drawn close together; she might worry pussy, and consequently torment me. Even a young lady, my ideal as regarded looks, might do all this.

No, I wouldn't run the risk—what was the use? Mechanically I took up a city paper, one I had received that morning, and as a strange fate would have it, my eye fell upon this notice:

"NOTICE.—Boarding in the country wished by a young lady of this city, in a private family. The locality must be healthy, and the character of the family unexceptionable. Apply to box No. —, New York city."

Now there was something in this advertisement that attracted my attention. In the first place, it was a young lady; had it been a gentleman, I should have passed it by without a thought. Moreover, I imagined this young lady must be without friends; else why did not they procure a boarding place for her, without resorting to this method? Secondly, she wished board. She could not be poor, or she would have desired a situation, no doubt, as governess, seamstress, chambermaid or cook. She wished board, and no doubt was able to pay well for it. Thirdly, a private family, not a country boarding-house. Why? No doubt she wished for quiet, even as I did. She might be an orphan—yes, that was possible; she was no doubt in poor health, for the notice specified that the locality must be a healthy one; she was without doubt of unexceptionable character; else why was that prerequisite necessary in the family of which she wished to form a member? Why? I thought I could not err in my conclusions; the sequel of my story will prove their correctness or incorrectness.

I went to the small drawer of my round table and took from it a sheet of old-fashioned letter paper, a pen, and a bottle of ink. I sat down and wrote, folded and enveloped my letter, and directed it to "Box No. —, New York city." After I had done this, I covered up the fire, for it was in late autumn, and went to bed. I had a strange dream; then I did not believe in dreams—but—I—do—now!

As I said, it was a strange dream of my imaginary boarder. I cannot repeat it all. Had I believed in dreams, the next morning I should have burned the letter I had penned the night before; as it was, I sent it to the post-office.

I was quite busy for a day or two fixing up the spare bedroom for the reception of my intended boarder. The white curtains were looped back with rose-colored ribbon, the pictures were dusted, and the white counterpane I had kept packed away in a great oak chest, was spread upon the plump soft bed.

Two days found all arranged, everything complete, and upon the third my boarder arrived. I was disappointed! O, how far my ideal of a perfect feminine boarder came from being realized! It was dusk when she arrived, and as she retired immediately to her room pleading fatigue, it was not until the next morning at breakfast that I had an opportunity of critically observing her.

She was dressed in a plain dark green morning-dress, confined at the waist by a cord and tassel, and a plain linen collar, with cuffs to match. She was of about the medium height, rather below than above it, hair of a very light brown, wavy and clustering in short half curls around her white neck. Her complexion was very fair, with a delicate peach-bloom color in her cheeks and lips, her eyes very blue, and her teeth were even, pearly and beautiful. This was the lady, apparently not more than twenty years of age, who took a seat opposite me at the little round table that Saturday morning.

The coffee was delicious, with its wealth of best double refined sugar and rich golden cream; the steak was broiled to a turn; the muffins were light as time, yeast and eggs could make them; everything was to my satisfaction—everything except that white beautiful face opposite me, with its calm, passionless expression, its soul, as it were, hid in the deep, fathomless starry eyes, which the golden lashes fringed. I half hated my boarder, she was so far from being my ideal.

"Help yourself to the sugar and cream, Miss—" I paused. "What name shall I call you?"

The expressionless face changed not a whit, but the voice was very rich and melodious. I seem to hear it now—I would that I could.

"You may call me Ruth."

"Ruth what?"

"Simply Ruth; that will designate me."

I felt angered and provoked; I could not help it. The hot blood rushed to my face, but I remained silent.

"We may as well make what arrangements are necessary, Mrs. Ellison, this morning," said the same rich voice.

"Very well," I replied.

Then followed various little items not at all necessary to the development of our story—price of board, etc., etc.

As time passed away, the mystery which surrounded my lady boarder did not diminish in the least. In all my endeavors to ascertain anything in regard to her former life, I met with most perfect unsuccess; after she had breakfasted with me four-and-twenty times, I knew no more of her than on the first morning we sat down to our coffee and muffins together. My boarder was a myth.

I did not like this; it troubled me. My mind, so long given up to a morbid inactivity, eagerly seized this mystery to work upon; but the more I studied, the deeper was everything involved in obscurity. Only that she came from New York, was remarkable for her beauty, quietness and neatness—that was all I knew at the end of a month, and twice that length of time found me no wiser!

She generally spent her time in reading or drawing—sometimes embroidering—for when the weather became severe, she sat with me in the breakfast-room, as I kept but one fire. In the morning, she always appeared in the same dark green wrapper; at eleven o'clock, this was exchanged for a rich black silk, with heavily embroidered collar and undersleeves. This was her toilet day after day, week after week. She never went out into the village, made no acquaintances, and seemed to wish none. She paid me weekly in advance for her board, seldom spoke except to make some little business arrangements, or to remark concerning the weather—always quiet, calm, passionless. I judged by appearances then; I do not now. I did not know then how the gay smile, the merry laugh, the calm exterior, may hide the anguish that is gnawing at the heart-strings. As I said, I judged by appearances then; I do not now.

It was a few nights before Christmas—a cold, blustering, tempestuous night. How the snow and sleet dashed against the windows, and the wind roared down the chimneys and whistled through the cracks of the old brown wooden house! But we did not feel it; the little stove was aglow with the bright coal flame, and the lamp cast a cheerful light throughout the cosy apartment, lighting up the pictures of the Cupid and Madonna upon the mantel-shelf, dancing up and down in fitful brightness and shadow upon the papered wall, while puss lay napping and purring upon the rug. I was busy with my sewing. Ruth had been reading, but had laid down her book and was gazing into the fire, her elbows upon her knees, and her face resting upon her white palms. I could not observe the expression of her countenance, for the short curls hid the features from my view; but I imagined it was calm, passionless, expressionless as usual.

My eyes were dim. It was with difficulty, in the evening, that I could thread a needle. I had been making several unsuccessful attempts, when she observed me.

"Allow me, Mrs. Ellison."

She took the needle, threaded it, and gave it back to me.

I do not know why this little act of kindness should affect me, but it did. She stooped forward, and smoothed the glossy fur of my tortoise shell pussy. It might have been merely mechanical, it might have been otherwise; I do not know. At any rate, I felt my heart soften towards her. I forgave her the fault of being beautiful, and thought more kindly of her than I had ever done before.

Suddenly she turned towards me. I never shall forget the look upon her face that struck a dumb terror to my heart. She drew her chair closer to mine, and laid her hand upon my arm.

"I have something I want to say to you," she said. Her voice was very deep, and it sounded as if her eyes must be full of tears; yet they were not.

"And what is it?" I asked, surprised.

There was a pause.

"I think I can trust you," she said, at length. "I think you have a kind heart—I am certain of it. You have seen trouble; I can read it more plainly in your face, than you can judge of my sorrow by mine."

She spoke rapidly, gazing meanwhile full into my face, while she still grasped my arm.

"I should not suppose you had ever known anything about trouble," I said, scarcely knowing what to reply, yet seeing that she evidently waited for an answer.

"You judge by appearances—so does the world in general—so I did once, and I was deceived. Yes, I was deceived; that is just what I want to talk with you about. And I think I can trust you, Mrs. Ellison, for you are neither a gossip nor a tale-bearer; you mind your own business, and, as I said, I am certain your heart is a kind one."

My heart was gradually softening towards my companion; still she spoke rapidly, her hand had slid down from my shoulder to my wrist, which she clasped tightly.

"I want to tell you a story," she said, after a pause. "It is a simple story enough, too, but listen. I said it is a simple story, it is also one that will make you shudder, and understand why I do not now judge by appearances. At the age of sixteen I was left an orphan, and a man whom I shall call Archer Rivers was my legal guardian. This is all simple enough; you understand this, do you not, Mrs. Ellison?" The grasp upon my wrist tightened.

"Yes," I replied.

"Yes, that is simple enough. Mr. Rivers was already forty years of age when I was sixteen. My father left me some thirty thousand dollars, which I was to come in possession of at the age of twenty-one. This, as I said, was left under the control of Mr. Rivers, who was a friend of my father, and in whom he had implicit confidence, as for my father's sake of course I had; he was my guardian, I believed in his truth, in his honor, Mrs. Ellison."

I replied by an inclination of the head, and she continued:

"I had a lover, one whom my father had pledged me to, and one whom I loved with all my heart, and whom I truly believe loved me as devotedly in return. Let me call this lover's name Harry Merwin, there is no use in giving real names. As I said, we were engaged when my father died. Six months or so afterwards Harry went to Europe to transact business for the firm of which he was a member, and upon his return we were to be married. Five years afterwards I received a letter, post-marked Liverpool, in which I recognized Harry's well-known hand. This letter stated that he was on the point of being married to a beautiful London heiress, whose acquaintance he had formed some time previous. I did not know that the letter was a forgery; I believed Harry was false to me, and in my first anger—for I was too proud to allow myself to grieve—I married a man of more than twice my years, Archer Rivers, my guardian. You ask me why, Mrs. Ellison. I cannot tell you, I have wondered at it a thousand times, enough that I did so; and then my husband mockingly, tauntingly told me in a passion, one day, that he had but married me for my money, and that he himself had forged the letters that had led to my estrangement from my lover. He told me this and more; that he had intercepted letters from Harry, and had forged letters to him in my name. Then it was that in my anger I cursed Archer Rivers, my husband as he was, and threatened, despite my pride, to expose him to the world.

"Will you?" he said, tauntingly. "Will you, my pretty bride? I see you doing it! Ha, ha!"

"That night I drank tea with him. I remember of going to my room, that is all. Now I know that my tea was drugged. I knew no more until late the next day, when I awoke and found myself—can you guess where, Mrs. Ellison?—in an insane asylum! I cannot tell you how the ensuing days passed, how I raved, how I cursed my destroyer, for so I termed my husband; those who heard me, said 'poor thing,' and passed on, and when I saw that my ravings only convinced my keepers that I was insane, I became quiet, and gradually more liberty was allowed me. But although I was calm to all appearance, as great a tempest as ever was raging in my breast; now that I had learned of Harry Merwin's faithfulness, all my old love for him returned, and with that love a hatred, even loathing for the man who had deceived me, and wrecked all my earthly happiness. One day with several other visitors who came to see the asylum and its inmates, I recognized Fanny Merwin, an old schoolmate, and Harry's sister. She was a determined, resolute girl, of about my own age, and as lovely and affectionate as she was determined and resolute; when she with her companions entered the room, or cell, where I was confined, she did not at first recognize me, but when she did, she came up to me with a pitying expression upon her countenance, and giving me her hand, said kindly:

"I am sorry to see you here, Ruth!"

"But I am not crazy, Fanny," I said.

"She looked incredulous.

"I am not, he put me here because he feared I would make known his villainy, because that I knew of the letters he had forged, and of how he—"

"The party passed on, but Fanny remained; she sat down beside me, and I told her all. She believed me, I know she did. I saw hope in her great brown eyes.

"Is there not any way I can escape, Fanny?" I asked, almost in despair.

"She looked around, the door was locked, and the warden, and the rest of the party, were in a different part of the building.

"I will save you," she said. "Here—"

"It was but the work of a moment for her to take off her bonnet and shawl, and her black silk dress, the very one I am wearing now, Mrs. Ellison, and beckoned me to exchange my clothes for hers. I obeyed as if in a dream, scarcely knowing what I did.

"It is nearly dusk," she said, "our height is similar, and with proper care on your part, you will not be discovered."

"And you?" I asked.

"I will remain here in your place. I hardly think they will keep me long, for the utmost stretch of imagination could not make me out a lunatic." She laughed lightly as she said this. "You may write a note to Harry if you will, so he need not be uneasy on my account—be very careful, here is a purse, it contains money enough to last you for a while—now good-by."

"Just then the party was heard approaching, the warden gave a hasty glance around, thought all was right, and I passed out with the rest. To the few questions asked me, I replied briefly, and in a few moments I was outside the asylum walls, free! Once in the city, I found a retired boarding-house, and the next day advertised for a home in the country; you answered it, and I am here."

She was calm and passionless no longer, the eyes that were fixed upon mine were soft and blue no more, but glowed like coals of fire; the grasp she maintained upon my arm pained me, but I had not the power to escape from it.

"Do you hear me? Do you understand me, Mrs. Ellison?" she said, at length, in the same hurried, excited tone she had used during her entire story. "If you do, answer me truly, do you not pity me?"

"I do, indeed, my poor young lady," I answered, for she waited for a reply.

"I thought you would, I knew you had a kind heart, but there is more that I want to say to you—hark! I thought I heard footsteps coming up the path; but perhaps it is nothing but the wind. As I said, there is more to tell you. To-night I saw two horsemen pass by here to the village, one of them was one of the officers of the asylum, the other—" She paused, and then said in a voice hoarse from fear and passion, "My husband!"

She loosened her grasp from my arm, and leaned her head upon her hands and cried. I pitied her from my heart, for I could not doubt her story. She arose and walked two or three times across the room, then came and sat down beside me again.

"What can I do? What can I do, Mrs. Ellison? Where shall I go? They are even now on my track, and if they find me—" She shivered. O, how white her face was! How her eyes burned with that fire of intense anguish! "If they find me I had rather die!"

"No, no, they shall not, my poor child," I said, tenderly; I thought if she had lived, the little one who gave up her sweet young life years ago, if she had lived she would have been very nearly the age of this poor young creature who had come to me in her trouble—for her sake, I thought, for her sake I would protect this child of sorrow as far as possible.

She threw herself at my feet, and pressed her lips to my withered hands.

"Thank you, may the good Lord repay you a thousand fold!" she said.

"You are welcome to all the good I can do for you," I replied.

It was late in the evening, she did not say much more, but bade me good-night, and went to her room. After she had gone, I stirred up the fire, and sat down again and looked into the blaze. I do not know what I was thinking about, I cannot remember, but in a few moments I was startled by the slamming of the picket gate, and the sound of approaching footsteps. I held my head to one side and listened, the footsteps were close to my door, and the next moment a loud rap startled me. I went to the door. Two gentlemen stood upon the steps. In a moment it all flashed into my mind, that these were the pursuers of my hapless young boarder, nor was I mistaken. My resolution was at once fixed.

"I understand you have a boarder, Mrs.—Mrs.—"

"Ellison," suggested the other gentleman.

"Yes, Mrs. Ellison."

"I have," I replied.

"From the city?" he asked.

"From the city I believe," I answered.

"Can we see her?" asked the elder of the two gentlemen, whom I fancied was poor Ruth's lawful husband.

"I don't know, I replied, she has gone to her room, and I suppose is asleep, can't you call in the morning, gentlemen?"

They held a little low consultation together, then the elder one said:

"I should prefer to see her to-night; here is a card with my address, please give it to her and tell her I am in haste."

I invited them into the little sitting-room, asked them to be seated, and glanced carelessly at the card. The address was "Harry Merwin, New York City." In a moment I could see through the plot by which they thought to entrap the poor girl. I put the card into my pocket, and replenished the fire, remarking on the severity of the weather. After I had trimmed the light I asked the gentlemen to make themselves at home, and then went out to find Ruth. She was not yet asleep, and had heard the entrance of our visitors. I gave her the card, and briefly described the gentlemen. She was very pale, but she did not tremble.

"I will save you if I can, Ruth," I said, "but there is no time to lose, and you must see these men."

"Then all will be lost! No, no, let me hide anywhere—"

"That will never do. Suspicion would be aroused, and a strict search instituted; besides, such a procedure would cause a great noise and confusion, and I couldn't bear it. There is a safer, a better way than this."

"How?"

She listened eagerly, while I hastily unfolded my plan, and when I had concluded, said:

"Heaven bless you, Mrs. Ellison!"

I went to a chest and took from it several articles; one was a plain, old-fashioned lustre dress, a white neck-kerchief, a wig of long black hair, one Evered had bought for me in the city when my hair began to turn gray, but which I did not choose to wear, a pair of green spectacles, and a sauff box.

"There," I said, "be as quick as possible."

"What did the young lady say?" anxiously questioned the elder gentleman, as I entered the sitting-room.

"That she will be in in a few minutes," I replied.

The elder gentleman looked knowingly at the younger, and said, significantly:

"You see I wasn't mistaken."

"I see, I see," was the reply.

"How long has this lady boarded with you, madam?" asked the elder gentleman.

"About two months, I believe."

"Just so, just so." Another significant look, exchanged.

"Have you noticed nothing peculiar in her actions since she has been here?" asked the younger of the two gentlemen.

"Indeed, I couldn't say," I said, cautiously.

Another look was exchanged, a look that betokened their satisfaction at having, no doubt, achieved the object of their search.

I stirred the fire and filled the lamps, not because the fire was not sufficiently brisk, or the lamps anyway in need of trimming, but to occupy the time, and hide the emotions I feared would betray me if I remained quiet. The two gentlemen talked together in a low tone of voice; all I could distinguish was now and then, "I thought so," "Traced her better than I thought we could," etc.

Never in my life before did I strive to mask my feelings as I did then. I think I succeeded, no doubt better than I would have done had the strangers taken particular notice of me. Every moment seemed to me an hour, and almost an age seemed to have passed when the door opened and Ruth entered.

Knowing as I did the identity of my boarder, it was with difficulty I could restrain myself from an exclamation of surprise at her changed appearance. She curtsied very low as she entered, and said, in a squeaking, precise tone:

"What do the gentlemen wish with me?"

The wig of black hair which was combed low down over the forehead, the green spectacles, the old-fashioned black lustre dress, the white, Quaker kerchief, folded precisely and evenly across the bosom, and the snuff box which she produced and tapped in a practiced way, deceived the gentlemen entirely; they stared at her for a moment, which observing, she said in the same precise tone: "How can I serve you, gentlemen?"

"I—I beg pardon, madam," said the elder of the two, "but we are mistaken—we were misinformed—that is to say—we heard a young lady boarded here—not that either, exactly—beg your pardon, not but what you are young, but—but—I— If you are ready we will go, Mr. Erving; sorry we disturbed you, ladies, very sorry! Good-night, ladies, good-night!"

I lighted them out of the hall, heard the picket gate slam as they passed out, then I went back into the sitting-room. Ruth sat by the fire pale and trembling.

"Is the danger over, do you think, Mrs. Ellison?"

I told her "yes," and bade her go to bed, and forget all about it. After a time she retired to her room, and I sat down alone to my musings. Had I done right? I asked myself the question, and I need not say my conscience acquitted me.

The next morning Mrs. Brown, my tenant's wife, came in to see me. Among other things, she asked me if I had heard of the accident in the village the night before. Ruth was sitting opposite me at the table, for we were just breakfasting.

"What kind of an accident?" I asked, carelessly. I was not thinking particularly of what she said, and only made that reply mechanically.

"A man thrown from his horse and killed—a rather oldish gentleman—so my old man was saying. It was about ten o'clock; he and another gentleman were just stopping at the tavern, when the creaking of the sign skered this man's horse, and it jumped and threw him; his head struck upon the pavement—he never spoke afterwards."

Ruth's face was very white. "Do you know his name?" she asked.

"La, yes, child, it was kind of singular, so I remembered it. My old man said it was Rivers, leastwise, that's what the gentleman said that was with him; they was a trying to hunt up a crazy woman that had escaped from the asylum—poor man!"

And thus it was, at length Ruth Rivers was free! There is no need of my being very particular in describing what followed; how Ruth went back to the city, and how she and her old lover became lovers once more. Enough that it is a few days before Christmas, just a year from the time Ruth told me her sad story, and before me lies a dainty envelope, and therein a wedding card, upon which are the names, "Ruth Rivers—Harry Merwin."

A pleasant letter accompanies this card, short, to be sure, but sweet enough to make up for that, and thus the note runs:

"You must be sure and come, Mrs. Ellison, the twenty-fifth, remember. I am very sure I couldn't be married without seeing you again, to personally thank you for what you have done for me, and to let you know how happy I am. I shall send the carriage for you on the twenty-fourth, so come without fail. Truly yours,

"RUTH RIVERS.

"MRS. ELLISON."

I shall go to Ruth's wedding. May her second marriage prove happier than her first is my prayer.

THE THREE FISHERMEN.

BY CHARLES KINGSLEY.

Three fishers went sailing out into the west—
 Out into the west as the sun went down,
 Each thought of the woman who loved him the best,
 And the children stood watching them out of the town;
 For men must work, and women must weep,
 And there's little to earn, and many to keep,
 Though the harbor-bar be moaning.

Three wives sat up in the light-house tower,
 And trimmed the lamps as the sun went down,
 And they looked at the squall, and they looked at the shower,
 And the rack it came rolling up, ragged and brown;
 But men must work, and women must weep,
 Though the storms be sudden and waters deep,
 And the harbor-bar be moaning.

Three corpses lay out on the shining sands,
 In the morning gleam as the tide went down,
 And the women are watching and wringing their hands,
 For those that will never come back to the town;
 For men must work, and women must weep—
 And the sooner it's over the sooner to sleep,
 And good-by to the bar and its moaning.

MAY WARREN'S SACRIFICE.

BY GEORGE C. LYMAN.

"My last hope rests in you, May."

"In me, father?"

May Warren made answer in a tone of surprise, raising her sad, anxious eyes to her father's face.

As if her gaze discomposed him, Mr. Warren turned his head, and his glance wandered restlessly around the apartment. He was an old man, with a tall, spare figure, and thin, gray hair, and sat in an arm-chair, by a table covered with papers, while his pretty daughter, May, sat beside him on an ottoman. She repeated her words:

"In me, father?"

"Yes," he replied, starting from a moment's abstraction. "Do you remember Colonel Leighton, daughter?"

"Colonel Leighton? An old man with a heavy beard, partly gray, and pleasant blue eyes. He dined with us a few weeks ago. Yes, I remember him, father."

"Not so very old, May. Not as old as I am, and one of the finest men living. He is wealthy, very wealthy, too."

He met his daughter's questioning gaze fully now, as if he wished her to read something in his face. She kept her dark eyes fixed searchingly upon his countenance, the ebb and flow of the soft color upon her cheeks betraying the quick pulsations of her heart.

"What do you mean, father?" she asked, at length.

"I saw him last night. He offered to help me—save me, if—"

"If what, father?"

"If I would give you to him."

The words came hurriedly from Mr. Warren's lips, as if he feared that if he deliberated, he should not be able to utter them at all. As they fell on his daughter's ear, she started to her feet, pushing back her heavy hair from her pale face, in a bewildered sort of way, as if she were half-stunned.

"Marry me, father? Colonel Leighton?" she cried, in a low tone.

Mr. Warren took her hand, and drew her down to her seat again.

"May, Colonel Leighton will be a good husband to you. I have known him from boyhood, and understand perfectly his character and principles. He loves you—will be kind to you, and strive in every way to make you happy. And more—and more, May: he will save me from beggary!"

He paused, but his child, with her face bowed upon her hands, made no reply—nor stirred. The mute distress that her attitude betokened was not unnoticed by him.

"I do not force you to this, May, remember. The matter is left to your own choice. But you know what my wish is; what the alternative will be if you do not accept the offer."

She knew only too well. Fully she realized how absolutely necessary the luxuries to which her father had been accustomed were to him. Absolute loss of possession did not seem the most dreadful thing in the world to her, but she knew what a wreck it would make of him. In her youth and strength the future would still be bright and full of hope to her, but how could he, with his aged frame, and burden of sixty years, commence life anew. The hopeful thought that she could work for him and supply him with his accustomed comforts, afforded her but a moment's comfort. To him, with his stubborn, aristocratic ideas, this would be the most severe trial of all; his delicately reared, petted child laboring for his support. He would never be reconciled to it. That was no alternative, she saw at a glance. Then with a desperate effort to think calmly, she recalled the form of Colonel Leighton. She remembered his bowed head and silvered beard, his dark, deeply furrowed face, and fifty years. She could get no further. A younger face, with merry, azure-hued eyes, and tossing, sunny hair, sprang up in strong contrast. Stretching out her hands to her father, as if for pity, she cried out: "I cannot—O, father—I cannot!"

The old man sank back with a groan.

"Lost—then I am lost!" he cried, shuddering. There were no reproaches, only those bitter words and that despairing attitude. White and tearless she sat at his feet, the agony of her heart written on her face. The wild, desperate thought that the sacrifice was possible, occurred to her.

"Father, dear father!"

He raised his head, whitened with the frosts of his sixty winters, and looked at her with a gleam of hope in his sunken eyes. She crept into his arms as she had done when a child, and laid her soft cheek against his wrinkled brow.

"You know that I love you, father," she said. "I can never remember you but as kind, tender and forbearing with me. Your heart has been my home all my life. I will work, beg, suffer for you—I will die for you—O, how willingly, if need be—but that—O, father, you do not know what it is that you ask!"

He did not speak, but a moan broke uncontrollably from his lips, as he rested his head upon her shoulder. The struggle in her heart sent dark, shadowy waves across her face. Could she—could she?

"Father," she whispered, hurriedly. "Let me go now. I will see you again, answer you to-morrow." And she left him.

He could not see her face in the gathering darkness, only a glimpse of something white, but he felt the quivering of her lips as she bent to kiss him, and reached out his arms to embrace her, but she was gone.

"Heaven pity me!" The words came like a wail from her lips. She was alone in her chamber, flung prostrate upon a low couch, with her face hid in the cushions. The sound of the rustling foliage of the garden, and the chirping of the insects, came in through the open window with the damp, evening breeze, and the pale light of the rising moon filled the room with a soft radiance, but she was unconscious of everything but her misery. The house was so quiet that the sound of a footfall crossing the hall below fell upon her ear, and aroused her to a momentary interest. She heard a door open, the library door, and then a voice uttered a few words of common-place greeting. She remembered it well, and sprang to her feet with a desperate, insane thought of flight. But the door closed, the house was still again, and she was calmer.

She crossed the room listlessly and drew back the curtain of the window. The scene without was beautiful. The white moonlight lay broadly on the garden, turning to silver the tops of the trees, and making the little lake beyond look like a great, white pearl. Gazing earnestly downwards she saw a tall, shadowy figure standing beneath the shade of the old elm. With a low cry she sprang from the room, and a moment after stood beside her lover.

"Come at last, my treasure," cried Mark Winchester, folding her in his arms. She remained leaning passively against his breast, while he pressed passionate kisses upon her forehead, cheeks and lips.

"Why have you made me wait so long, darling?" he said, softly, and taking both her slender hands in one of his, he carried them to his lips. "Why how cold you are—how you tremble!" he continued, as she clung to him. "What is the matter, May?"

"I waited because I dreaded to meet you, Mark."

"Why? What do you mean?"

And brokenly through her tears and sobs she told him all. He did not speak or stir while she was talking, and when she had finished there was a long silence. She lacked courage to say more, he would not ask. She repeated the last words: "And to-morrow I must give him my answer." Still he did not speak.

She looked up at him. In the dim light she could see his rigid, agonized face, white lips and gleaming eyes. She stole her arms about his neck and drew his forehead down to her lips.

"Speak to me, Mark; say that you do not blame me."

He knew then that she had decided, and what that decision was.

"And you will leave me, May, and marry that old man?"

"Heaven pity me, Mark, for I shall. I will become his wife, and I will be true and faithful to him, for he will be kind to me. You will hear of me thus, and when you do, remember my words, Mark, that you have my heart."

"I will remember, May. God help us both, for I shall never forget you. They shall bury me with this upon my heart." And he drew a tress of soft, brown hair from his bosom.

For a moment more—one little, precious moment—he held her against his heart, and then kissed her, put her gently from him, and was gone.

For a moment she stood alone under the trees, with clasped hands and face upraised to the quiet sky, and then she turned and walked silently towards the house. A light from the library window streamed down on her, and as she looked up, she saw the shadow of a bowed, human figure fall across the curtain.

"Father, you are saved," she murmured.

A hand was laid suddenly on her arm, and she started with a low cry.

"Good evening, Miss May," said Colonel Leighton. "I have been seeking you."

She bowed, and stood silently before him with a calm, downcast face.

"I have been talking with your father," he continued, carelessly pulling a rose from a bush near them. "He tells me that you have promised to think of my proposal and let us know what your decision is, to-morrow. Is there anything I can say which will influence you to form your conclusion in my favor?"

"You cannot say anything which will influence me in the least, Colonel Leighton. As my father has said, you shall have my answer to-morrow."

He glanced up at the young face, so sad in its calm dignity, and then looked down at his fingers again, which were busied in tearing to pieces the blossom he held, and allowing the crimson petals to fall at his feet, as if they were fragments of the heart he was breaking. In the long silence that followed she glanced up at him once with the thought of flinging herself upon his mercy by giving him her confidence, but the stern expression of his face repelled her.

"Miss May," he said, suddenly, "you are averse to this marriage."

His tone aided in rendering his words an assertion. She was startled, but replied quietly:

"Do you think so?"

"I must be blind if I would think otherwise," he continued, with sudden energy. "May Warren, do you know that you hate me? That you would die rather than become my wife, were it not for your father's sake?"

Before she realized what she was doing, the monosyllable "yes," slipped from her lips.

"And in doing this, do you realize how you would wrong us both?"

She was silent.

"It shall never be. I will never call you my wife, knowing that you do not love me—that your heart is not in my keeping. I will not tell you of my hopes, how I have dreamed that my last days would be my happiest ones, it would not interest you. Now I have only to say that you are as free as if I had never seen your sweet face."

He paused for a reply, but she made none. Bewildered by her position, she did not know what to say.

"I know that I have only myself to reproach," he went on. "My motive in offering your father my assistance was a purely selfish one. The consequences are just upon me. I had no thought of the long years during which he had been my true and faithful friend, but cruelly took advantage of his position to gain my own ends. Yes, it is 'just upon me.'"

There was a bitterness in his tone, a despondency in his attitude, that greatly changed his accustomed, dignified composure of manner. Half unconscious of what she did, only sensible of the pity she felt for him, the young girl put her hand upon his arm and said, softly:

"Forgive me."

"Forgive me, rather, my child," he said, gently, taking the little hand of one of his, "for the misery I have caused you. I should have known that our paths in life could never be one. But good night, I will not detain you."

She did not shrink from him as he bent down to kiss her forehead, with his last words. He stepped aside to allow her free passage to the house, but she did not move.

"You are thinking of your father," he said.

"Do not be distressed on his account. Remember me in your prayers to-night, and sleep sweetly. It is all I ask."

He did not wait to hear her fervent "God bless you!" or witness her burst of joyful tears, but quickly left her.

The morning sunshine streamed broadly into the apartment of old Mr. Warren, where he lay in the heavy sleep of physical and mental exhaustion. The forenoon was far advanced when a servant roused him, informing him that Colonel Leighton waited in the library. Making a hasty toilet, the old man left his chamber and went to meet his friend. The gentlemen met cordially, and Colonel Leighton immediately requested that May might be sent for. They waited but a few minutes before the door swung noiselessly open, and, wearing a fleecy, white morning robe, the young girl entered. At a motion from her father she seated herself upon a low seat at his feet, and then glanced up with a confiding smile at Colonel Leighton, who stood leaning against the mantel, with an expression of face half sad, half admiring.

"We are waiting for your answer, May," said Mr. Warren, quietly.

"I will leave the matter entirely at Colonel Leighton's disposal," she replied.

The old man glanced perplexedly from her to his friend. Colonel Leighton stepped forward.

"My old friend, James Warren," he said. "I met your daughter last night, and talked with her. I discovered with what feelings she regarded a marriage with me, and cannot allow the sacrifice she would make for your sake. I will never marry her—she is free. And now I have your pardon to ask for the unmanly way in which I have taken advantage of your embarrassment, and came so near destroying the happiness of your child. Every power of mine shall be exerted to its utmost to relieve you, and all the reward I ask is, the knowledge that you and May do not despise me. Nay, nay, no thanks. I deserve rather to be scorned for the part I have acted. But I have one favor to ask, old friend. Will you allow me to choose a husband for your daughter?"

"You have my full and free permission," replied Mr. Warren, smiling through his tears. "But I hope you will be more successful in your choice than I have been."

"Never fear," said the colonel, with a glance at May. Flinging open a door that led to another apartment, he called, "Now, my boy," and Mark Winchester sprang into the room.

"Behold your future son-in-law," said Colonel Leighton. And ere the old man could comprehend the scene, the young couple knelt for his blessing. But at a motion from his friend he gave it willingly, and never were a happier party.

Through the interposition of his friend, Mr. Warren was saved from ruin, and his daughter made happy. When May that morning asked for a solution to the problem of his knowledge of Mark, he replied: "I did not wait half an hour in the garden to no purpose, little one." And she understood that he had overheard her conversation with her lover. Through his influence Mark's talents as an artist became known to the world, and when a few years after he became a popular painter, and a wealthy man, he had a little son named Edwin Leighton Winchester. What other proof of the young people's gratitude could he wish?

THE STOMACH AND ITS CRAVINGS.

In the diseases produced by bad food, such as scorbutic dysentery and diarrhoea, the patient's stomach often craves for, and digests things, some of which certainly would be laid down in no dietary that ever was invented for the sick, and especially for such sick. These are fruit, pickles, jams, gingerbread, fat of ham, or of bacon, suet, cheese, butter, milk. These cases I have seen, not by ones, nor by tens, but by hundreds. And the patient's stomach was right, and the book was wrong. The articles craved for in these cases, might have been principally arranged under the two heads of fat and vegetable acids. There is often a marked difference between men and women in this matter of sick feeling. Women's digestion is generally slower.—Florence Nightingale.

TOPSY AND I.

BY AGNES D. MERWIN.

"WELL, Belle, child, I suppose my wilful little pet must have her own way; she always does make her father say 'yes,' when he ought to say 'no,' so away with you, madcap."

I needed no second bidding—wild girl that I was—but making a mock curtsy to my grave sire, I danced off through the long hall, ran up stairs, and in a few minutes came down equipped for my ride.

Little Topsy was as wild a pony as was known for many a mile round—and as pretty too; jet black, with a long, wavy mane and a large, spirited eye. I had been lotting on having a ride with her many a day, but my father and brothers had always exclaimed against such a proceeding. But this morning I had commenced the siege with the determination to have my will, and had proved the truth of the old proverb by gaining it. I had not so easily, however, overcome the objections of my staid brother Mike, a most obstinate young man, by the way, who never would let even me (whom every one else thought at liberty to do as I pleased) get the better of his reason and judgment.

This same brother of mine, with a will that seemed determined as my own, was the first person I met on descending from the "upper regions." Placing himself directly in my way, he commenced the attack with, "Now, Belle!"

"Well, Mike."

With great dignity. "What do you mean by risking your neck on that wild pony, that nobody but I can ride, when you never were on horseback but twice before in your life?"

"Well, Michael, I shall be glad to give you the information you desire. I'm going because I want a good time, and Topsy, if she is named rightly, will like one too."

"Yes, Belle, I don't doubt she'll have a nice time, but I protest—"

What his protestation would have been was involved in mystery—he was interrupted by finding my hand over his mouth.

"No use protesting, Mike—Topsy and I are wilful this morning, so please content yourself."

As I spoke these audacious words, I stood on the middle steps of a flight of stairs. Mike retained the dignified attitude and countenance he had chosen, and never moved an inch. Seeing his determination, I made a low bow, and with one bound reached the hall door. Another, and I stood beside my brother Joe in the yard, who was putting the last touch to the equipments of my "bonnie steed." Joe looked up at my father, who was leaning on his axe, with a glance of suppressed fun.

"Well, child," said the latter, "after such a leap as that, I think Topsy will not endanger you much if she does leap a few stone-walls."

"Belle," said Joe, "didn't you say you were going through Burton Forest?"

"Yes."

"You know they say it is haunted, even in the daytime?"

I sprang to the saddle before he could help me.

"Never fear, Joe, Topsy and I are not acquainted with any goblins, and I shan't have you to introduce them; so I think they won't trouble us any."

So saying I dashed off. Topsy seemed bent on good behaviour. She trotted on quite soberly for some time, but not satisfied with this, I urged her to go faster. She quickened her pace to a canter. All this was very well, but Topsy knew she had me all to herself now, and she had her ideas of a good time as well as myself. Moreover Topsy felt her dignity slighted that I had not shown more timidity in her presence. She turned her head round to me, and there was a sly expression in her eye I didn't quite like. It was quite convenient for her purpose that there happened to be a stone in the way which she could pretend to be frightened at—quite so.

She did not fail to take advantage of it, and I found myself dashing through Burton Forest at an alarming rate. But if Topsy thought she could get rid of me so easily, she found herself mistaken. I was not at all pleased with the idea of having her leave me in such a gloomy place, for I was certain I should have a fit of the blues if she did. I could not stop her by entreaties or checks; so becoming very affectionate, I threw my arms around her neck, thinking she would be pleased with my confiding disposition, and deign to accommodate her pace to my desires. But Topsy was too bright for me. She was alike immovable to threats, entreaties, or caresses. The trees went by me like so many locomotives, and Topsy was evidently determined they should not exceed her in speed. But whatever was the cause of her hurry, and however desirous she was of arriving at the place of her destination (of which she had left me in blissful ignorance), disappointment was her fate.

Just as I had concluded to abandon myself to my fortune, and began to think that fortune was to "go all day and to go all night," Topsy and I were astonished by coming to a sudden halt—the cause of which was a hand placed upon her bridle. Notwithstanding the extreme obstinacy I had displayed in clinging so tenaciously to her before, Topsy's wishes were now fulfilled, in one respect at least. The violence of the shock I received in the suddenness of our interruption, threw me from my saddle. I found myself all at once seated in the midst of a mud-puddle, and picking myself up in haste, I left one shoe in the mire. My riding-cap falling off also, took my comb with it, and enhanced the elegance of my position. The skirt of my dress was also literally covered with mud. The first thing I noticed was Topsy, who stood looking at me with an expression which was certainly very exultant, and I verily believe to this day, that she was very grateful to the person who stayed her course for my overthrow.

From Topsy, my eye fell on the person who had dared to place himself before that wilful animal. If I had been nervous, timid, or superstitious, I should have fainted, or shown some other equally sensible signs of feeling at the sight that met my eye. As it was, my only sensations were those of surprise,—then amusement, at the ludicrousness of the scene. Before me, or rather before Topsy, stood a tall figure wrapped in a long black robe, fastened so as to conceal the lower part of its face, with its hat drawn closely down over its forehead, and to complete the mystification of its appearance, a black veil of crape fell from under its hat upon its shoulders. Standing directly in my path, in the midst of a dark wood, it was silent. Perhaps it thought that silence might awe me into fear. But this being (whether ghost, goblin, or conjuror, I did not comprehend) certainly found itself totally mistaken. We were an odd assemblage—a girl, a pony, and a ghost, in the middle of a mud-puddle!

But politeness compelled me to acknowledge my gratitude (I don't mean for my fall) to this person, whether man or goblin, as my preserver. But how should I address him? Would it be polite to call him a ghost? Now I didn't believe in ghosts, as I have before stated. But what this nondescript biped before me was, was entirely beyond my comprehension. But it would not do to stand eyeing him in that suspicious way any longer, so I made a desperate effort.

"Mr. Ghost," I commenced, but there I stopped; for the figure moved quickly but noiselessly towards me, and I felt its eye fixed steadily on me. I didn't mean to have been a bit frightened—but my heart would begin to beat quite fast just then. "Mr. Ghost," commenced I. Suddenly I felt a cold hand placed on mine. It—this ghost, goblin, or whatever you may call it, stood so near me I could have felt its hot breath—only ghosts are not supposed to have any. But I was fully determined, that come what would, not all the ghosts in ghostdom, nor all the goblins in the misty land of goblins, should frighten me—and whatever were the state of Topsy's nerves, she never would "fess" that she had the least idea of the meaning of the word "frighten" at that moment. I drew my hand resolutely away from his ghostship, with a polite bow: "Excuse me, Mr. Ghost," said I, "but you are really too cold to shake hands with comfortably."

The goblin moved a little nearer, its cold hand seized mine again, its sable robe touched my dress—tall, grim, dark, it stood beside me in its immovable silence. I stepped back a little, and endeavored to release my hand, but vainly. Was it in human nature that I should stand utterly fearless in that lonely forest with that nameless thing beside me?

I felt a dim, chilly horror creeping over me, a dizziness seized my dizzy head, and for the first time in my life, I realized the power of fear.

Reader, Belle Graham the dauntless, nearly lost her right to her title then. But, kind reader, did you ever hear of a ghost who had a cold? Alas! alas! for the fallen romance of my adventure! While grim Horror placed her mask upon my brow, my ear was greeted by a tremendous sneeze! Now we may well imagine that the damp air of ghostdom might give any inhabitant in it a cold—but this sneeze was by no means a ghost-like sneeze—not at all sepulchral, but a real, bona fide, lusty sneeze. I lifted my eyes suddenly to its face, and leaned eagerly forward. Then the old wood echoed a great shout of laughter, and as I pulled off cap and veil from the head of my brother Mike, I sprang upon the back of Topsy, saying:

"Belle Graham is still the dauntless, Mike, and the ghosts must in future feel that they are completely foiled!"

COMMERCE.

Commerce is the teacher of civilization. Threads of thought, lessons of human advancement and human policy are spun at cotton-mills, and shipped to instruct and civilize the heathen. With a cotton shirt, the native Indian enrobes himself with lessons, although for a time he may have no knowledge of their influence. The cotton tree—we speak it not irreverently—might be cultivated as the Tree of Knowledge—Jerold.

A SIMILE.

The rainbow tints, how beautiful they,
And yet how transient is their stay!
A while the varied colors bright
Remain, then vanish from our sight.
Thus earthly joys dissolve; be sure
In heaven alone true joys endure—E. Hull.

DIAMOND CUTTING DIAMOND.

Signor Dandini was a foreign refugee living somewhere in London, but his precise address was a secret which several of his creditors strove in vain to discover. The signor picked up a living by translating documents from foreign languages for different houses in the city. One day a letter arrived, addressed to the signor at one of these houses, stating that if he would call on the next Thursday at two o'clock, at the office of Smith & Co., solicitors, they would be happy to arrange with him about a translation which would probably bring him in a pretty considerable sum. The signor was in a dilemma. The pretty considerable sum would be most acceptable, of course, but then he had a strong objection to throwing himself in the way of unknown solicitors. However, at the time appointed, a foreign-looking individual presented himself at the office of Messrs. Smith, and handed in the letter addressed by that highly-respectable firm to Signor Dandini. "I have received this letter," said he, with a strong German accent. "Ah, to be sure, said the principal, 'Signor Dandini!'" The foreign-looking individual bowed. "Ah, my dear sir," continued Smith, smiling, "the fact is, I am sorry to have been compelled to have recourse to a little stratagem, but not knowing your address, we had no other means of getting at you—I have to serve you with this writ." The foreigner did not seem in the least surprised. He answered—"Hah, yes, mein dear sir. But we had recourse to one little stratagem too. I am not Dandini. I am one friend of his. He was afraid of this—so asked me to come and see about your letter. Good morning, mein dear sir."—London Herald.

GIRLS, DON'T DO IT.

In "Advice to Young Women" occurs the following: "There is a practice quite prevalent among young ladies of the present day, which we are old-fashioned enough to consider very improper. We allude to giving daguerreotypes of themselves to young men who are merely acquaintances. We consider it indelicate in the highest degree. We are astonished that any young girl should sell herself as cheap as this. With an accepted lover, it is of course all right. Even in this case, the likeness should be returned, if the engagement should by any misunderstanding cease. If this little paragraph should meet the eye of any girl about to give her daguerreotype to any gentleman acquaintance, let her know that the remarks made by young men when together, concerning what is on her part a piece of ignorance or imprudence, would, if she heard them, cause her cheeks to crimson with anger and shame. 'Were it a sister of ours,' we have often said, with a flashing eye—'were it a sister of ours!' But that not being the case, we give this advice to anybody's sister who needs it, most anxiously desiring that she should at all times preserve her dignity and self-respect."

A person who will borrow money of you without promptly repaying it, would, if he had a good chance, steal your money without the thought of repaying it.

The Trial of Ruth Linly's Life.

BY DELIA S. CARLETON.

Yes, she loved him. She realized it for the first time in her life, as she stood before him that bright May morning, holding her white hands clasped in his, and feeling the tender gaze of his hazel eyes upon her face. She had known him so long, and her intercourse with him had been so intimate, that the idea of analyzing her feelings towards him, and defining their exact relationship to each other, had never occurred to her. But looking deep into her own heart, she found that a strong and perfect love for Richard Vane had found a place there, and flourished as happily as violets in a May soil. The consciousness of this brought a soft flush to her cheek, and the heavily-fringed lids of her eyes drooped slowly.

"Look up, Ruth—speak to me!" cried her companion, impetuously. "Tell me that you love me—that you will be my wife!"

His wife! How her heart thrilled, as he uttered the words! Those strong, protecting arms always around her, that faithful breast evermore her resting-place, that noble heart devoted to her happiness! It was very sweet to think of, and a tremulous smile of pleasure flickered about her lips, but the next instant her whole face was shadowed by a thought so intensely sorrowful as to quench the light in her soft brown eyes, and curve to an expression of grief the ripe redness of her lips. She put her hands before her face, and shrank from him. A picture of her childhood appeared before her—a drunken father, a heart-broken mother, herself shrinking in passionate shame from the pitying gaze of strangers. Her mother's last words, "God save you from such a fate as mine has been!" rang in her ears. And then she could remember, only too plainly, the painful death of her parents, and her adoption by a rich aunt. And since. Her cheek flushed, and tears sprang to her soft eyes, as she remembered the indignities that had been heaped upon her ever since. Taunting words, insults and slights had been her daily portion for the last five years. The face of her lover clouded as he watched her:

"Dear Ruth," he said, at last, "what is the matter? If you do not love me, tell me so. Your pale face distresses me."

She looked up. "Richard, I do love you. My prayer is, that you may sometime realize how well; but while you raise the wine-cup to your lips, I can never be your wife."

"Ruth, dear child!"

He stood looking at her in amazement.

"Why, Ruth!" he cried, "what do you fear?"

"You would not ask that question, Richard, if your childhood had been like mine."

"But you do not think I will ever become a drunkard?" he said, surprisedly. "You have more faith in me than to believe that?"

For a moment she was silent. Then she said, simply and firmly:

"I cannot trust my happiness in your keeping, Richard, while you drink wine."

He regarded her for a moment with an expression of surprise and annoyance, but the calm gaze of the eyes she lifted to his face, disarmed him of his anger, and he said:

"I do not see how you can reasonably entertain this idea, Ruth, as regards me. You have never seen me affected by wine in your life, and—"

He did not finish the sentence, for she suddenly grasped his arm, and cried:

"Look, look!—a year ago he drank no more than you do."

Staggering through the heavy mud of the road which the window overlooked, was a young man. His dark hair fell in tangled masses about his unshaven, haggard face, and the eyes, once beautiful, shone out from beneath them wild and bloodshot. His intemperance had not yet reduced him to apparent poverty, but the splashes of mud upon his neat dress made the sight more pitiful than if he had been clothed in rags. Reeling and staggering he forced his way, while the lovers observed him. Ruth's eyes were filled with compassionate tears, and Richard looked pale and shocked.

"Good heavens!" he cried, "George Allen!"

Ruth put out her hands to him.

"O, Richard, Richard!—take the lesson home!"

With sudden, characteristic impulsiveness, he said, in a low, awed tone:

"I will never allow a drop of intoxicating liquor to pass my lips again, God helping me!"

"Bless you, bless you, Richard! Now I can trust you." And she wept out her heart's fullness upon his shoulder.

Strengthened by her love, she met patiently the tirade of her aunt, when that good lady discovered that it was her poor niece and not her dashing eldest daughter that Richard Vane wanted. But their schemes had failed, and they were forced to console themselves as best they might. Ruth and Richard were quietly married, and left immediately for their home, in the suburbs of a neighboring city. And how happy and contented they were! Nothing could have been more charming than the rooms of the pretty cottage, after they had been arranged by Ruth's own hand; and how pretty she looked tripping through them in her neat home-dress. What a jewel of a wife she proved! What capital dinners she would invent, and with what dainty grace preside at them;—how perfect was every arrangement of the little house over which she held control. When Richard came home from the office, weary with his day's work, he was always sure of a cheerful welcome. He could see the flutter of her white dress among the shrubbery far down the road, as she waited for him at the gate of the little garden. Then, the long, quiet evenings, so full of heartfelt happiness. Yea, the present was very bright, and Ruth, trusting in her husband's word, never dreamed of change.

Richard came home one evening moody and out of temper. Distressed and grieved, Ruth sought for the cause. In answer to her gentle inquiries, he replied that he had joined a sailing-party that morning, had been upon the water all day, and was tired. She waited upon him at supper, noting his flushed face and want of appetite. He retired immediately upon rising from the table, and when she sought her chamber a few hours after, he lay in a heavy sleep.

Not a word of the evening's occurrence was uttered the next morning, but when Ruth kissed him good-by at the hall-door, after breakfast, she looked searchingly into his eyes. His lids drooped quickly, and he hurried away. Over her sewing that day, Ruth shed many bitter tears. But it all seemed like a troubled dream that night when he came home as usual, and sat down to his supper pleasant and cheerful, and Ruth grew hopeful again, and dismissed the fears that had tormented her all day.

Summer passed away, and Thanksgiving day came. The young couple were invited to spend the day at Richard's father's house. Ruth giving up the plan of having a quiet dinner at home, which would have been her choice, yielded to her husband's wishes and accompanied him thither. But she received a shock that blanched her lips and cheeks white as ashes, on perceiving that at the dinner-table, Richard drank wine with his companion. Quietly she bowed her head, and none knew of the terrible pang at her heart.

When at home she spoke to him gently of his broken vow. With a look of annoyance he answered her lightly, and tried to waive the subject. Earnestly and tenderly she tried to rouse him to a sense of his danger, but without effect. None but herself and a pitying God knew of the agonized tears she shed for him in secret, or of the prayers she put up in his behalf. It became no uncommon thing for him to return at night with his breath tainted by something stronger than wine. The evenings that had once been so pleasantly spent, finally became periods of distress—Ruth bent silently over her sewing, fashioning dainty garments—and Richard lying moodily silent, or asleep upon the sofa.

One night she waited for him long past the usual hour. The clock struck seven, eight, nine, ten, eleven, successively, but he did not come, and she paced the floor in painful suspense, listening with a heavily beating heart to every sound. At last she heard the clang of the garden gate, as it closed, and then heavy, uneven steps upon the walk. Terrified and pale, she waited till the parlor door was flung open, and her husband entered, and flung himself into a chair, unable to stand steadily.

"Get me some supper," he said, roughly; "and don't stand there, looking as white as a sheet. What are you staring at, Ruth?"

"O, Richard!"

He gained his feet and staggered towards her.

"Why don't you mind me?" he asked, angrily. "Do you hear?" And he grasped her arm.

In her agony she endeavored frantically to free herself, but with sudden rage, he struck her down, and blows from his clenched hand fell upon her defenceless form. With sudden, desperate strength, she escaped from him, and screaming wildly fled. Down the long road she ran, and away over the fields and meadows, neither knowing nor caring whither she went. She grew dizzy at last, and fell heavily, nor knew anything more, until she opened her eyes in a chamber, where she lay upon a bed, with a kind-faced woman and a physician beside her. It was only for an instant that she realized her situation, for she grew delirious, and called wildly for her husband. At last they placed the light form of a little babe in her arms, and after a moment's hesitation, she clasped it close to her breast, and closed her eyes peacefully. When she opened them again the infant was gone, and she could not know that it rested, waxen and still, upon its little coffin bed.

For days she lay passively quiet upon her pillows, her dark eyes wandering restlessly about the apartment, but speaking to no one. But she was carefully nursed, and gradually grew stronger and better, and one morning asked where she was. The good woman who attended her, told her kindly that she was at the house of Farmer Ward, and that they had found her, in the gray light of early morning, lying like one dead, at their gate, and had taken her in and nursed her, in their godlike charity, nor asked who she was nor whither she came. And Ruth, gently detaining the kind hand that smoothed her hair, laid her cheek softly upon it, with a caressing motion, while her grateful tears moistened the brown fingers. Then she asked for her baby, and as gently as possible, good Mrs. Ward told her that it was dead—that it had never breathed. A spasm of pain crossed her face, ere she hid it for an instant, but the next moment she murmured: "God's will be done—it is better so." And thinking it right, she gave her kind nurse and hostess her confidence, and the good woman wept with her.

"I can never go back to him," Ruth said, firmly, as she finished her story. "And now will you help me to find a way in which I can support myself?"

Mrs. Ward, her kind heart filled with sympathy for her pale, young guest, took the matter in hand, and by the time Ruth was able to travel, she had procured her a situation as teacher, in a small town a few miles distant. With the good woman's assistance, she went thither, and commenced her new life. She met with trials at first, but she found friends, and made herself a home among them. Her scholars grew to love her devotedly, and gradually her life became comparatively peaceful and easy. Seeing daily her sweet, cheerful face, none dreamed of the passionate tears she shed in the still darkness of night, over her ruined hopes, or how she grieved over a little blossom that had been plucked from her baby's grave and sent her.

She was sitting alone in her chamber, some two years after her entrance into the place, and busied with her sewing, when the door was opened and her landlady entered.

"Miss Linly," said the good woman. (Ruth had taken her maiden name.) "I wish you would put down that sewing and take a little rest. You have worked on it steadily all day. What in the world is it?"

"A frock for Widow Halden's little boy," replied Ruth, holding it up. "I am indeed very tired, but must work a while longer, for it is to be Willie's birthday present, and I must carry it to him in the morning."

"Well, I wouldn't kill myself 'pears to me," said little Mrs. Hall, energetically. "Come, put it away, and I will help you finish it in the morning. I want you to go to the lecture with husband and me, this evening."

After some inducement Ruth was persuaded to put her work aside, and accompany the kind people who had sought her pleasure. Half an hour afterwards they entered the hall, which was densely crowded. When she was seated, Ruth looked around. Everybody appeared very much excited and animated, and from the throng rose the murmur of hundreds of voices.

"Who was the lecturer? Why were the people so excited?" she wonderingly asked of her companions.

"The speaker was a very popular temperance lecturer. Vane was his name," Mr. Hall replied, and then turned away to speak to a friend. Ruth turned deathly white, while her heart bounded wildly. She did not dare to think. The lights danced before her eyes, and her brain whirled giddily. She felt, for she could not raise her eyes, that two figures were advancing to the front of the platform, and then she heard the voice of an old resident of the place, a clergyman, introducing the speaker to the audience.

"Mr. Richard Vane."

She heard those words, and those only. To her the hall suddenly became dark, and she sank back heavily in her seat. No one noticed her, for the clear, fine tones of the speaker suddenly broke the silence, and the great crowd was as still as if in a death trance. When she realized her situation, again, the hall was quite still. The lecturer had ceased speaking, and stood erect upon the platform; before the worshipping crowd, while all around her were the faces of weeping men and women. She rose from her seat and tottered dizzily forward.

Richard Vane looked up suddenly, with a thrilling heart. Beside him, and before the wondering throng of people, stood a slender figure with pale, upraised face. An instant more, and he opened his arms, and sobbing, Ruth flung herself upon her husband's breast.

For a moment the astonished crowd was silent, but when they comprehended the scene, they burst into a round of cheers that made the building tremble. Suddenly an aged clergyman with flowing white hair, stepped forward, and when the people stayed their huzzas, he laid his trembling hands upon the bowed heads of the reunited couple, and said, solemnly:

"Those whom God has joined together, let not wine put asunder."

FAREWELL.

Farewell! but never from my heart
Shall time thine image blot:
The dreams of other days depart,
Thou shalt not be forgot.

And never in the suppliant sigh,
Poured forth to Him who rules the sky,
Shall my own name be breathed on high,
And thine remembered not.—ANONYMOUS.

TO CARRIE.

BY ADKLE.

I ask for thee a gem more rare
Than those in famed Golconda's mine;
'Tis not to sparkle in thy hair,
Or on thy stainless breast to shine.
Ah, no, 'tis not for outward show,
This precious jewel I would crave;
It is to keep thy spirit pure,
And from all inward ill to save!

A mother's is the purest love
The human heart can ever know;
May she be spared to shield thy youth,
May God this priceless boon bestow!
She'll teach thy footsteps e'er to tread
Within the path that Jesus trod:
O, mayst thou feel the matchless power
Of Jesus' love—beloved of God!

WILDMOSS HEATH:

—OR,—

THE MAGISTRATE'S DAUGHTER.

BY HARRY HAREWOOD LEECH.

CHAPTER I.

THE CABIN ON THE HEATH.

THE wind moaned dismally over Wildmoor Heath—moaningly, wailingly, scattering the loose leaves about among the tangled gorse, and then sending them in fantastic clouds over the dreary common. It was a lonely spot right there, with but few of the paths beaten which led among the prickly shrubs unevenly winding to the little hamlet but dimly seen beyond, nestling upon the side of the hill; and one unacquainted with the paths, where frequently the tangled grasses had grown over them, would have found much difficulty in reaching Woodheath, as the village beyond was called.

As far as the eye could reach upon this lonely common, a picture of strange desolation met the view, perhaps the more noticeable from the fact of the cosy village being directly in sight, with its busy sounds carried directly over the moor as evening closed and the lights began to flash forth from more than one of the hillside cottages, over the thousand acres of flat lowlands lying contiguous to the village, with their level surface covered with scrub brush, tangled vines, and crisp gorse.

There was but one building upon the whole of Wildmoor Heath, and that could scarcely be dignified by that name. It was a cabin, only one story high, and built in a hollow of the Heath; its roof was thatched with straw, moss, and a singular combination of twigs and dried brush, while upon each side of this primitive structure were erected sheds, which were scarcely in better condition than their more imposing companion, and which now shook and trembled as the force of the wind took them, as it reached their frail sides with its gathering strength, and made them totter, as though about to fall.

Old "Boss" Cranmere, as he was called, lived here with his aged wife, and we must now introduce the reader to them, as they sat before the fire in their hovel, and give some notice of their curious lives and history; that is, as much as we know of it, but which we can promise is in the the main correct.

Old Boss Cranmere had not always inhabited this desolate looking cottage, nor had he always lived on the dreary heath, but there had been a time when he was young and strong and hopeful, although it would be difficult to find any relics of either his youth or strength or hope, as he sat doubled up before the blazing twigs, uttering querulous complaints to the bent crone, his wife, at his side. There had been a time when old "Boss" Cranmere was "Richard Cranmere, Superintendent of Woodheath Factory,"—but O, that was so long ago, it is bewildering to think of it. There had been a time when his wife was blooming and fair, and proud as the superintendent's wife, when she stiffened out her neat gingham gown and shook her brown curls archly, as the secretary of the corporation came "all the way up fro' Lunnon" to look after the accounts and moneys—but that, too, was so many years ago that we almost question if the dame herself could recollect it now.

Ah well! sorrow and misfortune will follow the best of us through this life, and to be sure, Richard Cranmere and his wife had their share, and had Richard been one of those tough, strong-willed creatures, who seem to pluck up more courage as troubles thicken around them, who knows but what he might have been "Boss" Cranmere at the factory at Woodheath, instead of a shivering old man, nursing his thin shanks and abusing his "gude wife" before the fireplace in this hovel on Wildmoor Heath? But Dick was not able to cope with his troubles, especially when he was accused of using some of the factory's money by that secretary who everybody said was a "snivelling sneak," and who believed it was only done because Dame Cranmere would always box his ears and tell he husband when the aforesaid sneak attempted to kiss her. However, Dick received notice to appear at the corporation's office in London, and although he made things straight about the money, his troubles upset him so, that he tried to forget them in a way that many a better soul has tried before now—that was, by frequenting the village beer-shop a little too often. The consequence was that Dick Cranmere was discharged from his situation, and went rapidly down hill from bad to worse. And it was doubly hard now, for their two children, a boy and a girl, had to be taken care of.

It would be useless to follow step by step Dick's downfall. It was but the history which, alas, we are all acquainted with—first, misfortune, then rum, then ruin!—and notwithstanding his poor wife slaved to keep things from going to pieces, and to clothe her poor little Rob and Kitty comfortably and decently, things did go to pieces after all, and Rob and Kitty went in rags. First, Boss worked in the mill, then he hired out for a year in the uplands, then he cut down wood, then went to join fishing, and some said smuggling parties on the coast, and at last, as the “childer” grew up, Bob, a remarkably handsome, dark-browed lad, and Kitty, a blithesome, golden-haired little witch, the Boss had sunk so low that none would employ him, and he became a vagrant and a wanderer. Alas! what a fearful power one man has to drag a whole family into wretchedness.

But the worst blow of all was yet to fall. Yes, the worst. When Rob Cranmere was about fourteen years of age, he ran away from his home of sorrow and strife, and shipped. Nothing had been heard of him from that time, and the old man seemed to sink deeper and deeper into the dark gulf of misery, and his wife became a sorrowing, stricken woman. Their sole comfort now was their daughter; we might almost say their sole support; and as each summer passed over the head of Kitty Cranmere, she became more beautiful; but as it seemed, the sole link which bound them to the earth, or to the slightest of earth's blessings was to be severed. So it happened that when their daughter reached the age of sixteen, and was beautiful as an angel,—yes, and might have been the angel to have reclaimed her parents from the sins and weaknesses of the dark past, she fled from her home with an itinerant player, a man of notorious bad character, and she was lost—lost to them forever.

It was five years this very night, since their daughter had fled from Woodheath, and as each year passed, old Boss Cranmere got deeper and deeper into the quagmire of trouble and poverty, until now the hovel on the heath was their home, and what coarse food they ate was hardly earned by what assistance old Cranmere could render the fishermen upon the coast, which was distant about two miles. Upon this dismal autumn evening the unfortunate couple had broken their loaf of common brown bread and supped their allowance of goat's milk, and were huddled closely by the fire, which shed but a feeble glow of light over the ricketty table in the room, and the rough stools upon which they were seated—Boss and his wife—their poorly clad forms shivering once in a while, as the strong, searching blast found entrance in a hundred chinks of the crazy old hut.

The old man seemed to be lost in thought, and passed his bony, skinny hands in an agitated, nervous way over his haggard features and across the stubbled gray beard which had been allowed to grow upon his face; and his wife rocked back and forth before the fire, sighing fretfully, and drawing an old worn pea-jacket tightly around her narrow shoulders. At last Boss spoke—his voice was cracked and husky: “Know'st what day 'tis, an' noight, ole woman?” he asked.

“Nay, Oi doant, nor care. One day's as bad's anither wi' us. Oi kenna tak toime to reckon our trouble by t' munt, nor t' hour,” was the reply, in a complaining tone.

“Nay, nay, ole woman, thee wouldst na' be sulky if ye reckon 'tis five years gone this moanin', windy noight, when Kitty left us—”

“Ah, Kitty—Kitty!” sobbed the old woman, rocking herself more violently, and the tears trickling down her wasted, wrinkled features. Ah! 'tis a very sad sight to see the aged weeping, for we all feel powerless to comfort such grief.

“Kitty! Kitty!” murmured the old man, in woful accents, as he gazed steadily into the fire.

“Five years this noight! Ah, Kitty, Kitty, darlin', ye've broke yer poor mither's heart!”

“What a comfort to ha' her wi' us now,” soliloquized Boss, as if not hearing what his wife was saying.

“She'll ne'er cum back t' Woodheath, Richard, ne'er. Ye druv her awa' wi' yer blows an' drunken curses, an' it sarved ye roight that she fled awa'—it sarved ye roight.” And the wife poured out her plaint bitterly to the old man. He did not resent it now in words, he seemed to feel how true was her accusation; but when she spoke the last syllable, he put forth his bony hand and laid it upon her lap, and said, in a broken voice:

“Doan't, doan't, wife. God knows Oi've been a curse foriver, an' cramped yer gude workin' hands, an' 'bittered yer ole loife, an' may-be, may-be sent the boy—Reb-awa' to his death, but doan't say her too—her—"

And he gulped the last syllable out while his voice was choked with sobs. Poor Boss, those tears must have washed out many of your crimes in the sight of merciful Heaven! But the moment his tears began to flow, his wife pressed his hard hands within her own, and she wept more freely to think her hard, bitter words had given her "ole man" pain. And while thus they were consoling each other, and those tears of penitence were flowing, the old man whispered to his wife:

"If this ole body was only young agin."

And she sighed deeply. "Yes, daddy, only young agin."

And how many, looking through the dark years of a misspent life, utter in agony of soul, "Only young again! Only young again!"

The wind was wailing mournfully as ever, the dry chips and twigs were sent like miniature battering-rams against the sides of the little cabin, and in the lull the heavy surging and dull roaring of the sea could be heard from afar. The old couple sat there before the dying embers, nursing in fancy all the thoughts which sweetly clustered around their straying daughter, picturing her as she was in her blitheome, happy childhood, her glowing, blushing, dangerous maidenhood—when her beauty met the eye of him who allured her from her home, if not of plenty and happiness, at least of honor. Every little expression of hers, her bright, saucy words, merry laugh and springing step was well remembered—ah, so well remembered! It was not strange they spoke not.

The wind swept over Wildmoor Heath with greater fury, and seemed to meet midway a tempest gale from the sea, which hurled it back again to surge and sigh and break in a dirge-like chorus around the cabin of Boss Cranmere, and when it lulled it only seemed to gather strength and sweep around the hut with the whirl and sound of mighty demons. It was a dreadful night; but the occupants of the cabin, immersed as they were in their deep grief, did not seem to hear the mighty troubled sighs; but soon they would be brought to a recollection of the storm. For during a lull, when one of those brief delays and calmness occurs in gales, which is to be succeeded by the fury of the gathering wind, there came a wailing, beseeching cry from out the depths of the storm to Boss Cranmere and his wife, as they sat there in the rapidly dimming light—a cry which seemed to come from a human being in great distress, piercing in its anguish, despairing in its energy, as though a last effort should be made to procure help for the dying.

As quickly as though youthful blood still bounded in their veins, Boss and his wife rose up from their places when they heard that cry. They instinctively looked at each other, and the woman's hand was clasped more tightly in the man's horny palm, listening eagerly for that sound, that startling cry to be again uttered, but the wind sobbed on, its cadences were broken, but no cry of a perishing soul was heard.

"Didst hear the voice, wife?" asked Boss.

"Plain as I see thee, daddy, but it could na' ha' been—"

"It wur Kitty's cry, wife, or her sperrit ha' called to us, but Oi wull gwa out and scour t' heath a bit," interrupted the old man, solemnly, as he strode towards the door.

He reached the door, but scarcely had he touched the wooden latch, ere the force of the wind drove it back against the rude partition with a bang, and the same cry near at hand saluted the twain. But the cry was feeble, and seemed struggling to gasp forth its wail above the rushing wind. In a moment Boss was out in the darkness. It had now begun to rain, and he was soon lost to the old woman, who stood pale and trembling in the doorway, but she sunk down to the floor almost fainting, as Boss Cranmere dragged a form into the cabin and up to the fireplace. But no sooner had the old woman gazed upon the dripping figure, with the long, golden hair hanging in a dank mass over her face, and beheld the thin features so well known, than she almost shrieked:

"Kitty, my chile! O, Kitty!" And threw her old arms around the fainting form.

But there was a feeble cry, an infant's voice, from beneath the old cloak enveloping her, and the poor young mother could only gasp:

"Fayther!"—than she swooned exhausted on the floor of Boss Cranmere's cabin.

CHAPTER II.

THE CRUEL MAGISTRATE.

THE spacious mansion of Mr. Hugh Hardcastle was situated in the most elegant part of Woodheath, and Mr. Hugh Hardcastle himself was considered the most wealthy gentleman in all those parts, but candor compels us to state that the real character of Mr. Hugh Hardcastle, Gentleman and Magistrate, was a compound of meanness, pomposity and petty arrogance. He was overbearing in his habits, and having sprung from a very low station in life, was of course very proud, and held up his head above the old gentry of the uplands, whose families were centuries old. He, supposing with a plebeian's weakness, that pounds, shillings and pence were the only criteria by which real excellence should be judged. Had his ignorance and foolish pride of purse been confined within such limits that there would have been no danger of injury or oppression to the body politic, we should have had no occasion to immortalize Mr. Hugh Hardcastle, by a mention in these columns of his name, but unfortunately he was a magistrate, and his power was often arbitrarily exercised for the oppression of those whom the strong arm of the law should have protected. Mr. Hugh Hardcastle was proud of his name, proud of his estates, and especially proud of his beautiful and queenly daughter Edith Hardcastle.

And this last pride was certainly excusable, for none about Woodheath disputed the claims of the little peacock beauty, Edith Hardcastle to the rank of belle. She was but seventeen, and already her black eyes had made captive all the youth of the village, and the little syren knew so well how to practise her arts, that she left all hoping and despairing in the same hour by her piquant coquetry. She was almost mistress of her father's household, owing to the fact of her mother's being an invalid and scarcely ever leaving her own rooms, and she made as many enemies of the servants by her childish absolutism as friends amongst them by her generous freaks. But it was chiefly upon her father that her influence was most perceptible. That pompous, arrogant mass of ignorance and pride melted down beneath the softening influence of the child, into a very commonplace, doting, affectionate father, who could deny his little pet nothing which his money or his influence could procure for her. He might come into his library from his "Hall of Justice," as he termed a room set apart for his magisterial sittings, angry and inflamed from the brave impudence of some smuggler whom he had just sentenced, and in a moment find he had forgotten his trials by laughing heartily at some hoydenish freak of his daughter Edith.

The love for his daughter was the one redeeming trait in the character of Hugh Hardcastle, for the whole country round he was detested for his hatred of the people, and his undue severity upon any of the working-class when brought before him.

About two mornings after the return of Kitty Cranmere to the hovel on the heath, which we have described to our readers in the last chapter, Hugh Hardcastle was holding his magistrate's court in his private "Hall of Justice," and there was a motley crowd at the trial,—and we grieve to write it—but Kitty Cranmere was the prisoner at the bar, and she was accused of stealing the old cloak which had encircled her wasted form upon that bitter night on the moor; and she was also accused of stealing some silver pieces from an old woman who had harbored her in Woodheath, the day before she returned to her sorrowing parents.

It formed a strange picture—Hugh Hardcastle sitting, fat and powerful on his stuffed chair, behind his ominous desk, whereon were the dockets, various loose papers, a constable's mace, and a few thumbled law books. A brutal-looking fellow, gaunt and muscular, with hair cropped close, and quick ferret eyes, jerking and glancing quick fire over the muttering crowd around the frail prisoner, was the constable who had made the arrest at Boss Cranmere's, on Wildmoor Heath. Kitty, leaning upon a little railing in front of the magistrate's desk, looking as though she would faint each instant, while her poor old mother was huddled upon the floor at her feet, holding her baby tightly in her old arms, and rocking backwards and forwards, moaning mournfully and brokenly. By his daughter's side stood old Boss Cranmere, and many a lusty man whose checked shirt was rolled up over a brawny arm looked pityingly on the broken old man whom they recollected when they were little factory boys as "Superintendent Cranmere."

Boss stood by Kitty, his arms hanging down by his side and his hands tightly clenched; his tearless eyes upon the ground, and ever and anon his lips would quiver, his whole frame would shake, and then people knew how old Boss was taking it. Around this sad group the factory men and boys were standing with eager faces, gazing upon the hard eyes and firm mouth of the magistrate, while the mill girls with sad, pale faces and dye-stained arms, who mingled with the curious crowd in the background, murmured many a heartfelt, "God help her, puir thing!"

"Silence! Call the witness," was the order in an impatient tone from Hugh Hardcastle.

An old woman came forward, who identified Kitty as the young woman who had come to her house three nights before, and who looked so thin and pale, and seemed so tired with her crying infant, that she let her stop there. The next evening she missed her when she came home "fro' t' mill, and wi' her t' silver i' t' bag in t' cupboard."

Poor Kitty hung her head. Alas! she was guilty! She was dying, and anxious to reach her parents' home, were that even a hovel—she took the money to buy her starving infant nourishment, and took the cloak to wrap around its shivering form. But what had the law to do with a starving creature? She must suffer!—The constable testified to the arrest on Wildmoor Heath, and that Kitty had confessed her crime to him when he took her in charge. The lines grew firmer around Hugh Hardcastle's mouth, the dark gray eyes shot out a colder light upon the feeble prisoner, the wailing of the old mother was more frequent and painful to hear.

"What have you to say, Kitty Cranmere?" asked the magistrate.

"O nothin' yer honor, on'y Oi wur starvin'," she stammered forth, her weak voice musical even with her sobs.

"Ha! always the excuse of you beggars and strollers. Do ye think ye are to be let off wi' that excuse here?"

God help her, if she ever thought to be let off from the cruel grip of such a merciless justice!

"Nay, nay," was her answer. "But, O, yer honor"—and she knelt over to him across the railings with her thin hands clasped when she said it—"t' little baby wur starvin' an' perishin' wi, t' cold, an' I took it t' save its life, pair child, for Oi doan't care for moine Oi knows." And she sunk upon the railing's broad top weeping hysterically.

Here, a dusty-looking man stepped forward from the crowd and addressed the magistrate.

"Yes, yer honor, it be true what the choild says; she bo't t' bread wi' t' money."

"Stand back! Who asked for your testimony, William Croes?" angrily spoke Hugh Hardcastle, a heavy frown distorting his features. And the burly, honest baker slunk abashed into the crowd, and the brows of more than one of those working-men grew black.

"O, Mr. Hardcastle, spare the child! Spare Kitty for on'y once, yer honor! She wur starvin'. Did na' ye hear the choild?" And old Boss stretched forth his thin, bony hands to the magistrate, supplicating him for mercy.

"Silence, I say!" thundered Hardcastle. "Take that old beggar out, officer!"

And the constable laid hold of old Boss, and notwithstanding his struggles, dragged him through the threatening crowd towards the door, the old woman his wife shrieking in her shrill tones, and poor Kitty feebly beseeching them to spare the old man. But the brutal officer dragged him along as though he was some animal about being led to the slaughter. They had nearly reached the door, Hugh Hardcastle watching the ejection with an ominous satisfaction, when there was a great stir about the back of the crowd. An athletic young man pushed the people from each side of him as though he was walking through water, the element dividing as he advanced. He neared the old man who was choking in the constable's brutal grasp. Old Boss saw him coming and faltered out his name—

"Rob—"

"Fayther!" cried the handsome youth, as he sprang towards him, the sympathetic crowd making way rapidly. With one blow, which descended with the dull sound of the huge hammer upon piles, the constable was felled like an ox bleeding to the earth, and old Boss Cranmere was locked in his son Rob's arms, while the people murmured a sort of subdued applause. Hugh Hardcastle jumped from his seat, the whole ferocity of his nature exhibited in his face, which was black with passion.

"Arrest that man!"

Not a soul in that room stirred to execute his order, but as he jumped into the crowd to execute it himself, the men sullenly formed a line in front, and Rob Cranmere led his old father out of the door; but before he went, he turned towards the magistrate and shouted defiance to him, as he said:

"Hugh Hardcastle, if ye hurt a hair of moi sister's head, Oi will be revenged upon you—Oi will, as sure as there's a God in heaven!"

"Arrest that man, some of ye! Twenty pounds for his body!" the magistrate shouted, as he tried to make his way through the solid crowd. But as the men now gave way, and clustered around the stunned constable, Rob and his father had gone, and the pleading eyes of his daughter Edith looked into those of Hugh Hardcastle. She had entered by a side door upon hearing the tumult, and now clung around his neck. His face softened; but when she urged:

"Let her go, dear father—let the poor woman go this once."

"No—by Heaven, no!" he replied, hoarse with passion. "And ye shall all pay for this, ye skulking hounds, to brave the law and allow a man to escape. And the beggar, the thief, shall be sent to prison this hour—this moment!"

He went up to where she lay. The old woman had thrown herself upon the body of her child, and was wailing loudly. Alas, she was dead! Poor Kitty Cranmere! these last scenes had been too much for her, the tension was too great upon the cords of life, and they had snapped—poor Kitty!

CHAPTER III.

CONFESSIONS.—AN ELOPEMENT.

THE little hovel stood no longer on Wildmoor Heath, the long, coarse grass was growing up through the cracks of the boards which tumbled upon that spot where the cabin stood, the toads hopped under the shelter of the ruins, and snails fattened in the dampness underneath the crumbling logs. It was a beautiful night some six months after the occurrences we have narrated, when a man made his way from the coast towards the ruined cabin, and the figure of a woman attended by a companion, sought the same direction from Woodheath. It may be strange to tell it, dear reader, but life's realities are often very strange, and that man approaching the hut was Rob Cranmere, who was coming to meet his love, Edith Hardcastle. Nay, start not, if it be a strange fact, and a most strange trysting-place. The history of that love's awakening would take up a greater space than we have at our command, so a synopsis of the events which led to this meeting must suffice.

After the death of poor Kitty Cranmere in the house of Hugh Hardcastle, old Boss Cranmere and his wife disappeared from the neighborhood entirely, and it was supposed they had been taken away and provided for by Rob, and the painful circumstances almost died out from the minds of all the witnesses of that dreadful occurrence, until at length Rob showed himself in Woodheath boldly and defiantly, seemed to have plenty of money, dressed well, and was soon on the best of terms with everybody.

Edith Hardcastle, the spoiled pet and vain beauty, rode often out upon horseback, sometimes far amongst the hills back of Woodheath. Usually she was accompanied by a servant, but sometimes her caprice would decide that she should be left at home. Upon one of these lonely excursions the handsome Rob met her when she was in considerable danger from her horse becoming frightened, and rescued her from great peril. Struck with the romance of her situation, and perhaps her giddy head being turned by Rob's beauty, she took it into her head to encourage this piece of wandering humanity to make love to her; which was done so perfectly, that she found her happiness involved in the consent of her proud father to her marriage, and which, knowing it to be impossible that such consent would ever be given, led to many sweet, stolen interviews of which the present could be counted as one.

Upon this particular occasion, it was decided that Edith was to request the consent of her parent to her marriage with Rob—which, upon his refusal, was to be followed by an elopement. The foolish girl, mildly in love with the adventurous Cranmere, considered that her father's overweening affection for her would in a short time secure her pardon. And she looked forth to the future hopefully, when her lover pressed his farewell kisses upon her lips that night by the old cabin ruin.

The next day she clung around her father's neck, beguiling him into a tender mood, when she intended speaking to him of her darling life-project.

"Father, dear, your little Edith is a woman now, you know. You must not call me your 'little fairy' now, for see, I lack but little of your own height," laughed she gaily, and with charming audacity.

"Well, what does the woman want now, that has ever been denied to the 'little fairy'?" he asked, "for I am sure you are about begging something very expensive of me. Come, come, what is it?" And he twined her long, rich hair over his heavy fingers caressingly.

"Yes, dear father, it is a very expensive gift I want. Will you promise not to be angry when I tell you what it is?"

"No, no. What is it?"

"A husband," she whispered, softly, in his ear. Had an earthquake suddenly shook the mansion to its foundation, Hugh Hardcastle could scarcely have seemed more surprised. But he managed to stammer forth: "A what?"

"Husband," confidently, on the part of his darling Edith.

A smile lingered around the mouth of the grim magistrate now, for he thought he perceived which way his daughter's thoughts had been wandering; he thought of young Guy Laskervale, whom he considered had been paying some attention to his daughter, and he fancied he was about to have a confidential communication upon the state of his daughter's preferences.

"Well, who shall it be?" he said.

"Promise not to be angry," with her finger up warningly to him.

"O yes. Go on," he said, impatiently, and wondering at so much mystery.

"Rob Cranmere!"

Her father gave her one startled look, to see if this was not a playful jest; then, when he saw her earnest eyes awaiting his answer, the blood rushed from his face leaving it pale as ashes, and every muscle of his hard countenance seemed to grow rigid as iron.

"Edith, answer me, what do ye mean?"

His voice was calm, with a sort of deadly calmness though, and she felt now what a dreadful ordeal she would have to pass through. But when a woman loves, she is willing to suffer for that one upon whom she has placed her affections, and Edith's love had rapidly developed what of her father's strength of nature she possessed.

So through her tears she confessed her love for Rob Cranmere—how they had met; how good and noble and kind he was—his only drawback was his poverty—ah, that was a crime in her noble father's eyes—how she had sworn to be his wife come good or evil, etc.

It was strange that such a towering rage as Hugh Hardcastle was in, he should have listened to the end of her recital; but he did. When she had finished, he threw her from him as though she was a viper and had stung him. O, little did poor Edith know the power of her father's scathing words until that moment, little did she guess the bitter curses which would be launched upon her head.

"Marry him—marry him, if ye like, and ye can both rot in poverty together. Nay, I will not even let you marry, for I would strangle you first, and cut out his black heart besides! For shame, ye minion, to go out o' nights to meet a smuggling scoundrel, and then dare whisper his name in my ears, to bring him here as your husband!" And he sunk upon a chair almost exhausted by his fury, while poor Edith could only cry:

"O, I father, father, do not curse me! I cannot bear it—O, I cannot!"

And then his scathing words would be poured forth faster and faster upon her, until she could bear no more, and fell fainting, while he strode from the room, still fuming and cursing.

The next day Edith Hardcastle escaped from her father's house and joined Rob Cranmere. Then Woodheath was alive, the country was scoured for miles around to get a trace of the fugitives, but no sign of their flight was visible. The ocean leaves no mark whereby pursuit can be successful.

Now was the change visible in Hugh Hardcastle. It would have been good for him could he have shed a tear. No, his eyes were dry—but O, how his heart was overflowing with the bitter waters of the worst affliction. However much a man of iron Hugh Hardcastle had been in dealing with the world, he had ever been gentle with her. The softest down was too hard for her dainty, childish form to repose upon; the richest silks, with matchless rainbow colors, were all too harsh and colorless to envelope her dear shape; the warmest, glossiest furs were all too scant and cold to keep the chill winds from her dear body.

No, no, you had been a hard man to all the world beside, but to her—to her— Might not this be Heaven's retribution, Hugh Hardcastle? Do you remember the poor, crushed girl who plead to thee for mercy in vain—poor Kitty Cranmere, who only stole the warmth of an old cloak, and kept the wolf away a few hours by the larceny of the money to buy a loaf of bread? Might it not be retribution? Think of it! But there was a heavier blow yet to fall. Yes, Heaven is often severe, but (we have that sweet faith) just—always just.

Six years had passed since the flight of Edith Hardcastle from her father's house—nearly seven years since the death of poor suffering Kitty Cranmere. Hugh Hardcastle was still magistrate at Woodheath, but he was a broken-spirited man, infirm in health, but colder, harder and more unpopular than when we knew him to sit in his "Hall of Justice." There was no execration too heavy to pour upon the head of the magistrate by the poor denizens of Woodheath. But his wealth kept him in his position, and still he seemed to take a savage delight in the misery of his fellows. Every man who was brought before him was haunted like a guilty being, until (as in a majority of cases) he was proven so. He seemed to look upon all the world as natural enemies, and he sat in his room like a hungry wolf in a den, anxious to give a fatal bag to any victims who might venture within the dangerous precincts.

Hugh Hardcastle was now, this warm day in the latter part of August, called into his office to try a band of gipseys, and put them out of the way of committing further thefts and annoyances upon the good people of Woodheath and its vicinity. There were several women huddled together, their dusky beauty set off by gaily-colored dresses, and quantities of common jewelry upon their persons, while the dark-browed, thick-set men awaited their fate with that unconcern which characterizes all of the wandering tribes. This band had come down from the hills amongst the lowlands, and the beauty of the women, and skilful jugglery of the men had made them quite popular, until they began to steal and drink, making "the night hideous" with their drunken brawls, and thus the aid of the constables had been at last invoked to get the entire band up before Hugh Hardcastle, who, the people were convinced, would soon remove them out of the neighborhood. The charges against them were vagrancy and theft. All of the cases had been disposed of, with the exception of a couple of the men and one woman, who sat cowering in the corner, and with whom a swarthy, ill-looking man seemed to be expostulating. This woman was charged with arson, and the magistrate told her to "stand up."

The woman tottered forward toward the desk, a sort of ragged cloak thrown over her shoulders and head. The witness gave in his evidence to the magistrate, who listened attentively to the recital. He accused the prisoner with setting fire to his shedding, because he would not allow her to tell his fortune, and refused to "cross her palm with silver," and concluded by saying he did not wish any harm to the poor creature, who really seemed civil enough, only he did not wish to be troubled with them any longer tramping through his property.

"Take those rags off your face, woman!" sternly ordered the justice, when the complainant's recital was finished.

There was no answer. The woman seemed to be trembling and sobbing, but she made no motion to obey the order of the magistrate.

"Do you hear?" he repeated sternly.

The woman made two or three attempts to pull away the faded covering, and at last seemed to accomplish it by a desperate jerk. And when she removed it, her head fell upon her breast and tears flowed thick and fast and fell upon the floor. The other women and the men were now gathered around, and one of the men who had been remonstrating with her in the corner, plucked her sleeve and whispered threateningly:

"You're a fool! Speak, I say, or ye'll rue it."

"What is your name?" asked the justice.

"You'll never know it," replied the woman, between her sobs.

Hugh Hardcastle arose, his anger was getting aroused—he was impatient.

"Raise up your head, will you, you strolling thief! Don't act your modesty here, it won't save ye, depend on that!"

And with these hard words the woman lifted up her head as though his cruelty had stung her, lifted up her head quickly, proudly, and she blushed deeply. You could see it, though her skin was painted and stained, but the cheating juice of the walnut had not robbed her flesh of all its pearly whiteness. The woman was young and might have been very handsome, but the features looked hard and pinched, and the eyes had an uneasy glitter in them which robbed them of half their beauty.

"Give me your name!" again demanded the justice, peremptorily.

"Corilla," she answered.

"None of your gipsy aliases, I say. Give me your name."

"Edith."

Ah, how Hugh Hardcastle trembled when that name was pronounced! His violence had all left him; he sank into his seat trembling, while the woman had to be supported by one of her companions.

"Edith!" said Hugh Hardcastle. It sounded like a hollow echo of her own pronunciation.

"Yes, Edith Hardcastle my name was before I left your house, father!" And the woman now burst up to the railing to meet the startled gaze of the magistrate.

He but looked into the face of the woman before him, a mighty groan escaped from him, and he fell back as one dead, the blood streaming from his mouth, and rapidly crimsoning his linen and clothes. The shock had been too great. Edith Hardcastle returned, but how? A wandering gipsy branded as a thief. The magistrate had burst a blood-vessel, and before assistance reached him he was dead.

Kitty Cranmere, was not this retribution?

And this is the story which is yet told at Woodheath about the poor people who lived on Wildmoss Moor, and the sad history of Edith Hardcastle. But what became of her, poor gipsy Edith? None ever knew after her father's death where she wandered, or how she died.

A MARRIAGE DILEMMA.

Some short time back a gentleman was united to a lovely and accomplished lady at a village near Cambridge (Eng.) All passed off pleasantly enough—the bride and bridegroom were on their wedding tour, when, mirabile dictu! it was discovered that the marriage had been an illegal one, and that the clergyman was probably liable to severe penalties for performing the ceremony. The bridegroom had never thought of providing a license, the clergyman never thought to inquire for it. So here were two persons married without either bans or license, and entirely contrary to the statute in that case made and provided. Here was a dilemma! What was to be done? At the end of three days a special messenger was sent after the happy couple. Their wedding tour was arrested, and back they were brought, when the ceremony was again performed in the presence of the important little document, the absence of which had been productive of much mischief, and the travellers resumed their tour, their sudden and unexpected return being known to very few persons. ~~Notwithstanding the false~~ start, let us hope that the journey through life may be a pleasant one.—Cambridge Independent.

TEMPER AND THE VOICE.

The influence of temper upon tone deserves much consideration. Habits of querulousness or ill-nature will communicate a catlike quality to the singing, as infallibly as they give a quality to the speaking voice. That there really exist amiable tones, is not an unfounded opinion. In the voice there is no deception; it is to many the index of the mind, denoting moral qualities; and it may be remarked that the low, soft tones of gentle and amiable beings, whatever their musical endowments may be, seldom fail to please; besides which, the singing of ladies indicates the cultivation of their taste generally, and the embellishment of their mind.—Mordaunt.

UNDER THE LEAVES.

BY ALBERT LARINGTON.

Of have I walked these woodland paths,
Without the blest foreknowing
That underneath the withered leaves
The fairest buds were growing.

To-day the south wind sweeps away
The types of autumn's splendor,
And shows the sweet arbutus flowers—
Spring's children, pure and tender.

O prophet souls, with lips of bloom,
Outvying in their beauty
The pearly tints of ocean shells,
Ye teach me faith and duty!

Walk life's dark ways, ye seem to say,
With love's divine foreknowing
That where man sees but withered leaves,
God sees the sweet flowers growing.

THE REDEEMED.

BY ETTA WESTON.

"Yes, Marion, though he had sounded the lowest depths of sin, if a kindly voice and a friendly hand could call him back to manliness and truth, mine should not be withheld."

"Even if the touch should bring pollution?"

"That only can pollute which defiles the soul."

"So yours should be the hand and voice to welcome back this devotee of sin, though all the world should scorn such voluntary contamination? What if by this ultra benevolence of yours, Edith, character and friends be lost?"

"What if a deathless human soul be lost? Dear Marion, did I know of one human heart, though wretched from its own guilt, and gathering the harvest sown by its own evil ways alone, did that degraded but immortal soul yearn for its lost purity and truth—did it cast one longing glance upward from its depths of misery and crime towards its father's house, my hand should beckon, my voice should cheer, though all the world pass by on the other side."

"And you would sacrifice all this, dear Edith, in the uncertain hope of bringing back perhaps one child of sin—one, the gold of whose better nature is so encrusted by the dross of an erring life, that your highest efforts could only smooth away the canker and the rust, still leaving it embedded hopelessly in the baser metal of habit, and its natural proneness to sin."

"He that sows the diamonds in the solid rock, and scatters the pearls in the depths of the sea, can see the quenchless spark of immortality, though buried in the darkness of human guilt. He who wept tears of blood in the garden of Gethsemane, whose sacred lips gave the divine command, 'Love thy neighbor as thyself,' who promised paradise to the repentant thief, he is my Master, Marion, and has he not said, 'If ye love me keep my commandments?'"

The fair speaker had risen in her earnestness from her seat beside her companion, and turning partly round, revealed to the young man who was standing unnoticed a short distance from them, a face so pure and serene in its expression, that he involuntarily stepped back with an air of reverence and humility, as if some higher presence were suddenly revealed to him. And so indeed it was, for in the little scene with which our story opens, were pictured strangely divergent paths of human life.

The three were whiling away a dull November afternoon in the public picture-gallery of one of our large cities. The faces of this little group were striking in an eminent degree, though as unlike in expression as were their apparent habits of dress and deportment. The two whose voices had arrested the careless steps of him who unknown to them had entered the saloon, were seated before a Magdalen by Guido, and the face, with its wondrous though mournful beauty, had suggested the conversation which the reader has already heard in part.

They were speaking of those erring and forsaken ones, cast out for some discovered guilt, less perhaps, than many a concealed sin still feasting in the heart of some favorite of fortune—and the rules of action toward the outcast and forlorn as prescribed by the two speakers, were as diverse as the faces that were glowing in the earnestness of their animated discussion. The rich tones of Marion Lee, clear, but cold as the false arguments she uttered, pleaded strongly for the dignity of social position—the fear of contamination from contact with the fallen and degraded. And as the picture of their shame rose before her mental eyes, she involuntarily gathered her rich robes about her, and threw back the beautiful head, gazing with a half-derisive smile in the clear eyes of Edith Graham, looking so earnestly in her own.

Edith, with one delicate hand pressed close upon her bosom, as was her wont, the other held lovingly towards her friend, had spoken her allegiance to her Divine Master with a low and earnest emphasis, which told, in the very distinctness of her utterance, the firmness of principle and purpose of one whose hopes and aims go up beyond the stars. Her face was very beautiful. The brow was low, but broad and prominent, and the graceful curve of the white temples harmonized in sweetness and serenity with the firm yet delicate mouth. The eyes, whose wondrous beauty spread a glorious illumination over the whole countenance, were of that undefinable tint that seems to change with every passing thought. The brows and lashes were of jetty blackness, though the hair was of a warm chestnut hue, shining where the light fell across it, like threads of burnished gold. It was drawn smoothly away from the temples, and was woven around the back of the small yet beautifully formed head, in a net-work of rich and massive braids, in strong contrast with the heavy locks that graced like a coronet the white forehead of Marion Lee. A sense of harmony seemed to pervade her whole presence—a completeness of symmetry that was to the eye what melody is to the ear, as if the fullness of her beauty was but the outward correspondence of her inner life.

In strange contrast with the calm serenity of Edith Graham, was the pale, half-averted face of the young man, who stood unnoticed behind them. He had entered with so quiet a step, that his presence was unobserved by the two occupants of the large saloon. Pausing before the "Returning Prodigal," a picture that seemed to possess for him a wonderful fascination, he stood with a sad, despairing gaze, his head slightly bowed, and his arms folded tightly across his breast, and with such an air of sorrowful abstraction, that he seemed utterly unconscious of all surrounding objects. But the tones of Edith Graham, in her plea for the guilty and forlorn, had fallen on his ear like a voice from heaven, and the breathless earnestness with which he listened, told how like food to the famishing were the words of that noble girl.

The face turned so eagerly towards the speaker, far surpassed in its power of fascination the beautiful creations of art that graced the walls around him. But like a cloud darkening some landscape of glorious beauty, there rested on the pale but handsome features a deep and settled gloom. The restlessness of the large and mournful eyes, and the deep lines about the lips, told of familiarity with unhealthy excitement, and long years of dissipation. Yet amid all these marks of evil there was stamped upon the whole countenance a longing, wistful look, mingled with a half-defiant expression, which could not fail to tell the fearful warfare of the soul within. Philip Reide was gifted with wonderful talent, and a noble, but erratic nature, full of impulse and waywardness, such as the world calls genius.

Orphaned in infancy, and the inheritor of vast wealth, his life had been one of self-will and the indulgence of every whim and caprice that so impressive a nature could dictate. A childhood thus sown with the seeds of evil and self-gratification, could not fail to reach a sad fruition in his manhood. Yet through all this, his innate nobility of soul, like pure gold, shone through the dross of habit, and the results of such fearful training in youth. He had early perfected himself by foreign study and close application in his profession as an artist, and in a city remote from that in which our story opens, had won a name honored by those of older and wider reputation. This course was the more laudable, from the fact that it was the gratification of his own elevated aims and inclinations, rather than the necessity of labor, which lent the zeal which had marked his whole career. Gifted with those brilliant powers of fascination which render their possessor so desirable a companion to the devotees of pleasure, he had fallen by slow and almost imperceptible degrees, from his high position, to the terrible destiny of the drunkard.

To those who have watched the fearful progress of these gifted ones through their temptation, who have seen the struggles of the wretched, yet yielding soul; have listened to their solemn pledges in their hours of shame, sorrow and remorse, there is no need to tell the slow misery of years that found Philip Reide where we have presented him to the reader's eye. When the fearful revelation of his bondage broke upon his haughty soul, when he knew it was the smile of a fiend that glowed in the red wine, and could not choose but worship, then began that terrible warfare through which he struggled miserably, hopelessly, through many dreadful years. Lost to his friends, penniless, despairing, without one kindly voice to strengthen him in better moments, meeting the cold, derisive stare of a pitiless world, he was a careless, reckless wanderer. Yet through all his misery and shame, the true refinement of his nature withheld him from those lower vices which are frequently the vile concomitants of the drunkard's course. His was not the constant intoxication of the beastly debauchee, day succeeding day in senseless inebriety, but in an evil hour the dreadful craving would come upon him, to be followed by weeks and months of terrible remorse. It was thus when he had wrestled as for life with the fiend within, when the burning, maddening thirst was haunting his every step, that following his still earnest love for the beautiful, he had hoped to lose his wretched consciousness in the glorious visions of the ideal.

Standing thus before the "Returning Prodigal," all the misery of his fallen soul came crowding before his mental eye like the imagery of some fearful dream. "Forsaken and degraded, alone and tempted"—such was the cry of anguish and desolation that went up from the inner life of Philip Reide. Was it strange then, that the words of Edith Graham held breath and pulses still, or that her face shone like that of an angel? Little dreamed the noble girl, as her rich yet simple robes swept by him, that the thin, haggard face, so near, and yet in truth so far off, would fain have stooped to kiss the hem of her garment. From that time a new light seemed to dawn on Philip Reide, for the desponding heart could see even in the darkest hour of his temptation, when the fiend whispered that despairing heart-cry of years, "Forsaken and degraded, alone and tempted," the calm face of Edith Graham, and hear her earnest tones pleading for the forlorn and sinful—pleading for him, for was he not forlorn indeed? Daily he waited in that public gallery, watching and hoping for her presence. She came frequently and lingered long, passing in and out among the crowd, with a careless, unobtrusive eye, so absorbed was she by her love of art. Remote from her, yet conscious of her every look and motion, Philip Reide would recall again and again, while gazing on her beautiful face, those words of strength and cheer, and though he would have died rather than ask her sympathy, yet the consciousness that her pure lips could pray for such as he, that dearer to her than name or favor were the longings and strong wrestlings of the fallen soul, armed him with a sure defence against the tempter's power.

There were days of agonizing struggles, and nights of weary wrestling with the fiend within. There were times, when battling with all the force of his better nature against the fierce temptation, even beyond the long midnight, when the pulse of the great city grew still, that he had walked to and fro with a weary tread before the home of Edith Graham, watching the lights from its many windows with as strong a gaze as if they were indeed beacons to warn, or rays of glory to illumine the path of him—that lonely traveller who had set his face heavenward, strengthened and sustained by the kindly words of sympathy, uttered and forgotten by one, who like her Divine Master went about doing good. Little dreamed the fair girl in the warm glow of her beautiful home, whose music was the kindly tones of loving hearts, of the wanderer, sorely tempted and beset, so far removed in all the outward life, content to gather strength in the great temptation, from even the consciousness of her near presence.

Those only who have passed from such wretchedness as his, to a reformed and amended life, can tell of the slow torture of months—nay, even years, that lie between that misery and manhood. Strange discipline for a heart starving and pining for some dear companionship, to watch through weary days and months and years, longing, as the desolate soul alone can, for the friendly voice and kindly hand of Edith Graham, ready to go forth in recognition of the returning prodigal, yet in the keen anguish of his sensitive soul waiting still in self-distrust, till the world again should honor his manliness and truth. There were vague, wild hopes in the heart of Philip Reide—wild in truth, for must not months, perhaps years intervene, before he might dare to lift his eyes to hers in mutual recognition?

He knew she had never loved, for with all the keenness of his artist vision, he had read in the calm depths of her beautiful eyes no trace of passion so prone to speak from brow and lip. Her face had been his study. Not a change in its expression but had graven itself upon his memory. Thus passed a twelve-month, and in the elegant habitude of the Public Gallery of B—Street, none would dream of the haggard, wistful face of just one year before. Mingling easily among the crowd, he had gradually come to be regarded as a true lover of art, and his just yet unobtrusive criticism, evincing a highly cultivated taste, had won for him too the reputation of a connoisseur. It would be strange if so striking a face and figure should fall unnoticed on the eye of Edith Graham, but by a singular perversity of either chance or purpose on his part, they had never met, though many a glance of either approval of her own suggestive thoughts, or a questioning look of her beautiful face at some original criticism of his own, told there was a recognition of mutual tastes and appreciation, without the formal words of introduction. More than a year subsequent to the opening of our story the devotees of art were warmed to the height of enthusiasm and curiosity, by the appearance in the favorite gallery of a striking and beautiful painting. It was not the mere depths of its exquisite coloring, or the delicate outlines and grouping of the figures, but the moral of the picture, the deep and fearful allegory that seemed looking out from its every light and shadow, arrested the eye of every truly appreciative taste, as much as its singularity of title; and the wonderful portraiture of its principal figure. On a narrow but soothing stream, whose waters were ragged with locks of foam and boiling whirlpools, rushing madly over quick-sands and between gaping rocks, yet at times swaying with a sleepy and stagnant flow amid rank and noisome weeds, but whose current at last leaped with a quick mad rush of blackness and darkness into a very pit of gloom. At the verge lay a frail and shattered boat, its carved and gilded sides were broken and stained, its rudder gone, oarless and without a sail. Before it and hovering over the cataract that impelled it on from out the clouds and darkness, looked the hideous phantoms of suicide, remorse and despair. On the shores of either side were figures calmly watching the terror-stricken voyager in the wrecked and shattered bark, some coolly calculating with a practised eye the distance between him and destruction; some with their rich robes drawn carefully backward from the brink, lest the foul spray might begrim their garments; some with the hateful laugh of derision; none to help in all that group—none save one. On the farthest point of land that stretched forward, even to the very edge of the precipice, stood a beautiful female crowned with the asphodel, while the purity of her robe in contrast with the black clouds and blacker water, rendered her face as the face of an angel. While with one hand she pointed upward to the halo of light that encircled her alone, with the other she had cast her mantle of the rainbow hue of hope forward over the flood, still holding it firmly, while the frightened voyager grasped its shining folds, as she drew the frail bark backward from the horrid verge.

It needed no second glance to tell the friends and admirers of Edith Graham, that the face of this beautiful figure was a just and perfect reproduction of her own. But whence came it—where was the likeness obtained—who was the artist? But no solution came to the wondering questioner. As Edith Graham stood before the picture, thus beholding herself transfigured to a more than human helper, what strange surmises passed through her throbbing brain. How her heart leaped forward in longing for the recognition of that other soul, thus sounding the interior depths of her own. More eagerly than for any other voice, did she watch for the words of Philip Reide, for whom she had long learned to look in their favorite haunt, now known to her simply as Mr. Reide, yet approved and admired by her sincere soul above all others, though he evidently avoided speaking, while he ever lingered in her presence. Standing in a group of those whose tastes and judgment had long learned to conform to his, he surveyed the painting calmly, and with apparently all lack of enthusiasm, and turned away, carelessly remarking on its artistic execution, or some equally trifling point.

Edith Graham was bitterly disappointed. She had looked to him for a response to her own strange conflict of surprise and admiration, and it was cruel thus to turn from it with so cold a word. Little did she dream of the beating heart, and the lip that dared not breathe, lest its quivering muscles should tell the story that his hand had wrought, and his whole soul had gone out in its beautiful creation. The picture was not for sale, and after a time was withdrawn from the saloon, quietly and mysteriously to the earthen ones. A few months later and Philip Reide had opened an artist's studio in B— Street, much to the surprise of his friends and acquaintances, who had never dreamed of him as an artist. But the beauty of his productions and the exquisite coloring of his pictures, had already called to his room the lovers of all that is beautiful and true in art, for his were ever those holier creations, which in their ideal loveliness never fail to recognise the Author of all beauty. Most especially had he attracted by his success in portraiture Edith Graham, and pleading with her own heart that this was her strongest inducement in employing him, she had most readily persuaded herself to gratify the long denied request of her friends with her portrait. The sittings she resolved should be entirely unknown to them, thus affording them an agreeable surprise, and exempering herself from all idle curiosity—while, had the gentle girl subjected herself to her usual strict self-examination, she would surely have found another and deeper motive, underlying all the reasoning with which she had pleased herself.

On a cold February afternoon, her coachman set her down at Number 24, E— Street. Tremblingly she ascended the steps, and secretly scolded her poor heart for its unwonted pulses. She was glad, however, to find no one but the lad in waiting, who, on account of the extreme cold, and insufficient warmth of the outer saloon, graciously admitted her to the warm and inner sanctum. She hesitated on its threshold with a half-timid step, lest she was treading on enchanted ground, for on the tasteful walls were evidently such favorites of his creative pencil, as had never been desecrated by the eyes of idle curiosity or criticism. She would have denied herself so privileged a place in the absence of its proprietor, but assured by the kind attendant, she seated herself, resolving to employ this enforced leisure in the true enjoyment of the many beautiful attractions of the room; for so refined a taste as Edith Graham's, it was filled with beauty. With true woman's curiosity, she speculated at length on a picture, or rather the outline or semblance of such, but carefully protected from curious eyes by a rich drapery, and hanging where fell the choicest light, and evidently always in range of the artist's vision. She had several times resolved to go, deferring the object of her visit till another time, but as many times turned back, persuading herself that so long and cold a drive ought to effect something towards her proposed plan. Attracted by a favorite volume upon the table, where it had evidently fallen from a familiar hand, she took the book, from which, as she lifted it from the table, something slipped heavily from its gilded leaves into the folds of her dress. Hastily raising it, what was her surprise in discovering her own miniature in exquisite painting on ivory.

In the midst of her astonishment and confusion, she looked quickly up, only to increase her embarrassment at seeing before her the thoughtful face of Philip Reide. Bowing easily, he raised the book that had dropped from her lap, and replacing it carelessly on the table, proceeded at once, with the inherent tact of a refined nature, to restore her lost confidence. Though her pale cheek burned with an unwonted glow, so naturally did he glide into an easy interchange of expression, that bewildered as was the usually placid Edith, she yielded with a sort of fascination to his kindly consideration for her embarrassment, till her own innate refinement and grace at last triumphed, and she made known her errand with her usual womanly dignity.

The sittings were necessarily long and frequent (at least so said the painter), and Philip Reide longed for a pencil of sunbeams, as the beautiful face grew on the canvass before him. Conversation, too, was absolutely indispensable, as the artist of course must seek in every possible way, her true expression. To Philip Reide it was indeed a labor of love, for before him, daily revealing new depths of inward purity and grace, was indeed his guardian angel. Many times did her words of earnest pleading for the erring, her warm defence of all things good and true, bring back to the "redeemed," for such indeed he was, the day of their first meeting.

Shuddering with horror at the remembrance, the pallor of his face and the expression of pain that passed across his noble features, could not escape the watchful glance of Edith. There was a strange enigma in that elegant studio to the frank nature of that high-minded girl, and as months went by and the picture was not completed, she scarce knew why, and would not ask herself, Edith Graham grew to the strong, sweet consciousness that she loved and was beloved, though not a word or breath had told so strange a tale.

One cold November day, just two years from the dull afternoon on which our story opens, Edith Graham entered the studio of Philip Reide for the last sitting. The portrait was finished; only a few touches could prolong a labor so dear to the heart and hand of the artist. Suddenly throwing aside his pencil, he bent earnestly towards her, while his face grew very pale, he said, in a trembling, hurried tone:

"Miss Graham, you have frankly given most just and valuable criticism and suggestions on all my creations, why have you never asked a glimpse at yonder painting?"

"Indeed," she said, "my woman's eyes have sought very wistfully, but I should deem it sacrilege to ask a single glance from idle curiosity, at aught so sacredly guarded from careless eyes."

"Miss Graham," said he, "shall I lead you to the picture? It holds the dearest face to me on earth, and," he continued, looking down on the fair hand that was trembling on his arm, "what may seem to you but a strange and tearful allegory, is to me a terrible reality."

Raising the heavy drapery, he waited an instant for the lifting of Edith's glance, fastened, as by some invisible power at her feet. 'Twas but an instant, and the radiant and wondering light that flooded her beautiful face as she looked upward, was in strange contrast with the lines of suffering that were gathered about the mouth of Philip Reide. Standing there before the "Redeemed," he told her all, sobbing in his strong manhood, even as a little child, sketching its shadows in all their blackness, he bent to the upturned face of his earnest listener with an imploring, yet searching glance, as if to read any response, whether of pity or scorn, that might cloud the light of her clear eyes, and when he knelt before her, asking in sad simplicity, for a share in her remembrance and her sympathies, in return for the great love of his amended life, the noble girl leaned forward, and pressing her lips to the pale forehead of Philip Reide, said:

"Henceforth crown me not with asphodel, but with the blessing of thy love, to fade not, alter not, even when we shall in truth walk with THE REDEEMED."

ADDIE'S ESCORT.

BY MARGARET VERNE.

MISS ADDIE CHANDLER, the merriest, prettiest little sprite in the whole world—was, to use a somewhat inelegant term, in “a peck of trouble.” To have seen her as she fidgetted about, first into the ladies’ room (she was waiting in the depot to take the first northern train), then out upon the platform, looking and staring about this way and that, her brows knitted, and her little mouth drawn out of shape—to have seen her, I say, one would have thought the fate of empires rested upon her delicate shoulders, so troubled did she look.

“What shall I do, Mr. Morris?” she asked, running against an elderly gentleman, who answered her in a way that showed he was not ignorant of the nature of her grievances.

“I do not know, Miss Addie, I am sure. I have looked about in every direction, but I cannot find anybody to whose care I could feel warranted in entrusting you. When the train comes in I will speak to the conductor.”

“I’m so afraid you cannot find any one. If it wasn’t for my baggage, I wouldn’t care. But we have to change cars so many times, and in the night, too. O, I’m sure, Mr. Morris, by to-morrow morning I shan’t know whether I’m myself or a hand-box!”

“But if I can’t find an escort, will you wait a week longer, as you first thought of doing?”

“No. I must see Longbrook to-morrow, at any rate, escort or no escort—and yet, O dear!”

Mr. Morris smiled. In all his life, he thought, he had never seen such a strange, perverse, contradictory little piece of womanhood. He came near saying as much in words, in spite of his dignity (he was a teacher in the school where Miss Addie Chandler had graduated the week before, and from which she was just then going), but at that moment a familiar face in the crowd attracted his attention, and making his excuses to Miss Addie, he left her and sprang across the platform. He did not return to the young lady until five minutes before the cars started, and then he had the pleasure of informing her that he had met with a friend, who was going quite the same way with herself, and who would be pleased to take charge of her. Addie clapped her hands for joy, in spite of the fact that the gentleman who was to accompany her was waiting at Mr. Morris’s elbow to be presented.

“O, I am so glad!” she said, again and again, without giving good Mr. Morris a chance to put in a “word-edgescape.” To be sure, Miss Addie Chandler had quite forgotten herself, that was proved beyond a doubt by her confused manner, and the way her face crimsoned when her teacher said to her a little sternly, looking her full in the face at the time:

“Miss Chandler, allow me to present to you Mr. Havens.”

Addie returned the gentleman’s salutation, and made an attempt to say something (she afterwards declared she could not tell what, Mr. Morris frightened her so with his big eyes), but all that could be heard of her pretty speech, was the name with which she concluded it, “Mr. Hazen!”

Mr. Morris was about to correct her, by saying it was Mr. Havens, not Hazen—when the gentleman, giving him a sly, half-roguish glance, telegraphed to him to remain silent. And without questioning his motive, though he was puzzled somewhat, the good man complied with his request. In three minutes more their adieux were spoken, and the great northern train swept out of the city. (In parentheses let me say to you, reader, that Mr. Morris looked relieved as he saw it go.)

En route for Longbrook. It seemed to Addie Chandler that she could never stand it in the world until she got home, her heart and head were so full. As Mr. Havens handed her to a seat in the cars, she was resolved to be very dignified and polite the whole of the journey, to make up for her apparent rudeness at the depot, and after glancing over the gentleman’s face and figure (he was a very fine-looking man, Mr. Frank Havens), as he seated himself by her side, she doubly resolved that she would out Turveydrop Turveydrop in deportment. She would be as prim and proper as could be, she would.

But O, dear little Addie Chandler, that was a long, long way to Longbrook, and you had a rattling tongue in your girlish head; how did you think you could live so long without being your own, bright, merry little self? Strange Addie!

So, for three hours Addie sat back in her seat and was dignified, to the evident disquiet of her companion. True, she amused herself in the somewhat girlish way of admiring Mr. Hazen’s (she called him so) whiskers, and speculating as to who he was and where he was going; and then she turned her head away from him, perhaps to give him a chance at studying her face (it was as sweet as a wild rose.) Whatever her object was, at any rate it resulted in this, with an attempt to start a conversation.

“You reside at Longbrook, Miss Chandler, I think Mr. Morris told me?” he said.

"Yes, sir; or, at least my connections reside there. It has been but a year since my father purchased his place there, and I have not been home in the meantime."

"Then you cannot tell whether you like it or not?"

"Yes, I can tell—I do not like it!"

"Strange!" said Mr. Havens, smiling. "Pray why not?"

Addie smiled. Something in her smile betokened that she was not quite sure it was right for her to tell a stranger why she disliked Longbrook. He noticed her hesitancy, and went on in the easiest way in the world with the remark:

"There are some very pleasant people in Longbrook, I believe. I have a friend who resides there."

Addie shrugged her shoulders.

"O, I don't doubt that there are some pleasant people there; it would be strange if there were not; and yet, if I can trust my senses, there are some very un-pleasant ones, too!"

"And yet you have never been there?" queried the gentleman, looking into her bright, piquant face with an interested smile.

"No, but I know enough about Longbrook to know that it holds one (at least) old curmudgeon, and I don't know how many more."

"Indeed!" he said, laughing heartily.

He was very much amused. How he wished she would tell him about it! It was lucky for Mr. Havens that his wish looked out from his eyes. Had he ventured to speak it, little Miss Addie Chandler would have betaken herself to her dignity again. But he was a quick reader of human hearts and faces, and so he allowed her to take her own course without word or suggestion.

And dear me, how the child rattled on! For her life's sake, she could not help talking to Mr. Havens as though she had known him for years.

She told him about her school, about her music and drawing, her French, and lastly about her school compositions—how she disliked to write them when she was obliged to, and then, when they were not wanted, how fast her words would come. It seemed as if she never could stop writing!

"Do you ever write verses?"

The long lashes drooped low upon the crimson cheek, and the small white teeth were dented into the cherry lip.

"I try to sometimes, but the gentleman (the old fogey, I mean) at Longbrook assured sister Fannie that I didn't make out much."

There rested the whole truth in a nutshell—Miss Addie's dislike for her father's new place!

As it flashed across Mr. Havens's mind, an interested observer would have said perhaps, that a corresponding expression was visible upon his face. But he said, looking down upon her flushed features:

"Pray tell me, Miss Chandler, whom this offender may be?"

How strange it was that the young girl was so destitute of caution! But she answered as readily as need be:

"A Mr.—Mr.—(his name sounds something like yours) Mr. Havens, I believe—and you are Mr. Hazen!"

The gentleman bowed. A very suspicious color was creeping up from his cheeks to his forehead.

"Well, to tell the truth, Mr. Hazen, this crusty old bachelor—so Fan said he was—abused me most shockingly. If I could only have sent him a challenge through an enterprising second, why he would have been whizzing around here without his head some months ago. But as it is, he is a marked man, as they say in stories—perhaps I'll shoot him yet!"

"Very possible," replied Mr. Havens, smiling.

"But the best of all is," Addie went on, "that I sent him a Valentine last February, and made it as provoking as I could. I'd really like to know what he thought of the verses in that!"

Foolish, foolish Addie Chandler, why didn't you look into your companion's face just then? What an expression of countenance he had on! Did you think because he turned away and hid his face in his handkerchief and coughed and hemmed that he was afflicted with a bronchial difficulty, did you, Addie? Did you think he was trying to answer you, and was distressed because he could not find his voice? Pshaw, Addie!

"I believe I never wrote a letter home, or at least, I have not since he abused my poetry, without giving the gentlemanly critic a little stab with my pen. Ah, Mr. Hazen, I'll have him yet!" she continued, in high glee.

"In all good truth, I hope that you may!" the gentleman answered, seriously.

"How he sympathizes with me!" thought Addie, "and what a dear, kind person he is!"

"But truly, though," she went on to say, "I am intending to thank him for his kindness, if I can without father or mother knowing anything about it. I shall call on Mr. Havens in a quiet, unostentatious manner, and tell him how many mortifications his sweeping denouncement of my little poem has saved me; that but for that, I should have issued this very summer, a ten-volume romance, a folio volume of my poems, besides three or four pamphlets of sermons and prose essays. Why, he'll believe every word that I tell him!"

Addie—Addie Chandler, why didn't you look into your companion's face? You would have thought he was in a high fever, or that he was ill of the measles, and they had just "come out," to use a phrase familiar to nurses. But you lost all that.

In this lively way the night came on, and in the meantime Addie grew tired and sleepy. She thought she should never be able to get along until morning, she was so terribly tired and sleepy. Try as best she would to keep awake, her head nodded off in this direction and that, and then back again. Mr. Havens offered her his shoulder for a pillow, but no, she thanked him, she could keep awake. It was a pitiable kind of waking for the poor child—from his heart Mr. Havens pitied her. But at last with a faint "I can't help it," she dropped her head upon his shoulder, and in a moment was off to the land of dreams.

"What a pretty, sweet face she had!" thought Mr. Havens as he watched her sleeping. Her complexion was as fair and fresh as a babe's, and her soft, wavy hair drooping low over her white temples, was like a cloud of gold!"

Kind, thoughtful Mr. Havens! How the cars jostled and jolted the beautiful sleeper just then! It would tire his arm considerably, to be sure, to put it around her, but there was no other way, and Frank Havens was not the man to think of himself when a friend was to be served!—I repeat it—kind Mr. Havens!

The morning sun shone into the car windows before Addie awakened. When she came fully to her senses, she gave a start of surprise at her situation, which, together with the blush which accompanied it, seemed highly amusing to Mr. Havens. But of course he was too wise to venture the first remark upon the occasion, so that in good time the young lady quite recovered from her shock, and was as laughing and gay as ever.

"I suppose your first thought will be for your critic, after you have rested from your journey, Miss Chandler," remarked Mr. Havens, as they stood together at the depot at Longbrook.

"I don't know," she answered, laughing; "what is best?"

The question was a naive one. It was asked in such a pretty, childlike way, and with such a womanly deference of manner withal, that he was completely charmed.

"In two years more what a sweet woman she will be!" he said, to himself. But to Addie, he made answer in a soft tone, as he looked into her face: "Do just as you please about it, dear!"

The "dear" was involuntary on his part, and so was the quick glance and crimsoned cheeks on hers. An embarrassing silence might have followed, but at that moment Mr. Chandler's carriage drove up, and glancing out of the window, Addie saw her sister Fannie alighting from it. Her first thought was (after she had kissed her sister until she was nearly breathless, and been kissed in return till her lips felt as though they were blistered), for Mr. Hazen, whom, for his kindness to her, she wished in some way to repay.

"A gentleman took charge of me from C—; he was so kind and gentlemanly, that I am greatly his debtor. Come this way and let me present you. His name is Hazen!"

"My sister, Miss Chandler, Mr. Hazen," commenced Addie, with a blush.

"I am happy indeed, to make your acquaintance, Mr. Havens," bursting into a fit of merriment that was more hearty than elegant. "Dear me," Addie!"

What did it mean? Poor Addie looked first from her sister to her escort, but she could make but little from their laughter. At last, a bright thought struck her. What a dull thing she had been!

"Are you Mr. Havens,—my critic?" she asked, going up to the supposed Mr. Hazen.

"Mr. Havens, most certainly, Miss Addie; and your critic if you'll but keep to the resolve you made yesterday in the cars," he added in a lower tone.

"To a part of it I will, most emphatically," she answered. "I shall not allow you to escape."

"I shall not make the attempt," he replied, in an insinuating tone, which greatly added to Miss Addie's confusion.

But what is the use for me to say more, unless it be that Mr. Frank Havens, the "curmudgeon" and "critic" commenced his wooing in good earnest? It was a very short one, considering what a staid, dignified bachelor he had always been. But fact is stranger than fiction they say, and in just three months from the time that he journeyed with Miss Addie as Mr. Hazen, he started off on a tour with her as Mrs. Havens! So Addie kept her promise of the cars, that "she would have him yet!"

MY REQUIREMENT.

BY WILLIE WARE.

I long for one congenial heart
My thoughts to always share;
A faithful breast to lean upon
When overcome with care.

A heart that I can call my own
Amid earth's busy throng;
One that will never fear to chide
Me when I'm in the wrong.

O, with a fond and faithful heart,
One full of sympathy,
A paradise below, I ween,
This earth to me would be.

And when I tire of worldly joys,
And seek a purer rest,
I'd love to lay my weary head
Upon that faithful breast.

O, is there not a heart to speak
To me in love's own tone?—
Or am I doomed to tread this life
Obscure, unloved, alone?

OUR FRONT ROOM.

BY A. M. LOVERING.

MARTHA and I sat planning together through the whole long April afternoon; a part of the time with tears in our eyes (for we were not rich, and money came grudgingly to us), and a part of the time with our faces radiant with smiles. Planning how this little debt could be paid, how that obligation could be liquidated, and how such a sum of money could be made to go a great ways, and lastly, but not leastly, how we could manage to furnish our "front room." This last may seem very strange to you, reader, and even while writing it now, I cannot refrain from indulging in a little quiet, happy smile. But I'll explain how it was.

"Martha and I were not sisters, only friends, though I doubt if sisters often live as harmoniously together as did we. We were but laborers, mere working-girls (so the lofty part of humanity would have dubbed us, I suppose), in the little city, upon which we could look as we sat there and talked together. We were of those who must, to be happy, have a home, somewhere; a little sacred place, or sanctuary, where the great breath of the world cannot sweep desecratingly in. So, in a plain little house, out of the town, we rented rooms, and made ourselves as comfortable and happy as we could in a domicile of our making.

We should have got along finely (no, that is not the word for it, since at the worst we were well enough); at any rate we should have had things in much better fashion, and much more to our tastes, had not Martha been obliged to send a great share of her earnings to a sick brother.

This was why we had to plan so much, and out of three demands for as many dollars wisely judge which was the strongest. All the winter we had talked of furnishing our "front room," until it had got to be a sort of joke between us. Any event which we were anticipating with doubt in the future, was placed on a level with the great one of our front-room-furnishing. I was to be married when that was fitted out, Martha would say, which meant that I should live an old maid all my life.

But this afternoon, in particular, as the sun burned so warm and summer-like in the sky, and the April breezes carried a smell of the hills upon their invisible wings, we were more than ever in earnest about the little bird's nest of a place which we had wanted so long.

"There's the carpet!" Martha said, crossing her arms upon my lap and looking up into my face. "Let me see how much did you say that would cost?"

"Twenty yards at sixty cents per yard—$12.00, Martha."

"Dear me, how much! Then the curtains, plain white ones will do. If we could only have lace! They look so like white mist, but then we can't, so the plain ones will have to do."

"Then we want a table," I suggested.

"Yes, but not a mirror. I don't care to see my face any oftener than I can help. Nor does any one, that I know of beside you."

The last was spoken a little bitterly. I knew what that meant, because I knew how much of a woman Martha was, and how, in her true heart, she was cramping all the beautiful romance of her young life, not allowing it the first ray of sunshiny hope to warm itself in. I took her face between my two hands, and raised it up so that the dying light could fall upon it. What a sweet, dear face it was, with its thoughtful gray eyes, purely oval outline, and pleasant, firm mouth! Pushing back the heavy, dark hair from her forehead, I said:

"I'm sure you do not mean what you say, dear!"

"Yes, I do every word of it, every word of it, Thessy! (my name was Theresa, and she petted it to suit herself), and now I think of it, what a rare thing it is in this world to be poor, but intelligent! Did you ever have anybody say such a thing to you?"

I put my hand over her mouth (her cruel, little teeth were bruising the velvet of her lips), and shook my head slowly. In the soft twilight I could see how widely open her eyes were thrown, and how they gleamed and flashed like two beautiful stars!

"Never mind that, Martha, let us think about our room. What a dear place it will be! We had talked of the carpet curtains and tables. What else do we want—O, chairs!"

She did not answer me, but dropped her head upon my lap. I thought it would be wise in me not to notice it, so I went on talking.

"Yes chairs—not many, because our room is small. I've been thinking that we can buy the frames and fix them up to suit ourselves. You could embroider them beautifully, Martha!"

"Yes," she said, without raising her head.

"Then we want some pictures. We will have that little pencil sketch of yours framed, for me, I like it so much!"

"Yes, and if we could only buy that landscape painting that we saw yesterday. I mean the one where the water goes dashing down from a hillside, with a glimmer of sunlight upon its white bosom, and where the mountains lie linked along together, in the background, growing dimmer and mistier in the distance, until it seems as though the last was but a cloud from the soft heart of summer, melting away against the grand arch of blue! Mr. Preston thinks it is beautiful!"

"Yes, and so it is, sweet, but it costs a great deal. But the face that we liked so much. That would do!"

"Yes, I suppose so. But I'd like it better if it wasn't so quiet and soft in its expression. I believe, after all, that I don't like these passionless faces. I don't care how calm the features are, if the soul will but pour its intense light out from the eyes. I don't care that the face should be a perfect one, either, so that it has a strong, deep look, as though at times it could throw out to the enrapt beholder the whole wide, inner life, throbbing itself onward to the music of the one great Master-hand. No, I don't want that face. But you can have it, Tessy!"

"No, we will find something else to agree upon. I don't care a very great deal for that. How fine it will be, won't it? Then we will have the mantel-shelf covered over with little knick-knacks, and the windows, do you remember?"

"O, yes, the morning-glory vines will nearly cover them. I like that the best of all because the scent of the flowers will bring the murmuring bees to us. Dear, dear! how can we wait! Then perhaps we shall have a—"

"Canary?" I suggested, seeing that she hesitated.

"At least he said he should have to bring us one," she answered, unconsciously nestling her head down in my lap.

She did not need to say more. I knew well enough who "he" was.

"Is your heart beating very fast, Martha?" I asked playfully. "I have an idea that it always makes itself remarkably busy while we are talking of a certain somebody. But listen a moment; I thought I heard some one in the hall. If we have had a listener, they have been well entertained, without doubt. Let me go for a light—we won't sit in the dark any longer."

"Wait a little while, Tessy. Let's talk a few minutes longer, I can't bear to have a light just yet. Tell me before you get one, how long you actually think it will be before we can fix our nest?"

"O, five weeks, unless we get the fairies to help us."

"Fairies will help us as much as any one, I take it," she answered, while I raised her head from my knee and went after a lamp. When the light was procured, I found a number of little chores that waited to be done, so I went about the house, and watched her as she sat by the low window looking eagerly out into the darkness.

I knew well enough for whom she watched and waited, and I smiled, a little quiet smile to myself, while I thought how poorly her separate actions agreed upon this one subject. When Rufus Preston was near her, she was as cool and unbending as a queen. She criticised him as though the right was hers, and tormented him continually in her quiet way with her sharp, pointed sarcasms. Once in a while she would be herself before him it is true, but not often. For the momentary glimpse that she gave him of her heart she drew the bolts and bars a thousand times stronger than ever. And he was as unreadable as was she. But this evening I knew, instinctively that she longed for his presence, although she did not tell me so. I knew, too, that all day she had been glad to see the hours fly by, because each one, in its going, brought the time of his calling nearer. But she waited in vain for him; he did not come, and the city bells chimed out the hour of nine. As she heard them she arose from her seat by the window, with a sad, half-cynical expression upon her face, and came towards me.

"Well?" I said, smiling.

She looked me in the face, and through her eyes her heart told me freely of her secret. I thought then that her face was like the ideal picture of which she had spoken.

"Never mind," I continued, "there is another evening, Martha."

"And I do not care for that," she answered, coloring. "I am glad everything is just as it is—that I am poor and plain, and that—"

"Mr. Preston is handsome and rich," I suggested.

"Yes, anything. For being foolish we women deserve to suffer, Theesy. Don't let us say anything more about it, ever. I'll put the whole subject in a straight-jacket—let the light go out, and—that is all, dear."

Saying this, Martha took the lamp and together we went to our chamber; I to sleep, she to lie with eyes wide-starting into the darkness—to hear the city clocks toll for the hours as they died, and to feel what perhaps few women feel in life (because few are as strong and true as was she), that if this one delicious cup of joy should pass from her lips, she should never find strength of heart to taste another. In all life there was but one draught of nectar for her to sip.

The night died away at last, and the sun came up red and misty from the east, and with its rising life grew active again. We went into the city, Martha and I, to remain through the day (we were milliners and the time was a busy one for us), and took our dinners with us. We talked a little of our room as we walked to town, but it seemed as far off as ever, the day when it should be fitted up to our liking. Dear, dear! it was so hard getting anything ahead, after all, and we had been trying the best we knew for months.

It was quite late that night when we went home. Afar off the shadows were dusky upon the hills, and the tracks of the day were faint and dim in the west. How beautiful it was—I don't know why I should remember it so plainly, but it seems to me that I shall never forget it. We did not speak of our front room through the evening, and did not go into it once to speculate upon the position of such a piece of furniture (imaginary of course), or the hanging of such a picture, as we had done evening after evening since the spring had come. But in the morning, after we had eaten our breakfast, I said to Martha, putting my arm about her waist:

"We must just take a look at our parlor before we go down town."

So we went into it together.

Goodness me! how we screamed as we threw open the door! How in all the world had such a sudden transformation been brought about! I rubbed my eyes to make sure that I was awake. Our room was furnished! Upon the floor there was a handsome carpet, which looked, for all the world, like a beautiful bed of flowers. In one corner a little damask-covered sofa was nestled, while to match it, about the room were scattered chairs and ottomans. At the windows there hung long, fleecy-white curtains, and upon the walls was the picture of the dashing water, and dim hills, together with the ideal face and a delicate crayon sketch. Under the mirror (for there was one), was a table, and upon the table was a little writing-desk with a slip of paper hanging out from the side. Martha grasped it, while breathlessly we read:

"The desk is for Martha, the mirror for Theresa."

Martha's face flushed crimson, and she exclaimed, the first words that either of us had spoken since we entered the room:

"What can this mean!"

"The fairies," I answered, laughing. "But whose is the hand-writing? is it familiar to you?"

Martha shook her head. She was taking a peep into the little pearl-lined desk.

"Who could have done this?" she murmured.

"Sure enough, who could?" I answered.

"Mr. Preston wouldn't do such a thing would he?" I added, laughingly.

"I hope not, I'm certain!" she replied, pushing the desk away from her. (Privately speaking, reader, I think Martha had taken a sort of heroic pleasure, the night before, in giving up every thought of the future connected with Mr. Preston. She did not relish the idea of taking her hopes out of their graves as bright and strong as ever.)

"And why?" I queried, a little roguishly. "Of course if he did do all those, which I must doubt somewhat, he did it for somebody; and since it could not be for you, it must have been for me, you know? You ought to be as happy as a bird, Martha!"

She did not quite fancy my way of reasoning, so she turned her head away. Suddenly she said:

"What can it mean about the mirror, Theesy! Do you remember what I said last night? O, dear, if—"

She clasped her hands over her eyes and retreated to the farthest corner of the room.

"Some one did hear you, I know they did. Don't you know I heard a noise in the hall, and our door was open all the evening. I guess Mr. Preston came, after all, but I take it that he played the eaves-dropper."

"Eaves-dropper, Theresa? was that what you were saying?" said a voice, just at my elbow. "Mr. Preston!" I exclaimed. "We shall have to get our landlord (we hired the house, with another small family, of him) to nail up our back door so that people can't sly in upon us in this way. Never mind, your presence is quite acceptable. Come and see Martha's present."

He was not expecting this, and so colored like a bashful girl, as I pointed him to the desk.

"Isn't it beautiful?" I asked. "But my gift is the mirror yonder. I take it that that means something."

(At this Martha came round at my elbow and gave me a sly nudge.)

"Where do you suppose all these things came from?" I queried, biting my lips to repress my laughter.

"From the upholsterer's, I'll venture."

"O, I didn't doubt that. But how did they come here?"

"It must be that some one brought them!"

"In—deed!" I exclaimed, taking breath. "I do not need to question you any farther. You have told us more than we were certain of, before. We weren't sure that they were brought, even."

He laughed, and glanced at Martha. I was quite sure, then, he wanted me to leave the room.

"I don't think Martha is very well pleased with them," I continued.

"Why, Theresa!" she ejaculated, looking up reproachfully. "How could you say that!"

"You want more mirrors, you know you do, sweet!" I answered. "By the way, Mr. Preston, shouldn't you think Martha would have sense enough to leave the room? She knows as well as she wants to that you have something to say to me."

By the way that Mr. Preston and Martha colored, I knew that I had expressed their thoughts perfectly. But I did not care to go in a hurry. So I staid awhile longer. When I went, perhaps I played eaves-dropper, and then again perhaps I didn't. But certainly I have a distinct impression of hearing Mr. Preston say a great many fine things to somebody (I suppose it was to Martha), and of hearing her answer in a low, soft tone, that he was dearer than anybody in the world to her (the deceitful thing, she had always declared the same to me); and then I have a confused idea of seeing a door suddenly opened, and—who was it that ran as fast as their feet could fly to get out of sight? and who didn't succeed? And who was married that fall, in that same front room?

Ask Mr. Preston and Martha!

THE SPANISH GAMBLER.

The following is published in several of the journals as a letter from Hamburg: "A Spanish gentleman, one of the boldest players ever seen, keeps the bankers at the gaming-tables in the utmost alarm. He plays the maximum stake nearly every time, and has so far won 1,500,000*f*. One of the directors of the bank has just returned from Paris, bringing a sum of two millions to increase the resources of the bank. Immediately after his arrival, a notice was posted up at the Cursaal, stating that the bank at rouge-et-noir would, for the future, consist of 300,000*f*., instead of 200,000*f*., and that the maximum stake for each player would be 12,000*f*. instead of 8000*f*. People go in crowds from Frankfort to witness the daring and coolness of this intrepid gamester, who braves such a formidable bank, and has given his word as a Castilian, that he will play till he has ruined it, or been ruined himself."—N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

BOUGHT FRIENDSHIP.

"Purchase not friends with gifts; for when thou ceasest to give, such friends will cease to love thee," is an old proverb which a friend of ours felt the full force of the other day. Some years ago, while in prosperity, he formed the acquaintance of a young lady of intelligence and refinement on whom he showered presents without number and without regard to cost. She in turn professed the most ardent attachment, and the result was an engagement. Reverses recently came, when Mr. — and his presents ceased. Shortly his inamorata sent him a note stating that as she was about to be married to another, it was time that the foolish flirtation carried on between herself and — should cease. The successful rival is reported to be very wealthy. Poor — is hesitating between suicide and a whaling voyage.—New York Express.

KISSING.

Dr. Holmes says of kissing; "The memory of a kiss that Margaret of Scotland gave to Alain Chatier, has lasted four hundred years, and put into the head of many an ill-favored poet whether Victoria or Eugene would do as much by him, if she happened to pass him when he was asleep. And have we ever forgotten that the fresh cheek of young John Milton tingled under the lips of some high-born Italian beauty, who, I believe, did not think to leave her card by the side of the slumbering youth, but has bequeathed the memory of her pretty deed to all coming time? The sound of a kiss is not so loud as that of a cannon, but its echo lasts a deal longer."

HISTORY

Hence, pageant history! hence, gilded cheat!
Smart planet in the universe of deeds!
Wide sea, that one continuous murmur breeds
Along the pebbled shore of memory!
Many old rotten timbered boats there be Upon thy vaporous bosom magnified
To godly vessels; many a sail of pride,
And golden-keeled, is left unlaunched and dry.

HAROLD:

—OR,—

THE FALSE FRIEND!
A TALE OF BOSTON.

BY M. H. MACNAMARA.

"IMPRISONED! Accused of murder! Good God, what fearful calamity is this!"

The words were uttered, in a tone of exquisite anguish, by a gray-haired man who stood in the centre of a richly-furnished apartment of a large mansion situated in the very heart of the city of Boston.

The old man's hands were clasped wildly before him; his lips tightly compressed, and his whole appearance denoting intense and painful agitation. Before him stood an officer of the law. He seemed but little affected at the personification of terrible grief at his side. Experience in his profession had hardened his heart, and what he now beheld was, to him, but an ordinary event of life.

The officer had just brought intelligence that the son of Benjamin Harris, the old man above mentioned, had been arrested upon a charge of murder, perpetrated under peculiar circumstances, and in a manner that left but little doubt of the guilt of the prisoner.

Mr. Harris walked the room for a moment with an uneven step; and at length, having somewhat calmed his agitation, he turned to the officer, and, in a broken voice, requested him to give the details of the terrible catastrophe. The officer did so, and the following is the substance of his narrative:

Edward Harris had, at an early hour the evening before, entered a certain gambling hell of the city, and there he encountered a most notorious gamester, with whom Harris, not knowing his character, at once commenced to play. Their game continued for some hours, until at last Harris detected his opponent at cheating, and boldly accused him of the fact; this the latter stoutly denied, and, upon the former reiterating his assertion, the latter boldly declared him a liar. Harris sprang to his feet, and with one blow of his fist, he felled the false gamester to the ground.

With muttered curses the latter arose and darting upon Harris, sought to pull him down. He was evaded, however, and Harris again struck him. The latter then seemed suddenly to recover his self-possession, and with a triumphant laugh proclaimed that he had cheated, and ended by saying that his opponent might make the best of it. He then departed from the place. Edward Harris was heard to say in the gambling-house that he would "fix him yet." The clock struck two a few moments afterwards, and Harris departed.

The next that was known of him, he was found bending over the body of his murdered opponent, and his clothes saturated with blood. The watchman who discovered him declared that he had heard a low shriek, and that, as soon as possible, he had reached the spot and found Harris as above described. There seemed a strong probability of the young man's guilt, from the fact that he had lost a large sum of money to the murdered man; that he had threatened him, and followed him out shortly after his departure.

When arrested, Harris coolly stated his entire innocence, and said, that the same shriek which had attracted the attention of the watchman, called him to the spot, and that, arriving but a few moments before, he was detected in an examination of the man's wound, and arrested in that position.

Such were the circumstances under which Edward Harris was arrested; and, to even the most unprejudiced and dispassionate observer, there seemed a strong probability of guilt.

When the officer left Mr. Harris, he carried the message to his son, that he would shortly visit him in his prison; not, however, before he had engaged the most eminent legal talent that money could command.

Mr. Harris then seizing the bell rope, summoned a servant.

"John, is my nephew in?"

"Yes, sir."

"Call him hither."

In a few moments the door opened, and a young man entered the apartment. He was a tall, finely built man, of about twenty-five or six years of age. His face was swarthy and of oval cast, with hair suiting his complexion, thrown back from a full and intellectual forehead. His features were nearly faultless in mould, his teeth, large, white and brilliant. But his dark eyes beamed with haughty and passionate fire, mingled with a sinister gleam, which, added to the disdainful curl of the lip, gave to his face an expression akin to treachery. In his motions he was nervously rapid, retaining one position scarcely an instant. He was dressed faultlessly in a suit of black clothes, and came into the room with a short, quick step.

"You sent for me, uncle—"

"Yes, yes, to communicate fearful tidings! Your cousin is in prison, charged with murder!"

"Good heavens!" exclaimed the young man, with a sudden start, while the sinister glance came, with a transient flash, to his eyes. "Good heavens, has it come to this?"

"Yes, yes!" cried the old man, in a voice of anguish. "Reckless of character, of life, and spurning my advice, and defying my control, he has given himself up to wild licentiousness and mad dissipation, until at last the prison impedes his further progress!"

"I had feared that some disaster would overtake him, but, great God! I had never expected so terrible a finale as this. My poor, unfortunate cousin!" And the young man buried his face in his hands and seemed to give way to passionate grief.

Mr. Harris gazed on him for a few moments with a look of deep sympathy, seemingly forgetful of his own sorrow and misfortune; and then going up to him, he placed his hand kindly upon his shoulder, saying:

"Come, Harold, you take the blow too deeply to heart. Come, my kind boy, let us take measures for his safety!"

"You speak well, uncle, this is no time for grief; I am glad that you bear up so bravely. I cannot believe that my poor cousin is guilty! With all his faults he would never, never conceive, much less execute so terrible a crime as this!"

"Ay, with all his faults my poor boy is innocent of this. I believe it, and God knows it!"

When Harold lifted his face from his hands, no tears were visible; but his face was flushed, and his dark eyes strangely gleaming.

But buried in his own sad thoughts the old man noticed not the peculiar expression of his face, but hurrying on his outer garments, he and his nephew left the mansion.

Edward Harris, who now stood accused of the terrible crime of murder, was a young man about twenty-three years of age. In appearance he was the opposite of his cousin, Harold Stanly. He was of a tall and graceful figure; dark blue eyes, and brown, curling hair, with dignified and intellectual features. The expression of his face was manly and candid, and such as would win the confidence of every student of human nature. He was open and generous to a fault. The only child of his father, he had been spoiled by over-indulgence, and naturally of a quick, impulsive temperament, he could ill brook control. Early in life he was his own master, and over his actions his father seldom or ever attempted control.

His father, one of the most prominent of Boston merchants, with nearly a million of money, never stinted his allowance, but was always ready to gratify his whims, for he loved him with a deep and fervent affection.

The coming of Harold Stanly, whose mother died long before he had attained his majority, gave an impetus to the extravagant desires of Edward, and his cousin it was who first introduced him, as it were, to the realities of life; under a garb of friendship and generosity, Harold Stanly covered a corrupt and deceitful heart. He lured Edward on, step by step, until at last he was initiated into the darkest mysteries of city life. He it was who first introduced young Harris to a gambling hell; and who, when the latter, bound by his passion for play, turned about and hypocritically expostulated with him on the folly of his course; but not until he had convinced himself that, for the time, Edward was under the baneful control of his own passions.

With his artful ways and seeming steadiness of disposition, Harold Stanly had entwined himself about the heart of his uncle, until at length, the latter thought him a model youth, and placed in him the utmost confidence.

When Mr. Harris mourned over the folly and extravagance of his son, the point would be taken up by Harold, who would cheer the old man with the hope that Edward would one day give up his evil ways, and become a staid and exemplary man.

Edward never suspected the dark, designing nature of his false cousin; busied in seeking the gratifications of his own passions, and naturally of an unsuspicious temperament, he never imagined that such a thing as falsehood and deceit could be nourished in a heart so nearly related to his own.

But a deep scheme lay beyond all this. It was no ordinary one. Harold was actuated in his course, not so much by ill will or hatred to Edward, as by a determined intention of superseding him in the good graces of his father; to make himself his heir; and, failing in this, he would not scruple to proceed to the direst extremities. Time passed on: But all the folly and waywardness of Edward could not alienate the affection of his father. The latter expostulated with his son; he threatened, and implored; all in vain—yet the old man loved him still. Harold Stanly at last became convinced that he could never achieve his desire by waiting for such an event; then he determined on another course—dark and consummate villain that he was—what that course was will soon be plainly evident to the reader.

In the boudoir of a splendid mansion, standing in a fashionable quarter of the city, was seated a young and divinely beautiful woman. Her dark and lustrous tresses hung down upon shoulders pure as Parian marble. Her dark, lustrous eyes, beaming with pensive sweetness, were bent upon her embroidery, and her ripe, red lips were slightly parting, and her full round cheeks tinged with the rare beauty of the full blown rose. She was a being of more than ordinary beauty. Her heart shone out from the liquid depths of her large and handsome eyes; and her smile was brighter than a sunbeam of a June morning. Rarely beautiful, she sat, ever and anon slightly lifting her head, as if listening for an approaching footstep. This beautiful being was Marion Lee, the beloved of Edward Harris. They had met under peculiar circumstances, at one of the fashionable watering places. Marion with some friends was out upon the river, and more than a mile distant from the shore, when the yacht in which she was, by some mismanagement was suddenly overturned. Edward was passing them in a small sail boat which he occupied alone, and seeing the catastrophe, he tacked about, and lowering his sail rapidly, he cast out his anchor; and, seeing one of the lady passengers of the yacht—there were but two—floating down with the current, he sprang into the sea, and swam rapidly towards her, while the rest of the passengers, three in number, remained clinging to the boat. He reached her as she was sinking for the second time, and, grasping her securely with one arm, he made towards his boat, but ere he reached it, another yacht appeared upon the scene and he was lifted with his nearly senseless burden aboard.

From that moment a warm and fervent attachment sprang up between them, and ere three months had passed over their heads they were affianced. Marion loved Edward with a most devoted affection. But a period was approaching which was to test the strength of that love most cruelly.

Marion was recalling this sweet reminiscence, with a fluttering heart, when the door opened, and the name of Horace Stanly was announced.

He entered, and bowing gracefully, he said:

"Miss Marion, I would not intrude my presence upon you at such an early hour, did I not come on a sad and imperative mission!"

"You are welcome, sir; but what has occurred that is so important, that you speak so formally?"

"I came on behalf of my unfortunate cousin."

"Heavens! What has happened? Is Edward ill! Speak, speak, in heaven's name!"

And Marion darted from her seat, clasped her hands and looked upon the dark face of Harold, with a wild gaze of entreaty. The sinister gleam was in his eye, and he seemed gloat- ing over the suspense in which he held her. At last he said:

"No, Edward is not ill, on the contrary he is in the best of health—"

"Thank God!" cried Marion, gratefully, as she sank into a seat.

"I repeat," continued Harold, "that he is in the best of health—but he is in prison."

"In prison!" muttered Marion, confounded.

"Yes, in prison!" repeated Harold, harshly.

"And for what?" asked Marion, recovering somewhat her composure.

"For murder!" answered Harold, with ill-dis- guised triumph.

"For murder!" shrieked Marion, springing wildly to her feet; "for murder—O, God, it can- not, cannot be!" And the poor maiden clasped her hands, while to her face came an expression of most unutterable woe.

"Yes, for murder, committed last night. And he is guilty, for he was found bending over the body of his victim!"

"'Tis false, 'tis false! My Edward would never, never be guilty of so foul a crime! 'Tis the work of some wicked enemy! 'Tis false!"

And the eyes of Marion Lee flashed proudly, and her fine form was drawn to its full height, and her breast heaved with indignant emotion. The eyes of Harold quailed before her proud glance, and a tremor passed through him as she cried: "'Tis the work of some wicked enemy!"

"I pray Heaven that he may be innocent; but the proof is terribly conclusive. His career for the past two months has not been creditable to him—he is a notorious gambler, a libertine—"

"Peace, sir! Speak not of Edward Harris thus to me! It is enough for me to know that he is in prison! I know his faults, and I know his virtues. I know, for my heart tells me, that he is innocent!" And Marion moved proudly from the room.

"By Jove, she's a noble woman! I'd risk my life to win her, and I will!" And Harold Stanly left the house.

In a narrow cell, containing nothing but an iron bed, on which was laid a hard mattress, a chair and a table, sat Edward Harris. His dark locks were dishevelled, his fine face pale, and marked with traces of suffering and anxious thought and his head was resting languidly on his open palm. His past life rose before him like a drama. And he shuddered as his follies passed in review before his conscience-stricken gaze.

It was the first time for years that he had over pondered upon the folly of his career; and now as he thought, he felt himself visited with just punishment. His aged and indulgent father had just left his prison; his presence had touched Edward to the heart, and he bitterly regretted that he had ever given the old man cause for sorrow; and, in his innermost soul, he determined that should he pass safely through the trying ordeal, his future life should atone for the follies of the past.

Buried in his mournful reflections, he scarcely noticed the opening of his prison door, and it was not until a soft white hand was laid upon his brow, that he noticed the presence of a visitor. He looked up.

"Marion!"

"Edward!"

A moment more and they were clasped wildly in each other's arms.

"Marion, dearest, do you love me still, do you believe me innocent? O, God, this is too much joy!"

"Yes, Edward, you are the same to me as ever—yes, my poor Edward, I believe you innocent, as firmly as I believe in God!"

"Heaven bless you, Marion! I fear not now to face the charge!"

"Fear not, Edward. God in his own good time will make your innocence apparent."

"Ay, Marion, that God whom I have so long forgotten, whose laws I have so often broken, is now my only dependence. I am involved in a strange and intricate web. A powerful chain of evidence is against me, and it is only with God's aid that I can substantiate my innocence."

"It is our best and highest trust," said Marion.

Thus conversing, an hour passed rapidly away and Marion at length departed. Her maid awaited her outside the cell door, and in company they left the prison.

The events related in the foregoing chapters were enacted many years ago. We must now leave the fashionable quarter of the city, and pass to that purlieu of crime and wretchedness, Ann Street, now North Street, somewhat more refined.

In one of the dismal and wretched caverns of the place, we now find ourselves. The stone walls were mildewed with moisture, and the sickening smell of bad tobacco and worse liquor greets the nostrils, and the dense, close atmosphere is nearly overpowering. A number of men and women are scattered throughout the cellar, engaged with cards, pipes and rum. Bacchanalian songs are being sang by men whose throats are hoarse from the constant friction of fire-water; and loud laughter, and obscure jokes, are being bandied about, and all is noise, riot and confusion.

At a rickety table in one corner of the dismal place are seated three men. One of them, wrapped in a heavy cloak and fur cap, the broad visor of which nearly concealed his face, was earnestly engaged in conversation, and his whispered tones and the fashionable shape of his garments proclaimed that his position in society but ill accorded with his present place or company.

"Did you have much trouble in securing the lady, or did she fall quietly into the trap?"

"Not much, the night was dark, and we muffled her head before she could cry Pills! The team was handy, and we slipped her in, and in a few minutes we had the gal tight and sound in old Wilson's crib," replied one of the men in answer to the cloaked stranger.

"She's a tough un, Bob, aint she? An' cool as a cucumber," cried the last speaker's companion, pulling fiercely at his long, black, bristling beard.

"She is that, cuss her! She called the pair on us villains and scoundrels, and said as how she'd fix us—didn't cry one bit, though!"

"Well so much for that point, my plans are working right—"

"Yes, we's done your work well; so, now, come down with the dimes, this ere city's gettin' hot, and we must trayvel!"

"That's the talk! We wants double money," cried the man with the beard.

"I wont dispute but the job was done well; but the sum which you demand is much more than we agreed upon," replied the stranger.

"Well wot if it is?" cried one of the desperadoes. "You'll make your fortin by the operation. Men wont risk their necks now-a-days for nothin'. So down with the dust, or we'll blow!"

"That's so, by Jupiter!" exclaimed the other.

"And wot's more," continued the first speaker, "we run awful risk; for when we laid the chap out, a watchman, and that ere Harris you wants be rid off, came down on our heels and we on'y 'scaped by the skin o' our teeth!"

"Just so eggsactly," cried his companion, who was content to endorse the assertions of his pal.

"Well, well," replied the cloaked stranger, carelessly, "we will not dispute the matter further—here's the money." And pulling a well stuffed wallet from his pocket, he took out a large roll of bills, and handed them to the villains, who carefully counted and divided them.

"Has yer got that ere Harris all right, d'ye think, sur?" said one of the villains, as he crammed his money into a belt which he pulled from his breast.

"Yes," cried the stranger, in a tone of exultation, "no earthly power can save him now!"

The stranger now arose, and whispering to one of the men, he was about to move away followed by the latter, but his cloak, catching about his chair, was dragged down from his face and he stood revealed, Harold Stanly! With a muttered curse, he wrapped his cloak again about him, and followed by the man passed down to a distant end of the cavern.

They then passed up a narrow flight of steps, and in a moment more found themselves in a long, narrow entry, lighted by a large oil lamp; they moved down this passage for a few yards, and at last paused before a door. Here the man took a key from his pocket, which he handed to Stanly, and then, with a sinister grin, he wished him luck, and departed for the place where he had left his brother ruffian. Harold Stanly, placing the key in the lock, turned back the bolt, opened the door, and found himself face to face with Marion Lee!

Let us return for a few moments to the cavern. Louder and more boisterous grew the noise, as the potent fire-water reached the brains of the revelers. Some of them, overcome with drink, dropped helplessly to the floor, others, maddened by its terrible influence, danced wildly around, shouting and shrieking, until they, too, fell senseless to the ground. But the two villains who had received the money from Stanly, paid no heed to the noise; but sat at a table with their bottle before them, deeply absorbed in play.

At times they would dispute, and then their blasphemies were terrible to listen to. But they played on, each seeking to relieve the other of his share of the spoils. At last, the one called Bob, who took a second place in the conversation with Harold, won nearly all his companion's money, and was now gloating over the pile as it lay before him on the table. The eyes of the other were flashing with drunken rage. An instant he looked upon his companion with a deadly glare, and then sprang upon him with a demon's fury, and plunged a knife deep into his breast!

With a cry of pain and fear, the latter staggered to the door and then rushed out into the street. He cried wildly for help, and in a few moments a crowd had collected about him, and a couple of watchmen, attracted by the noise, came hurriedly to the spot, and in a short time he was taken to the hospital. His treacherous comrade effected his escape.

We left Harold Stanly, standing in the presence of Marion Lee. She looked upon Stanly for a moment with much indignation. That he was the author of her present misfortune she was well aware, having gleaned the knowledge from the conversation of the ruffians who had forcibly carried her away. The eyes of the accomplished villain fell before her flashing gaze; but recovering himself, he forced a sneer to his lips and said:

"I have caged you at last, my lady bird! You who have scorned my love, for the love of a boy! I had sworn long ago to possess you—and I have kept my word!"

"It is to you, then, that I am indebted for my present confinement! I had suspected you were a villain, Harold Stanly—but never the deep villain that you have proved! Perhaps your villainy is greater than even I dare imagine!" said Marion, significantly.

"What, woman?" cried Harold, whose face had suddenly grown deadly pale. "Do you dare to insinuate—"

"I insinuate nothing, sir—but I suspect much!"

"Suspect what you please, then, I care not! I have you safe—you are mine, mine! More than mine a few hours hence, when your boy lover will be swinging on the gallows!" cried Harold, fiercely.

A shiver ran through the frame of Marion, and her face became a shade paler, but she faltered not when she said:

"My trust is in God, Harold Stanly; the innocence of Edward Harris will be made manifest, to the confusion of his enemies—and that he has enemies, my present position amply proves!"

"Yes, yes! I am his enemy! The deadliest he has ever had—I hate him as fiercely as I love you, you, madam, who have scorned and trampled on my heart!" cried Harold Stanly, as he strode rapidly up and down the apartment.

"Ha! I thought as much! It is through your villanous machinations that he is now in prison—my own heart and your base actions tell me so."

"You are right!" cried Harold, boldly, as he paused before the dauntless Marion. "What more do you know, or wish to know?"

"No more! Keep your dark secrets within the recesses of your own bad heart. You will repent these confessions by-and-by."

"Fear not, madam, you will never breathe them! I shall make it a sacred duty with you to keep them. I battle for a purpose!"

"Ay, and a dark, foul one!" said Marion, contemptuously.

The eyes of the villain were flashing with rage, but he was somewhat awed by the dignified and determined position of Marion Lee, whom, when he first entered the apartment, he had expected to see, spiritless and in tears.

"I shall leave you for a time Marion Lee!

But when next I see you, I shall make you repent your language. Remember!"

And without waiting for an answer, he turned about and left the room, locking the door carefully after him. He then left the house by a secret passage.

Upon his departure Marion cast herself upon a lounge, and gave way to tears. The courage which upheld her in the presence of the villain Stanly, now entirely deserted her. At length, recovering her composure, she threw herself upon her knees and prayed long and fervently.

The merchant, Benjamin Harris, sat alone in his study. His face was pale and wan. Greatly had he changed the last few days. The lines about his mouth were deeper, his brow more furrowed, and an expression of helpless sorrow rested like a cloud on his countenance. At times he would heave a deep sigh and gaze mournfully about him, as though searching for the form of his imprisoned son.

He had done all he could for his boy, but he felt he had little to hope for. The evidence against him was powerful, and, so far as circumstantial evidence could be, conclusive. But he hoped against hope. He had another cause for sorrow. The mysterious disappearance of Marion Lee. Her family was thrown into the profoundest misery. Search had been made for her everywhere, but no tidings of her could be had. Her disappearance was kept a secret from Edward, and Mr. Harris, who loved her as his own child, was nearly broken-hearted at this accumulation of misfortunes.

"While he sat thus, buried in his great grief, the door of his study was opened, and a servant announced, "Dr. Barton!"

A fine, portly gentleman entered the room, his fat, handsome face shining with satisfaction; and walking quickly over to Mr. Harris, he grasped his hand, exclaiming:

"My poor friend, I've great good news! Don't move, now, pray don't! Keep cool!"

And the good doctor, brimming full of excitement himself, sat down and wiped the dew from his brow, and endeavored to calm himself with a pinch of snuff.

"There is no good news for me, doctor, I fear, said the old merchant, sadly, "my poor boy—"

"That's it, sir, that's it—it's all right—now don't get excited, pray don't—Edward's innocent—full confession—villain dying—told all—now keep cool—pray do—here 'tis!"

While the kind-hearted doctor was giving vent to his thoughts in fits and starts, he had been fumbling in his pocket, and he now laid before Mr.

Harris a folded manuscript, which the latter eagerly snatched and read. As he ran on, the face of the poor merchant gradually brightened, and soon a look of joy illuminated his whole countenance, and, when he had concluded, he cast it down, clasped his hands gratefully, and sank tearfully on his knees and thanked God.

The good doctor laughed, rubbed his hands, snuffed eagerly, wiped his eyes and kept murmuring "good, good!"

He had brought a confession, which he had taken down at the request of a dying man in the hospital; the man who had been so treacherously attacked and stabbed by his comrade in the cavern. The substance of the confession said, that Harold Stanly had hired himself—the dying man—and another, to watch Edward Harris, and to involve him in some difficulty which would eventually get him out of the way. That they had followed Edward into the gambling house on the night of the murder, and were witnesses to his trouble with the gambler—heard the threat of Harris to "fix him," and knowing that Edward must take the same road home, they followed the gambler from the place, attacked and robbed him, and left him dead on the ground. That they had seen Harris from a distant hiding place, leave the gambling house, and stoop over the body of the dead man; and it said, furthermore, that if the watchman had not so suddenly appeared, they would have seized Harris for the murder.

The confession also told of the abduction of Marion Lee, and her place of imprisonment. The confession was taken down in the presence of a number of witnesses, and shortly afterwards the man died.

It was placed before the proper authorities and shortly afterward Edward Harris was liberated. The police in company with Edward, old Mr. Harris, and Mr. Lee, went down to Ann Street, broke into the place where Marion was confined, and found the brave-hearted girl upon her knees, and in tears.

In a moment Edward was at her side. She looked up, and with a joyful cry was clasped in his arms. He kissed the poor maiden's cheek, but her face was cold. She had swooned upon his breast. When she returned to consciousness she found herself at home, and by her side him to whom she had, through all his trials, proved so faithful, Edward Harris.

Marion and Edward were united a few weeks afterwards—a joyful ending to all their sorrows.

Nothing was heard of Harold Stanly, but it was rumored that, on the discovery of his villany, he had entered the army and fell, bravely fighting, at the memorable storming of Vera Cruz.

THE RIVAL PILOTS:

—OR,—

THE MAID OF THE RAPIDS.

A STORY OF THE ST. LAWRENCE.

BY HERMAN BOLIVAR.

At a steamboat landing in one of the beautiful towns on the St. Lawrence, there lay the large and magnificent steamer Brockville, early one evening, just ready to start upon her course down the river. The shrill roar of the escape pipes, the busy movements of the crew, the arrival of passengers and freight, and the hurried voices of command, inquiry and adieu, all served to form a scene the most indifferent observer could not have beheld without interest, in the gathering twilight of that coming night.

For there is in the simplest embarkation something of the melancholy and uncertainty which belongs to the last great voyage of every human being. The flags may wave, and the streamers float proudly from the masthead, and the sun may shine, and the deep waters scarcely ripple as they kiss the shores, but we know that all our hopes of a prosperous and happy passage may be wrecked in an hour, so little has man, with all his wonderful works, yet achieved towards taking his destiny from the most minute and continual providences of God.

Among the last of the passengers coming aboard of the Brockville on the trip to which we now refer, was a young lady, scarcely seventeen years of age, and of such angelic beauty and grace that every eye resting upon her followed her movements with delight. She was the only child of the wealthy Colonel Ridout, of Montreal, one of the largest steamboat owners of the St. Lawrence, and was now returning to her splendid home, attended by a single maid. Often had Ada been up and down the mighty stream, with her father, and well had she treasured up the intricate turns and windings of the channel amid its rapids and its thousand islands, as we shall soon have occasion to reveal.

For a moment, as Ada Ridout came in over the planks, she bent a quick and searching glance upon the faces of the passengers clustered on the guards. This glance sufficiently attested that she was in hopes of seeing some familiar countenance among them, and a look of disappointment flitted over her lovely face, as she turned away in the direction of the ladies' cabin.

"Walter is not here, something evil has happened!" she could have been heard to whisper to her maid, in quick and gasping tones. "He said he would certainly come down in the Brockville, this very trip, and meet me as I came aboard, but I do not see him!"

Again the expectant girl came to a halt, looking around upon the faces presented to her view, but no sign of recognition appeared on her features or in her eyes. It was evident that her Walter was not there.

"It's too bad," said the maid. "But these men never have any regard for the feelings of us women—"

"Hush, Hetty," interrupted Ada, as tears dimmed her eyes. "Walter would have kept his promise if he had been able to do so. I feel that a terrible calamity has happened. Some enemy who knew of his—of our approaching marriage—ha!" and she started, as her eyes rested upon a person who was just then coming aboard, "that man, again! Let us hasten to the cabin!"

But ere the poor girl could make her way through the surrounding crowd, the object of her dread and dislike advanced to her side, laying his hand as roughly as boldly upon her arm, and saying:

"How d'ye do, Miss Ada? I'm glad to see you agin, you may be sure!"

He was one of the two pilots of the boat. The maiden turned towards him with such a look of scorn and disgust that he momentarily quailed beneath it. But there was a something infernal, for all that, in the expression resting on his hangedog visage, and something which Ada felt and feared had some reference to her missing lover.

"You have seen him?" she gasped.

"You kin think so, miss," was his reply. "P'r'aps he was here a little while ago, comin' down the river to meet you, 'eording to 'greement. Only he might have gone overboard a little suddenly—through somebody's aid—so that he ain't likely to come to your sweet arms jist at present—that's all!"

"Fiend, you've murdered him! I will have you arrested!"

"Softly, miss. You wont do nothing o' the kind. I'm the only chap that can pilot a boat down the Lachine Rapids on sich a night as this 'ere one that's comin', you know, and you wouldn't be so cruel as to keep all these peoples a-waitin' here till morning, in course not. Besides, you know that I was only a-joking! I dare say your doll 'll turn up all right in good season. In any case, you know, there must be proof, miss, proof before you can do much in a legal line, and what is the proof agin me? Supposing, now, jist for fun; supposing I'd put a feller I didn't like out of the way, by fetchin' him one on the guards and droppin' him overboard—"

Ada threw up her arms in such a way as to check the ruffian's speech, unable to hear more. With a low cry of anguish, and a countenance pale as death, she reeled into the arms of her maid, and was slowly conducted away towards the ladies' cabin.

"Gone, gone!" she moaned. "My dear Walter has been killed by that fiend! O, God, have mercy upon me! And those pilots, did you see them both, Hetty? This man and the one looking down the companion way a moment ago, both deadly enemies of mine, while professing to be my lovers, and each regarding the other as a rival. Alas, alas, it's wicked, Hetty, but I wish these two wretches would now kill each other on my sole account, I do!"

The maid smiled through her sympathetic tears, and said a great many cheering things to her mistress, declaring that Walter Norwood was young and strong, wary of people he did not like, and sure to take good care of himself if only for her sake—that God is merciful to those who truly love, and that Walter would come out safe in the end, whatever his present peril, and everything else her simple and faithful heart could suggest. More than that, in order to keep her mistress from brooding over her sorrow, Hetty asked her to narrate how the two pilots had cultivated her acquaintance while she was passing to and fro on the river, how they had presumed to ask her hand in marriage, how they had been rejected, how they had both sworn to be revenged, and had become her most wicked and dangerous foes, as well as foes of each other. Thus the mistress and maid conversed about the past, and commenced taking counsel for the future, while a sinister occurrence was preparing between the two pilots, as we shall now duly record.

The first of them, the one we have seen coming aboard of the steamer, on ascending to the upper deck, found himself in the vicinity of his co-laborer and his supposed rival. He had been ashore, taking a number of drams at a liquor-booth on the wharf, and had come off with a flushed face, a lowering brow and bloodshot eyes, all now attesting that he was ready for any deed of violence and blood. Both he and his conferees were men of middle age, brawny-armed and broad-shouldered, rude and rough in disposition, besides having enough of lawless selfishness and unholy passion to seek possession of the colonel's beautiful child. Both professed to have had such a cause of hatred against the father as to answer for any wrong they might show Miss Ada, and so each had resolved in his own base heart that the first fortunate hour should place her irrevocably in his power.

As the two pilots, after meeting on the upper deck, turned away towards the wheel-house, their eyes met in a cold and malignant glance of bitterness and rivalry.

"Now that the youngster is out o' the way!" said the one we have seen addressing Ada, "the girl shall be mine!"

"No, curse you," was the response, "she shall be mine!"

These brief words were uttered so plainly and determinedly as to be an electric spark applied to all their long-slumbering hate. For a moment they seemed about to rush upon each other, tearing and destroying, like two fierce bloodhounds, but the sharp voice of the captain broke the spell of violence, and they retreated sullenly to their post of duty.

The last box of freight was trundled aboard of the steamer, the last passenger arrived, the fastenings were cast off, the mighty engines commenced their labors, and the Brockville darted away on her flight down the river.

For three hours, and until the arrival of the steamer at the first of the Lachine Rapids, nothing of importance occurred. True, the captain had heard the pilots swearing and recriminating each other at intervals, though not violently enough to forbid a hope that they would get quiet. But, about the time when the Brockville began to feel the force of the rapids, it became evident that something was going wrong in the wheel-house, she veering first one way and then the other, abruptly altering her course several points from the true one, and momentarily threatening to run against some one of the many sanken rocks clustered beside the narrow channel.

"Thunder! what means all this?" inquired the honest captain (who was a new and inexperienced commander) of his clerk, as he started up in his office.

"The pilots must be drunk!" was the reply, as both prepared to visit the wheel-house.

"A fight, they're having a rough and tumble, the pilots are, and the boy's steering," cried somebody on the upper deck. "Look out, there, somebody do something, or we shall be brought up standing!"

Be the trouble whatever it might, it was now plain that trouble had arisen in the wheel-house, or that some accident had happened to the steering apparatus, a general panic almost instantly sped throughout the steamer. A score of men, among them the captain, made their way to the scene of disturbance, when loud and savage cries and oaths were heard proceeding from the pilots, showing that they were engaged in a deadly struggle.

"Stop them!" cried the captain.

"Shoot them!" said somebody else, and a score of voices made confusion of the attempt to suggest a proper relief.

In the meanwhile the steamer was steering so crazily, and so abruptly poking her nose to the right and left from the only safe channel, that every one familiar with the perils of the rapids seemed paralyzed with horror.

The next instant, amid a volley of oaths, threats, and sounds of a sanguinary encounter, the two combatants, covered with blood, and locked in a furious embrace, reeled out of the wheel-house, still fighting and cursing, the two presenting a most terrible and repulsive picture of the worst passions of man.

But not an instant had Captain Butters to gaze upon the fearful scene. With a crash which shook her timbers to the keel, the huge steamer had been hurled against a sunken rock, and was now going head on towards a black and jagged ledge of rocks just showing itself above the spray and foam dashing so wildly around it.

"Help here, all of you!" cried the captain, as he sprang to the assistance of the pilot-apprentice, a mere boy on his third or fourth trip. "Hard up, hard up! There, so—so! Now meet her. Steady, boy, steady!" And the course of the steamer was sufficiently altered to clear the craggy point, and send her back towards the channel.

"Now for you," was then heard in thunder tones from one of the pilots, the words resounding above the fearful roar of the rapids. "There's your place, my hearty, in yonder foaming abyss! Look there!"

Like lightning the steamer had been plunging down the Upper Chutes, quivering and crashing on its mad way, and now close ahead of her was seen, through the darkness, the Grand Rapids, rushing and spouting, leaping and tumbling, boiling like a vast cauldron, and roaring like a thousand tornadoes.

"There's your next landing, my beauty, ha, ha!" repeated the most powerful of the two ruffians, as both, mangled and bleeding, and still clasped in that deadly embrace, drew nearer and nearer to the steamer's larboard side. "We'll see who has the fair Lady Ada now—ha, ha!"

With one desperate effort, as the Brockville entered upon the dangerous passage, jarring and quivering, amidst the wild roar of the waters, the speaker raised his antagonist bodily in his strong arms, and sought to hurl him into the foaming abyss. But the latter exerted all of his strength, and the struggle was prolonged for a moment, during which Captain Butters rushed towards the infuriated men, frantically wringing his hands, and crying in agonized tones:

"The Grand Chute! the Grand Chute! I cannot pass it, and the boy knows nothing of the channel. For God's sake, men, give over this foolishness, or the steamer and all of us will be lost. Back to your duty this minute, or it will be too late!"

One moment the combatants had passed, glaring at each other, but only to seize one another again in a more determined grasp, ere the words of the commander were concluded. There followed an interval of fearful exertion on the part of each of the pilots—a shower of oaths and curses, partly lost in the roar of the waters, a hasty rush towards the steamer's side, a wild cry of triumph from one of the desperate wretches, and a moan of despair from the other—and the next moment both went splashing down into the boiling waters, just forward of the wheel, and almost instantly vanished from view forever!

"Lost, lost!" cried Captain Butters, in the voice of a madman, as he rushed frantically here and there. "I know nothing of the channel, in this darkness! We can never pass the Grand Chute!"

And yet how madly that huge fabric was still sweeping on!

"Lost, lost!" repeated a score of horror-stricken voices, in tones ascending wild and high above the roar of the rapids. "A minute more, and we shall be dashed to pieces! For God's sake, is there no one here who can pilot as down?"

Echo was the only reply, as the steamer still swept on with a velocity terrible to feel and to behold.

"There, there! Look at those rocks, that sea of foam shining through the darkness! Heaven have mercy upon our souls now! Help, help!"

Even while these despairing cries were ringing out on the air, a form of more than regal beauty had emerged from the ladies' cabin and hastily, yet gracefully, taken its way to the upper deck. With a night glass grasped firmly in one hand, while the other shook back her jetty curls, and her eyes swept the river and the shores, and took in at a glance the perilous situation of the steamer, Miss Ada looked so courageous and commanding in that moment, that her appearance was hailed as gladly as would have been an omen in the heavens.

"Bear a hand here, half a dozen of you," she cried, in clear and ringing tones, as she bounded to the wheel. "Lively, my hearties, or we are lost!"

The order was instantly obeyed.

"So, so," and she placed her own fair hands to the wheel. "Keep her so—steady, steady!"

Like a very angel did the brave girl appear to the affrighted souls beside her, as she drew a rough pilot coat around her fair shoulders, and calmly gave her orders, amidst the clank of the laboring engines, the roar of the rapids, the shrill notes of the escaping steam, and the voices of hope and thanksgiving on every hand, from many a throat going up a hearty "Thank God! thank God!"

But the peril was not yet passed. Beyond all the dangers the Brockville had encountered, there still remained the greatest of all, the passage of the Grand Chute of the Rapids. Here the bottom and sides of the channel are very jagged, and it is so narrow that a little deviation to the right or left must prove fatal. To the usual shadows of the night was now being added those of a coming snow storm, and the thick mantle of darkness had already thrown its folds so deeply over the scene, that the shores and the rushing waters looked ghostly and indistinct in its gloom.

But the steamer, under the watchful guidance of the maiden pilot, still continued to speed safely on. Peril after peril was passed in rapid succession; black and jagged cliffs left behind; leaping and thundering rapids swiftly traversed; and now the roar of the last chute began to fall chillingly upon the ears of the passengers and crew.

"One peril more," cried a rough voyager, whose form would have been seen to tremble but for the darkness of the hour. "It's that which will use us up, my boys! No mere girl like that can pilot us through the Grand Chute on such a night as this 'ere! Better to ease the engines, and drift gently down to our doom, my boys. Heavens!"

This last exclamation was caused by the ringing of the bell for the engineer to put on more steam. A score of other interjections arose, but the order was obeyed. More furiously clanked the engines, and swifter sped the steamer down the narrow channel, till it seemed as if the shores were flying past with the lightness and unreality of mere mists.

"Heavens!" repeated the voyager, clinging to the bulwarks and peering over the side. "Twenty miles an hour, if a single inch! W-h-e-w! And yet see how calmly and steadily that little angel holds her to it! See how erect she stands!

And see how boldly and confidently she sweeps the channel with her glass! Thunder and lightning—"

Again the voyager suddenly broke off his remarks with an excited exclamation, while the glass fell crashing to the deck from the maiden's hands, and many a voice again gave utterance to a cry of despair.

The cause of this new excitement was visible at a glance. It was seen, just as the steamer reached the middle of the Grand Chute, that a steamer was below the rapids! The glow of her furnace fires coming through the gloom, with a blood-red hue to every eye, while the roar of her escaping steam came stunningly upon every ear.

"My God! We are done for now!" cried the voyager. "What, another ring for more speed? Surely, that little dare-devil can't have seen the vessels below!"

But the eyes of Ada Ridout had seen and comprehended all at a glance. She knew that the commander of the steamer below the rapids had not expected that any one would dare to descend them on such a night, and had accordingly consented to take in tow a couple of schooners which had been disabled in descending, and was just making fast to them. The three vessels were therefore huddled, not exactly in the channel, but close beside it, so near that the slightest swerve of the Brockville would destroy them and herself.

Miss Ridout had realized all the facts in one brief instant, and again rang the bell for more speed. Like some fabulous monster that mighty thing of fire and of noise glowed and thundered down the narrow channel, amid the first puffs of the coming snow storm, the wild strife of the waters, the excited exclamations of her passengers and crew, and the still more agonized cries proceeding from the decks of the helpless vessels below.

On one side were the tall and jagged cliffs, rearing themselves high above the sunken rocks which formed the shore of the river, while on the other lay those helpless vessels, every moment surging out from the shore towards the channel, between the two appearing a narrow and boiling tide of water, as the only avenue of the steamer's escape from an instant and fearful destruction.

On swept the Brockville, like some huge bird, strongly and steadily in its terrible speed, for there was not only a pilot's knowledge, but a woman's noble heroism presiding at the wheel. Down the foaming chute, with a flashing and a roaring almost unearthly in its wildness, sped the endangered steamer, and soon she was within her length of the clustered vessels below, now in an awful silence waiting their doom.

"Port!" came in a smothered cry from one of them, as a raking glance showed that a collision of the steamers was inevitable, at the end of that dangerous passage, so much had the freighter surged out into the channel. "You are running us down!"

Not a word escaped the maiden's lips, as she measured the distance between the rocks on the one side, and the freighter on the other, and took an exact middle course between them. A moment of anxious suspense succeeded, an interval of freezing silence, and then, seemingly a volcanic monster of life amid all that strife and motion around her, the Brockville, with a single wild crash, sped past the stranger, carrying away its larboard wheelhouse and part of the wheel, but with no especial injury to either of the hulls.

A wild cry of wonder, of admiration and joy, arose from more than two hundred throats, as the maiden pilot rang the bell for the engines to cease working, the huge fabric trembling a moment in the surges, then passing into the clear water below the rapids, becoming perfectly safe!

"Three times three for the maid of the Rapids!" cried the voyager, dancing joyfully around the deck, and the cheers were given with a will.

And then, as all eyes were turned towards the stranger steamer, a boat was seen pushing off from her, bearing two men who came aboard of the Brockville. The first was Walter Norwood, the lover of our heroine, and the other her father, both of whom had been prevented from joining her as intended by reasons we need not record.

A week after this happy re-union, in one of those fine old mansions on Bayard Street, Montreal, there was a joyous union of fates and fortunes which endures to this day. The portrait of the maid of the Rapids hangs in the Académie des Arts, in that city, but is not more likely to perpetuate her heroism than the grateful remembrance of those scores of souls whom she rescued from destruction on that awful night when she became a fatal bone of contention to the RIVAL PILOTS.

OUR COAL-FIELDS.

Professor Rogers, after showing the areas and solid contents of the various known coal-fields, estimates that, at the present rate of consumption (100,000,000 of tons per annum), the coal-fields of Pennsylvania alone would meet the demand for 8164 years. If the consumption were doubled, viz., 200,000,000 of tons, the great Appalachian field would meet the strain for 6937 1-2 years. If it were quadrupled, viz., 400,000,000, the productive coal-fields of North America would suffice for the world's supply for 10,000 years yet.

A THRILLING STORY.

The following incident actually occurred on board of a British frigate, and was communicated to the writer, several years ago, by an old man-of-war's man:

A timid boy, about fourteen years of age, hesitated to go aloft, but by the captain's orders, was forcibly put in the main rigging, and then a boatswain's mate was commanded to lash him like a dog until he learned to run aloft. The poor fellow's legs and arms trembled, he grasped the shrouds, he cried, he prayed the inhuman captain for God's sake to have mercy on him; but all in vain. The boatswain's mate was ordered to lay on harder, and harder, regardless of the boy's piercing screams, which made even veteran seamen turn from the brutal scene with disgust. His clothes were rent from his back, the blood followed the lash, and still the tyrant roared out, "Lay on, boatswain's mate!"

With one wild scream he sprang from under the lash, and bounded up the rigging with amazing rapidity. He doubled the futtock rigging like a cat, passed up the topmast and topgallant rigging with undiminished speed, shinned the unrattled royal rigging, and perched himself like a bird alongside of the pennant which streamed from the masthead. Here he paused, looking fearlessly upon the deck below. All hands came up to see him—his cries and cruel treatment had already enlisted their sympathy, and, if possible, had increased their hatred of the captain.

The monster was smiling complacently at the success of his experiment; he was one of those tyrants who boasted that the cat, properly applied, could make men do anything. Still he was apprehensive that the boy might destroy himself, and the circumstance be used against him at the Admiralty, where he knew representations of his cruelty had already been made. The men gazed in silence, looking first at the boy and then at the captain, who was seated near the taffrail. They dared not to be seen speaking to one another—it was a flogging offence; even at night spies passed under their hammocks to ascertain if they whispered. The officers walked the lee side of the quarter-deck, occasionally casting their eyes aloft, but were as silent as the men. Still the boy clung to the masthead, playing with the pennant, apparently unconscious of the interest he excited below. Tired with gazing aloft, the captain sung out through the speaking-trumpet, "Down from aloft! Down!"

The boy sprang upon the truck at a bound, and raising himself erect, waved his cap around his head; then, stretching his arms out, gave a wild, laughing scream, and threw himself forward. The captain jumped to his feet, expecting to see the boy dashed in pieces on deck; but when clear of the shade of the sails, he saw him sliding along the main royal stay towards the foretopgallant masthead, and heard him laugh and chatter like a monkey, as if enjoying the sport. He reached the masthead in safety, and then descended along the top-gallant backstay hand-over-hand. The captain looked at him, and was about to speak, but could not find words. The boy frothed at the mouth and nose; his eyes seemed starting out of his head; he rolled upon the deck in convulsions, staining it with the blood which still trickled from his back. He was a maniac. The surgeon's skill in the course of a few weeks restored his bodily health, but not his reason.

From that time forward he was fearless. In the darkest night, the fiercest gale, he would scamper along the deck like a dog, and bound aloft with a speed which no one on board could equal. He would run over the yards without holding, pass from mast to mast on the stays, ascend and descend by the leeches of the sails, and run upon the studding sail booms. He was as nimble as a cat, and had forgotten fear. Some of the light duties aloft he learned to discharge in company with them—he did as they did, but could not be trusted to do anything himself. One order he always obeyed without hesitation. At the command, "Away aloft," he was off, and never paused until he reached the masthead. As he was harmless and rarely spoke, the captain kept him on board, and, in the course of a year, sent him aloft for amusement. His strength increased with his years, but his bulk and height remained nearly the same at eighteen as when he became a maniac.

His ribs, breast and back seemed one case of bone, and his sinews and muscles made his legs and arms appear like pillared columns. He was fair, with light blue eyes and delicate skin; his face oval and full, but void of expression—neither love, fear, revenge nor pleasure could be traced to its stolid outline. His eyes stared at everything without appearing to see, and, when he spoke, there was rarely any meaning in his words. He followed the men in their various duties like a dog following his master. Whenever he was struck or startled by a boatswain's mate, he ran up the main rigging, screaming at the top of his lungs, and never paused until he had performed the first evolution, which had made him a maniac.

As the sailor's story runs, the ship arrived at Plymouth to be docked and refitted. The captain, availing himself of the leisure, was going to be married, and the news was communicated by his servant to the cook, who soon circulated it on the berth-deck among the men, who cursed him and all his kin. His servant came on board of the hulk where the men were lodged, the evening when the captain was to be married. Crazy Joe (the name the boy was known by) met him at the gangway, and asked intelligently if the captain would be married that evening and where? The servant gave him the information he desired, and went about his business.

That night, while the captain was undressing, he was seized by the throat and dragged to the bridal bed. "Look, fair lady, on me," said Crazy Joe, "but do not scream, or I will kill you. Look on me. I hold within my grasp a devil, who delights in cruelty—a merciless fiend who has scourged the backs of hundreds of brave men—a ruffian who has robbed me of my reason; I hold him within the grasp of death, at the very moment his black soul thought itself within the reach of bliss. Monster! look upon your lady—think a moment of the heaven of earthly joy almost within your reach—then think of me, poor Crazy Joe! and of the hell to which I send you! Die, wretch, die!"

When the alarm was given, the strangled body of the captain was found lying alongside of the bridal bed; but the maniac who killed him was never recognized afterwards. He belonged to Cornwall, and probably found shelter from pursuit in the mines until the excitement passed away. The lady stated at the time, and many years afterwards, that the attack of the maniac was so sudden and silent that she knew nothing of it until the curtains were pushed aside and she felt the pressure of the captain's body bent over the edge of the bed. Joe held his victim around the neck with the right hand, and turned him from side to side as easily as if he had been a child, while the forefinger and thumb of the left hand grasped her own throat, ready to extinguish her life if she attempted to raise an alarm. His face was pale and deathlike, his eyes started, but were motionless, and every word he uttered seemed to issue from the very depths of his soul. The captain's looks were terrible beyond description—death left the impress of ferocity upon his darkened features. How the maniac entered or left the room she never knew; his departure was as noiseless as his entrance. So paralyzed was she with fear, that an hour elapsed before she could muster courage to call for help; but she thanked God, when the captain's cruel character became generally known ashore, that she had been rescued from his alliance.—London Nautical Magazine.

AFRICAN VILLAGERS.

In well nigh every village we saw men spinning cotton, while others were weaving it into strong cloth, in looms of very simple construction. Both spinning and weaving are very tedious processes. They are all anxious to trade. The women were often up all night, grinding their corn to sell to us. One village we passed without halting. The inhabitants followed us, calling upon our guide to return to trade with them. As a last argument they shouted, "Are we to have it said that white people came to our country and we did not see them?" They are by no means teetotallers. Large quantities of beer are manufactured by them, and they are as fond of it as our people are of whiskey. The chief of a village almost always presented us with a pot of beer. We passed a village one day, and saw a large party of men sitting smoking in the public square, who did not seem at all communicative. After resting a little under a tree a short distance from them, they sent us a calabash of beer to see if we were friends, which was to be manifested by our partaking of it. We saw many partially intoxicated people—tipsy chiefs—and even members of the learned professions get "a little elevated at times." A native doctor, with his cupping-horn hanging round his neck, who had evidently been making some deep porations, came out and scolded us severely—"Is this the way you enter a man's village, without sending him word that you are coming?" Entering a hut, he came out staggering under a large pot of beer.—Mr. Charles Livingston (in a letter to Mr. William Logan, Glasgow.)

AGE.

What is age
But the holy place of life, chapel of ease
For all men's wearied miseries!—and to rob
That of her ornament, it is accursed
As from a priest to steal a holy vestment,
Ay, and convert it to a sinful covering.

A WELCOME TO SPRING.

BY LILIAN BOWEN.

Whose breath is this, stealing along on the gales?
 Whose sigh is this, coming from flower-lighted vales?
 Gentle Spring!

Whose odors are these, like the twilight rain
 On the jasmine flowers that cover the plain?
 Thine, gentle Spring!

Who lightens the fangs on our northern pine?
 Who gives the pale gems to the Mayflower vine?
 Gentle Spring!

Who glides o'er the moss with an emerald hue?
 Who wakes the young violets starry and blue?
 Thou, gentle Spring!

Who hangs the long tassels o'er birchen trees gay?
 Who breathes through the tamarack boughs in their play?
 Gentle Spring!

Who calls the bright flowers of crimson and gold,
 O'er the gnarled maple boughs all mossy and old?
 Thou, gentle Spring!

Who blows on the willow buds silvered with down,
 And tinted leaves start from their coverings brown?
 Gentle Spring!

Who calls up the odors dark green and rank,
 And the blue flags gay from the meadows dank?
 Thou, gentle Spring!

All hail! thou 'st awakened the rannel and stream,
 Brought birds, and flowers, and sunshine gleam,
 Lovely Spring!

The herds are leaping on a thousand hills,
 Trampling down flowers by the winding rills:
 Hail, gentle Spring!

THE FALSE ORACLE.

BY WALTER CLARENCE.

SEVERAL years ago, not long after the Frenchman Daguerre astonished the world by the production of his sun pictures, and when dollars were given as freely as cents are now-a-days for a daguerreotype with not half the embellishment and finish of the plainest which now appear in the show-cases at every street-corner—two young persons might have been seen—not riding on horseback down a steep hill—but emerging from the shop of an itinerant daguerreotypist, who had temporarily set up his tent in the most fashionable part of one of the most populous towns in the interior of the Province of Ulster, in the North of Ireland. Of course they had been to have their portraits taken in the new style, which had caused so much wonder and excitement, that some superstitious people declared that the practice was uncanny, and that its professors invoked the aid of the evil one, to enable them to work such miracles.

A brief record of the conversation that passed between the youthful couple, will enable the reader to understand the positions in which they stood towards each other, after which I will proceed with my story.

"It's wonderful—astounding!" exclaimed the young woman—young lady, I should say, for her manners, voice and attire all showed that she belonged to the upper crust of society—"Do you think the likeness good, Edward?"

"Very good indeed, Emily, only not half handsome enough," was the reply of the youth, who was attired in a sort of naval uniform, only in place of the crown and anchor which appear on the navy button, the device on those which ornamented the young sailor's coat-sleeves was a lion rampant, in heraldic parlance, above a single fowl-anchor. "Not half handsome enough," he repeated. "One might imagine you were stationed in the maintop of an Indianman, on the lookout for land. You seem to be gazing into vacant space, and the expression of the features is too thoughtful."

"It is my fault, Edward," said the young girl. "I did look thoughtful—I cannot help thinking of your approaching departure. Have you thought of what we were speaking about last night? It is not yet too late. What need have you to go to sea? Edward, dear, I have a strange presentiment of forthcoming evil. Don't sail on this voyage, for my sake, Edward?"

"I must, Emily," responded the young man. "I should be ashamed to resign my appointment at the last moment, and you know the Mozambique sails ten days from to-day. My resignation would be attributed to cowardice, I should become the laughing-stock of my friends and shipmates, and you would not wish that. I shall return in twelve months, and then you know you are to become my wife, and I promise to give up the sea forever. Is it not sufficient," he laughingly added, "that I voluntarily give up the profession I love so well, for the sake of such a little thing as you, whom I love so much better? Would you have me break my promise to the captain, and expose myself to ridicule and contempt, without having any reason to give for my fickleness?"

"Not so, Edward," replied the young woman, "you know I would not; but I don't know why, I never felt so in my life before when you were about to sail—but now, something within me seems to forebode approaching evil. I shall be wretched all the time you are away. I shall dream of storms and shipwrecks, and every time the wind blows heavy, I shall fancy you are exposed to its fury, and in a position of peril. I wish there was no such thing as the sea. I cannot conceive how any one who is not obliged to follow it for a livelihood, can take delight in passing day after day in the midst of discomfort and peril. To me it is inexplicable."

The young man laughed merrily.

"Emily, you little coward," he said, "you deserve to be indicted for libel, for giving the sea such a character. Why, you never saw salt water in your life. I am going to sail for the East Indies, and sometimes the sea during such a voyage is smooth as a mill-pond, and the wind so light that it would scarcely move one of your own long, silken tresses. Come, cheer up. Let us look forward to the happiness that awaits us on my return. You have not told me what you think of my portrait."

"It is very like you," said the young woman. "The smile upon your lips is so natural! I shall often look upon it while you are absent, and fancy you are present in your own person."

"Not oftener than I shall look at your picture," returned the young man, "though I wish it did not look so sad. Emily," he continued, smiling at the conceit, "an idea has just struck me, by which you may learn to overcome your foolish fears. Look at the portrait every day, and as long as it appears happy and smiling as it does now, believe that I am also well and happy."

"I will," replied the young woman, smiling in spite of herself at the notion; "but," she added, "should sickness or trouble overtake you, I am afraid the portrait would prove a false oracle."

Edward S—— and Emily G—— (the story I am about to relate, is true in regard to its main facts, and therefore I shall not give the full names, since the relatives and friends of both are still living), had known each other from childhood. Edward S—— was an orphan, whose parents had died when he was an infant, leaving him heir to a large property, and in charge of a guardian, until he completed his twenty-first year. At the period when my story opens, he still lacked six months of that age. As a mere child he had possessed an irresistible desire to go to sea, and at the age of fifteen his guardian had, at his own earnest request, exerted his influence to obtain for him an appointment as midshipman in the Honorable East India Company's service, in which service he had already risen to the rank of second mate, a position at that period as honorable and much more lucrative than that of an officer of the corresponding rank in the royal navy. He, as well as Emily, was a native of a large city in the interior of Ireland, and thus it happened, as he had expressed himself, that Emily had never seen the sea.

The parents of Emily G—— were living, and in wealthy circumstances. They were aware of the young man's partiality to their daughter, and had given their consent to the marriage of the young couple, as soon as Emily had completed her eighteenth year—she was at this period just seventeen—on condition that the young man should quit the sea-service, and settle down on his estate, which adjoined their own.

It would be futile to attempt to explain the causes which tend to a reciprocity of affection between two young people of opposite sexes. There is something within us which attracts us to those who possess the qualities which we feel conscious we most lack. As a general rule we seem to like contrasts, either in our love or hate. No two persons could be more unlike, mentally or physically, than Edward S—— and Emily G——. Edward was a tall, stout, broad-shouldered, light-haired, blue-eyed, muscular, yet withal, handsome young fellow, who laughed at the idea of fear, and who would at any time have volunteered to lead a forlorn hope by land or sea, for the mere excitement of the thing. Morally, he was straight-forward, honest and impetuous, but as devoid of anything like sentiment as it were possible for a youth of fair education and good family, used in early life to refined society, to be. What could have led him to love Emily—and, to tell the truth, he almost worshipped her—puzzled everybody; for Emily, though a very pretty girl, was slight and delicate, silent and reserved, and, as most young men of her acquaintance said, cold, impassive and immobile, possessing none of those little sympathetic enthusiasms so charming in her sex. Her complexion was a clear olive, her eyes dark, and her hair thick, wavy, and black as night—but those large, dreamy eyes of hers, though actually cast down and curtained beneath her long, silky eyelashes, were, when her feelings were awakened, full of inexpressible tenderness. I have known her, when listening to a tale of woe, to sit silent and apparently heedless, while the young girls of her acquaintance were loud in their exclamations of sympathy. I have seen little subscriptions got up, impromptu, to assist some poor creature recently widowed; some laborer lamed by accident, and having a wife and children dependant upon him for support; or some poor orphaned child; and all bestowed their dole with looks of tender pity. Emily would seem to draw within herself, and give nothing—not even a kind word—and her friends thought her heartless! But the next day, or if the case were pressing, the same night, while those who had been profuse with sympathies and liberal in donations, which after all were unfelt by them, Emily might have been found, a patient watcher by the bedside of the sufferer, seeing that not only he or she, as the case might be, should want for nothing that money or the gentlest sympathy could provide, but that the children dependent upon them should lack no necessity or comfort. I have known her to sit up night after night by the bedside of a poor sufferer of her own sex, not only dispensing earthly comfort, but praying for her and with her, and thinking no privation too great for her so long as it could afford her bodily or mental relief. And from these missions of angelic—no, of pure womanly love—she would return by stealth, fearful lest her charity should be known and blazoned forth before the world. This was the young girl whom her companions called heartless; this was she who had given to the handsome young sailor lad a love as fond and true and unselfish as was his for her.

Singular presentiments come over us all sometimes, for which we can in no way account. As I have said, Emily G—— had never seen the sea in her life; but her imagination, probably kindled by reading in early life of some terrible calamity at sea, had pictured the ocean as a place of eternal storm, of waves rolling mountain high, and never in a state of quietude; of dreariness and desolation in its wide expanse, and of shipwreck and death on its rockbound shores, and something whispered to her that her betrothed lover would surely meet with some terrible mishap, if, indeed, he ever returned to her, if he proceeded on this last voyage.

Had her parents not resolutely insisted upon her waiting until she had completed her eighteenth year, before they would give their consent to her marriage, she would have overcome the reserve of innocent maidenhood, and have offered at once to become Edward's wife, if then he would have consented to remain at home. Once she told him this in innocent confidence, and the young man had tenderly replied:

"That indeed would be a temptation too strong to resist, dear Emily; but, alas, neither my guardian nor your parents would consent to such a plan."

So the day drew near when Edward was to leave Ireland and rejoin his ship in the East India docks, in London. He bade good-by to Emily and her only sister, a child of ten years of age, with forced calmness, for though he dreaded no unforeseen evil, her low spirits had naturally a depressing effect upon him. But he assumed a gaiety he did not feel, and, like most people who have little but what is practical in their nature, being pleased with the poetic ideas which had seized him when conversing about the daguerreotype, he said, as he gave her a farewell kiss:

"Remember, Emily, darling, I leave a talisman behind me. Look daily at my portrait, and so long as it smiles upon you, be sure that I am well and happy as I can be when absent from you; and believe that I shall carry your portraits in my bosom and study it at every moment of leisure."

Emily's little sister came to bid farewell to her favorite Edward. It only wanted a fortnight to her birthday, when she was to give a grand child's party.

"I am sorry, Carry, that I can't accept your kind invitation to your party," he said, as he lifted the child in his arms and kissed her; "but I give my birthday present beforehand." And he presented the little girl with a doll and baby-house, and bade her be a good child and take care of Emily in his absence, and he would bring her a handsome present from India.

He set forth for London, and two days after his arrival the Indiaman sailed.

Emily, with all her dreamy thoughtfulness, was not given to superstition, yet—we all will do such silly things—she felt as if there was some reality in what Edward had jestingly said respecting his portrait, and day after day, and every hour in the day, she gazed upon the daguerreotype, and felt a secret comfort in the handsome, smiling, cheery aspect of her absent lover.

A week had elapsed since the departure of the Mozambique, and the day was at hand when little Carry was to give her child's party to commemorate the attainment of her tenth birthday. The children of all the gentry for miles around were invited, and many of the children of the more respectable of the tenants also received invitations. It was to be quite a grand affair, and Emily was so much occupied in assisting her mother to prepare for this occasion, that she had little time to brood over her grief at Edward's absence. It was a fortunate thing in that regard, that the party was to come off at this particular time.

The day before the party was to meet, Counsellor Darcey, Edward's guardian, who being a friend of the G——s, had received and accepted an invitation to attend, was sitting at breakfast, enjoying the perusal of the morning paper, just fresh and damp from the press. Naturally the departure of his ward on a long voyage only a few days before, drew his attention to the shipping intelligence; and in the hope of seeing some notification that the Mozambique had been spoken by some vessel inward bound, off the Lands-end, or in the Chops of the Channel, he turned to the columns appropriated to furnishing such intelligence. Suddenly the hand which held the newspaper dropped on his knees, and he let fall the dry toast with which he was toying in the other hand, while the exclamation—

"Good God! can it be true? Poor boy—poor boy!" escaped his lips.

The little paragraph which caused the discomfort, ran as follows:

"SHOCKING INTELLIGENCE!—We regret to report the sad intelligence received by the barque Eleanor, of Bristol, arrived at Portsmouth, homeward bound from Jamaica, of the supposed total loss by fire of the Honorable East India Company's ship Mozambique. The Mozambique, it will be recollected, sailed from the Downs on Monday night last, for Bombay, Calcutta, and Canton, with a cargo of immense value, and several passengers for Bombay. The Eleanor saw a large vessel answering the description of the Mozambique in every particular, entirely enveloped in a sheet of flame which reached the height of her royal-mast-heads, on Thursday, at midnight. Bore down to her as closely as possible without imperilling the safety of the barque; but while lying to at the distance of a quarter of a mile, the magazine of the burning vessel exploded, blowing her to fragments. Several timbers of large size were hurled aloft, apparently to twice the height of a ship's mast-heads, and fell so near the Eleanor as to risk that vessel's safety. After the explosion the master of the Eleanor hove to, and lay off and on near the scene of the explosion till daylight, in hopes to save such of the crew or passengers as might have taken to the boats for safety. But though the weather was fine and the sea very smooth, no sign of a boat was seen. It is feared that every soul on board the unfortunate vessel perished. At noon, on Friday, conceiving it useless to remain longer searching for those who it was hoped might have escaped with their lives, the master of the Eleanor made sail and came to anchor in Portsmouth roads, on Saturday, at ten o'clock, A. M."

"Poor boy—poor boy!—poor creatures! Ah, poor Emily!" Counsellor Darcey sat perfectly still, as if paralyzed, the newspaper still resting on his knees, his breakfast unheeded, repeating in parrot-like manner these and similar exclamations. Suddenly a faint gleam of hope enlivened his features. He raised the newspaper again to re-peruse the paragraph.

"It may not have been the Mozambique, after all," he said. "The paragraph says a large vessel resembling the Mozambique. All Company's ships are much alike, and three have sailed for India within the fortnight. The wind has hung at the southwest, too. None of them could have more than got clear of the channel."

This faint, and it must be confessed, somewhat selfish hope—for, like most people in such circumstances, Mr. Darcey thought more of the one life of his young ward and favorite, than of those of the whole three ships' crews and passengers besides—was soon dashed to the ground, for lower down in the same column, he read the following addendum:

"It is ascertained that the Indiaman seen on fire, and seen afterward to explode, by the master and crew of the Eleanor, and supposed to have been the Mozambique, as recorded above, was indeed that magnificent vessel. Late on Saturday, the pilot-boat Skimmer of the Seas came into Portsmouth, and reports having picked up several pieces of charred and floating wreck, among them a washboard and a ship's fire-bucket, having the words 'Mozambique of London' painted thereon. The crew of the pilot-boat fell in with no boats or rafts from the burnt vessel, though she was cruising near and over the ground for twenty-four hours, and the reflection of the flames and the noise of the explosion were seen and heard on board. We fear it is too true that every soul on board the ill-fated Indiaman has perished."

Again Mr. Darcey dropped the paper on his knee and repeated to himself: "How shocking!" Then he began to consider how best to act.

"I am to start by the mail for A—," he soliloquized, "at ten, P. M. To-night is Carry's party, and I have promised to attend. It seems a cruel mockery to allow the party to proceed under these terrible circumstances, for every grown person and child who will be there knows poor Edward S—. I have no mind to go, and yet it is better that I should. They won't hear the news to-night, but to-morrow it will be in the A— Semi-weekly Journal, which the G—s take. Poor little Emily! should she chance to come upon it suddenly, it will kill her instantly—she'll drop as if she were shot! I know her well. O dear! O dear! what a shocking thing! Still, there is hope. There is always hope until the certainty is known. Boats have been known to put off from burning vessels, and have not been seen or heard of for a week. Of course, they'd get as far from the burning ship as possible, anticipating the explosion. Had I best go down and hint the possibility of an accident quietly to Emily—choosing my time, and by degrees—and after assuring her that there may be hope, tell her all? Or is it best to leave her to find it out herself? The first plan is the better of the two, though I don't like the task; but, as I have said, if she sees it suddenly, without previous preparation, it will kill her, poor child! Perhaps they may have already heard of it, though that's not likely. I'll go at any rate. Dear me, dear me, how shocking! 'In the midst of life we are in death.' 'Man that is born of woman hath but a short time to live.' 'Though the wicked flourish like a green bay tree, he is cut down'—no that's not it—besides, Edward wasn't wicked, as human nature goes."

And thus soliloquizing, intermingling somewhat garbled, but what he considered appropriate texts of scripture, the good natured but somewhat eccentric counsellor rang for his servant, and retiring to his dressing-room, commenced to make preparations for his sad journey—his anticipated pleasure turned to anxiety and pain.

All was gaiety and pleasing enjoyment at the seat of Patrick G——, Esq., near the city of A——, county Armagh, when Counsellor Darcey, who had alighted from the stage at a cross-road, half a mile from the dwelling, entered the house. Many of the young folks had already arrived, some of the youngest accompanied by nursery-maids, and every few minutes a fresh carriage stopped at the gate of the park, and discharged a happy juvenile band. Invitations had been issued to sixty children, and, as many were accompanied by their parents, these, with the nurses and other guests, raised the number to considerably over a hundred. Every conceivable plan had been adopted to provide for the entertainment of the juveniles, both in and out of doors. Swings had been erected in the park; ball-alleys had been formed; kites, hoops, bats and balls, leaping-poles—in fact, everything that could be thought of, had been provided in profusion. Chinese lanterns were suspended from the trees, to be lighted at night; a miniature stage had been erected and scenery hired for the occasion, from the theatre at A——. Nothing that it was thought would afford pleasure and variety of entertainment to the children was wanting, while indoors a large hall had been prepared for dancing, and a band of music hired. There was also a large room appropriated for the display of a huge magic-lantern, the exhibition of which was to close the festival; and, as many of the children had never seen a magic-lantern, this spectacle was looked forward to with a kind of awful curiosity.

The supper tables were abundantly supplied with dainties and fruits of every description and amply garlanded with flowers. Such a juvenile entertainment had never been heard of in the neighborhood before, and the grown folks were almost as much excited as the little ones. The park had the appearance of a fair-ground. Servants were bustling about in all directions, and amidst them were seen Mrs. G—— and Emily, as busy as bees, issuing orders and superintending the various preparations going forward.

Counsellor Darcey was very fond of children, and at another time he would have entered heart and soul into the spirit of the thing. Now all these preparations for pleasure only increased his anxiety and sadness, and yet he thought it advisable, for the present, to disguise his apprehensions and heart-burnings. He was speedily pressed, with Mr. G—— and other gentlemen, into the ladies' service, and sad as he was at heart, was soon as busy as those around him.

"Ah," he sighed, "as yet they have heard nothing, poor creatures! Poor Emily, little does she anticipate the sad tidings in store for her! But I will not spoil the party. 'Sufficient for the hour is the evil thereof.' I will say nothing till I speak to Emily alone, at night."

Emily had grieved sorely over the departure of her lover, and scarcely an hour had passed that she had not "consulted her oracle," as she called it; slipping away to her own room to look at Edward's portrait on each occasion, with a kind of feverish apprehension lest she should find the smile had faded away from the well-formed lips. For though she laughed at the superstition, and knew it was folly, she really had attached an involuntary importance to Edward's playful remark. Have we not all of us been as foolish at one time or other of our lives?

But the portrait had smiled as cheerfully and lovingly as ever, and now to-day she was so busy that her cheerfulness had returned, and perhaps for the first time since Edward had left, she had, for a few moments at a time forgotten him. The counsellor sighed bitterly as he watched her flitting to and fro, stopping now and then for a few moments to greet some new arrival, or to caress some little favorite, and thought how soon her renewed cheerfulness would be changed into sorrow and distress, if, indeed, nothing worse occurred. If Edward had really perished, he feared the worst! The entertainments began. The air resounded with the joyous shouts and the merry laughter of the children. Each distinct amusement was brought into requisition by one party or another, and before dark the tea-table was spread upon the lawn, and all partook of the good fare provided for them. Then the Chinese lanterns were lighted, and the house was lit up at the same time. Those who chose to remain out of doors, amused themselves there; those who preferred dancing or indoor amusements adjourned into the house, and soon some scores of little feet were keeping time to the music of the band, while the older folks, unable to resist the temptation, formed sets of quadrilles, or polkaed among themselves. Even the counsellor found himself compelled to dance with Emily, in order to conceal his low spirits, which had already caused much comment. As yet he had not been able to raise his courage sufficiently to hint anything to his young favorite, though he had more than once advanced towards her with that intention, but the words he intended to utter stuck in his throat. His was, perhaps, the only heavy heart in that large and happy assemblage.

And now the crowning entertainment of the evening, the exhibition of the magic-lantern, was to take place. The room was darkened, with the sole exception of the smallest possible jet of gas. The darkness increased the mystery, and even added to the terror felt by some of the younger children. A large sheet on which to reflect the figures, was drawn across the farther end of the apartment, and chairs and forms were closely ranged, for all who desired to witness the performance to seat themselves upon.

While these preparations were being made, Emily, for the first time since morning, stole up stairs, in order to have a peep at Edward's portrait. Her conscience seemed to reproach her for having allowed anything to cause her to forget, even for a few hours, him, whom her imagination pictured as battling with continuous storms and tempests, and all sorts of perils—the more terrible because she was so perfectly ignorant of the sea and all belonging to it, save what she had learned by reading, or had heard from Edward—and without any intention of alarming her, Edward, like most sailors, old or young, when called upon to relate his experience on the salt sea-wave, had been prone to tell stories of old ocean in its wrath and might, rather than in its more smiling moods, and, perhaps, in order to add to the dramatic effect, and increase the wonder of his auditors, to "draw the long bow," and indulge somewhat in exaggeration.

The visage of the hearty, handsome, blue-eyed, curly-haired sailor, gaily attired in the uniform of the Honorable East India Company's marine, looked happy and smiling as ever, and after pressing her lips to it, Emily restored it to its hiding-place, and returned to her company. Her short absence had, however, been remarked, and as her engagement to Edward, and her possession of his daguerreotype was no secret, she was rallied upon the cause of her leaving the room.

Reserved and retiring as she was by nature, she was not one to be ashamed of her love, or to pretend indifference, coyness or prudery, when once she had given her heart into her lover's keeping, and with a charming blush, which made her look truly beautiful, she confessed to the object of her visit. As I have said, nearly every one present had known Edward &—, though a good many of the grown people who had come from a distance, had not seen the young man since he entered the company's service.

A desire was expressed to see the portrait, and Emily readily consenting, brought it down stairs, and with a mixture of diffidence and pride, exhibited it to her friends. Most recognized the features, all admired the portrait—and while a group of persons were still looking at it, the whole party were summoned to see the magic-lantern. The fears of the younger children soon gave way to loud mirth, as one after another, the grotesque, highly-colored figures were passed in review across the white sheet which served for a disc. Mr. Darcey had watched an opportunity to seat himself by the side of Emily, quite in the rear of the rest of the company, for he could not find it in his heart to witness the color fly from her cheek, and at the least, anxiety and alarm take the place of her innocent joyousness; yet, time was passing away apace. The morrow would bring the dreaded newspaper, and with it the shock which the counsellor wished to deaden, and at the same time inspire the poor girl with hope that Edward had escaped in one of the boats and was safe, and would soon be heard from, or perhaps would return to his home. He knew nothing of Emily's singular presentiment of evil, or he would have found the difficulty of his position enhanced. As it was, there was no time to lose; the company would soon disperse; so he, somewhat coward-like, chose the darkness of the room, and the abstraction of the host and guests, to give her the hint he desired.

The young man to whom the magic-lantern belonged, had exhausted most of his more comic figures and scenes, and he now requested the musicians to play soft music, and as the strains arose, an expanse of ocean beneath a bright blue sky appeared on the disc, and presently a ship was seen with all sail set, gliding gracefully over the blue water. Then the music changed to harsh, discordant strains—for a moment there was a blank, and then appeared another ship, dismasted and with torn sails, tossed madly to and fro on the stormy billows, while overhead the lightning flashed—and the music gave forth sounds in imitation of squalls of wind, rain and thunder. Emily trembled and shuddered as she gazed. Mr. Darcey noticed her alarm, and forbore as yet to speak.

Again there was a blank, and the next moment, to the accompaniment of a mournful wail from the music, there passed slowly across the disc a scene representing a portion of rocky sea-coast. The heavens were again bright, the sun shining, and the sea calm; but close to the rocks lay portions of wreck, and on the sandy beach, partially immersed in the water, were seen the bodies of drowned men, their pale faces upturned to the bright sky.

"O, this is horrible!" exclaimed Emily, with a shudder.

"It is but a fancy picture," said Mr. Darcey. "Shipwrecks are rare, and the sea in low latitudes is more often calm, and the sky bright, as in the first scene, than stormy and canopied by clouds."

"Now prepare—prepare—prepare to see a ghost," said the young man, in charge of the magic-lantern. Some of the children uttered screams, more of affected than real terror, and others laughed and bade the ghost "Come on."

A ludicrous scene representing a parcel of country bumpkins flying in terror from one of their comrades, who had wrapped himself in a sheet, and had hoisted above his head a huge scooped turnip, into which a candle had been stuck, which reflected on the face of the turnip the outlines of human features, passed across the disc. The laughter was loud and long—there was little of the terrible in this ghostly exhibition. Emily laughed with the rest, and Mr. Darcey took this opportunity of speaking to her in relation to the subject which had been uppermost in his mind all day.

"Would you be very much frightened, Miss Emily," he commenced, "if you were to hear something which might sound to you like bad news?"

Her alarm took the turn he anticipated immediately. She seized his arm, and in a tone of piteous terror, cried out:

"O, Mr. Darcey, you would speak of Edward! Ah, that scene!—the storm, the shipwreck, the drowned men! Edward has been wrecked. Tell me—tell me all! I felt, I knew that evil was hovering over us!"

"You are mistaken, dear Emily," said the counsellor. "I do not know that harm has happened to Edward, and—and—there are other dangers to be met with at sea, besides shipwreck."

"O, tell me—tell me—he is drowned—he is dead—tell me! Do not—O do not keep me in suspense!" cried the agonized girl.

"I have not said—I do not know that Edward has suffered harm," replied Mr. Darcey. "To be sure, an accident is reported, but—"

"Prepare—prepare to see a second ghost," cried the young man, who guided the magic-lantern, assuming a sepulchral tone of voice.

Mr. Darcey was hesitating how, after all, he should hint to Emily the possibility of accident having happened to her lover, and at the same time inspire her with hope, when the outlines of a gigantic human head began to show themselves on the disc, gradually becoming more distinct, till the ghastly, pallid features were clearly visible. A sense of terror affected all who gazed upon it. And now, as it appeared perfectly distinct, Carry gave utterance to a scream, and said:

"O, it is Edward—it is Edward!"

Others immediately recognized the features, Mr. Darcey among the rest. The head was larger than life; it was of gigantic size. The complexion was pale as marble, and the features were slightly distorted, but they were unmistakably those of Edward S—.

Counsellor Darcey said afterwards, that at that moment he felt assured in his own mind that Edward had really perished, although he could not account for the strange apparition on the disc. But there was other matter to call the attention of all from the mummery of the magic-lantern. On seeing the terrific figure which represented the features of her lover, pale and distorted in the agonies of death, immediately after Mr. Darcey had uttered his warning words, Emily had arisen from her seat, and stood for a moment erect and rigid as a statue. Then, with a fearful shriek which long rung in the ears of those who heard it, she fell senseless, lifeless to the floor. All was confusion and consternation. The lights were turned on, and sympathizing spectators gathered around the lifeless form of the poor girl, who was lifted from the floor and carried to a sofa. The young man who had conducted the magic-lantern, came forward with the rest.

"I am very, very sorry," he said. "I meant no harm. It was intended as a joke. I did not anticipate this. I thought to amuse, and perhaps for a moment to terrify the company by exhibiting the reflection of Edward S—'s daguerreotype on the disc. I took it up unperceived, and placed it in the slide of the lantern—I never expected this."

His explanations were, however, unheeded. All were too busy in endeavoring to resuscitate the unfortunate Emily. But their endeavors were useless. She lay rigid and motionless—a slight palpitation of the heart alone told that she was not dead. The lately happy party dispersed, all save one or two intimate friends, and two physicians, who were among the guests. All through the night Emily lay in this condition, showing no signs of returning animation.

In the morning the expected newspaper came and brought the intelligence of the burning and explosion of the Indiaman, but long before that Mr. Darcey had told the sorrowful story, and though the cause of the strange apparition was known to have been the unpardonable practical joking of a comparative stranger, all who heard the story were fully impressed with the belief that the young sailor had perished.

Throughout the day Emily lay in the same condition. The physicians shook their heads and said that the poor girl's nerves had received such a shock that her vital system was destroyed. It was not likely that she would ever recover. The distress of her parents may be conceived; but the counsellor, much as he loved and pitied her, thought secretly that it was perhaps all for the best. If she awoke to consciousness and heard the intelligence of the loss of the Indian-man, he was satisfied that a relapse would occur, and death ensue.

So passed the dismal day, but just at nightfall a carriage drove up the avenue and stopped at the door. There came a ring at the bell. The door was opened by a servant, and the next moment all present in the room where Emily lay, started at the appearance of what they believed to be Edward's ghost. But it was no ghost, it was the young man himself! He had escaped in one of the boats from the burning ship, with most of the passengers and crew. As a matter involving their own safety, they had got as quickly as they could, as far as possible from the burning wreck, anticipating the explosion. The wind and current had carried them over toward the French coast, and two days elapsed ere they were able to make a port in the British Channel. Fearing the effect of the intelligence on Emily, Edward had immediately started for Ireland, but he only arrived to find her whom he loved dearer than life, already, as it were, in the cold embrace of death. His own feelings I dare not attempt to describe. I leave this to the imagination of my readers. He stood, too much agonized with grief to shed a tear, over the couch of the unconscious girl, who since the fatal shock had not shown the faintest sign of returning animation. Only once, as he held her cold hand, he raised his voice in a wail of intense grief and called her by name. To the surprise of every one, she opened her eyes, and recognizing her lover, smiled with an expression of ineffable joy.

"Emily!" he cried again—"Emily, speak, love—speak, my own darling. Say that you know me—that you will recover for my sake!"

The lips of the dying girl moved tremulously, but for some moments no words were audible. Edward bent his head and placed his ear close to her lips. Then he heard her murmur:

"Edward, dearest, my love, my husband, you did not expect me so soon, but I could not live on earth without you."

The lips ceased to move. There was a slight convulsive tremor of the frame, and the spirit of the loving girl passed away to Him who gave it! Then Edward gave full vent to the long-suppressed grief which was consuming him, and throwing himself upon the bosom of the pale corpse, beautiful in death, he wept long and loud, tears of the bitterest anguish!

From that hour he was a changed man, his once high spirits had departed forever. He quitted the Honorable Company's service, and took up his abode on his estate, contiguous to that of Mr. G——. But he avoided all society, and appeared to have retained no feelings in common with his fellow-men. Day after day he might have been seen, in all weather, lingering for hours in moody silence, over the tomb of his betrothed in A—— churchyard.

At length this life of inactivity became insupportable, and the death he really prayed for would not come. At this period, Sir John Franklin was on the eve of sailing on his last fatal expedition to the Arctic seas. Edward subscribed liberally to the expenses of the expedition, and sought and obtained an appointment as a volunteer officer in the Erebus, commanded by the gallant and lamented Sir John Franklin in person.

The expedition sailed, and long ere now the unhappy youth has found the death he craved for in the dreary region of eternal frost, with the rest of the noble band of heroes who perished in the performance of their duties, uncheered by the applause of their fellow-men—dying slowly of starvation one by one, with none to whisper hope or comfort—their corpses left to bleach uninterred, on the spot where they fell to earth and breathed their last breath, their only solace the consciousness that they had died doing their duty to the last! Let us hope, if disembodied spirits are permitted in another world to recognize those whom they loved on earth, that Edward and Emily have met to part no more.

The other day I saw the name of the young sailor honorably mentioned in Captain McClintock's narrative. It recalled the facts I have narrated to my memory, and that is the reason why I have written this touching story.

THE DEATH-BED.

We watched her breathing through the night,
Her breathing soft and low,
As in her breast the waves of life
Kept heaving to and fro.

Our very hopes belied our fears,
Our fears our hopes belied;
We thought her dying when she slept,
And sleeping when she died.—Hæc.

THE CHIEFTAIN'S DAUGHTER.

BY MARY PERCIVAL.

A youthful Indian maiden strayed
In a lone forest wild;
And there in nature's solitude
Her darker hours beguiled.

For sorrow o'er her lonely path
Its darkened shadows flung;
And in a sweet and plaintive tone,
Her own wild lay she sung:

"My father has to battle gone,
And left me weeping here;
Alas, no tender mother's voice
Is heard my grief to cheer!

"But the Great Spirit will protect And guide my orphan child!"
'Twas thus he spoke, in mournful tones,
And accents sweetly mild.

"I decked him with his wampum belt,
And wrought his moccasins, too;
While many a day his boat lay moored
Within the still bayou.

"He lingered but to bless his child—
The dearest tie on earth;
What most could soothe or charm him here
Was my own childish mirth.

"In hope and fear I bade adieu
To thee, my darling friend;
And ever in my daily prayer
Thy name shall sweetly blend.

"And when thy wanderings all are o'er,
Thou 'lt seek, with faithful love,
The image of thy dark-eyed queen,
Who dwells in realms above."

THE BROKEN WILL.

BY MARY A. KEABLES.

JAMES ROBBINS was old, and dying. Even the rich must lay aside their costly velvet, leave their urgent business, close their eyes upon their merchandize, their broad lands, their yellow gold, and yield to the grim messenger, willing or unwilling. Squire Robbins had found little time to relieve the poor, attend the sick, read his Bible; too busy had he been earning and laying up riches upon earth, but he was obliged to find time to die.

Not that he was miserly or ungenerous; far from it, he was esteemed kind enough in his hurried business way—but he was dying now, so the neighbors said, and shook their heads, while the physician hinted to him the necessity of his making his will, and the clergyman warned him to make his peace with Heaven.

The family of Squire Robbins consisted of himself and two children, a son of twenty-five, and a daughter perhaps twenty-one years of age, his wife having been dead many years. These two children were in the room when the physician warned the old man he had but a few more hours to live. The son gazed coldly and carelessly from the window, and tapped his foot restlessly upon the velvet carpet, while the daughter busied her face in her hands and wept.

"Don't play the hypocrite, Em," said Harvey Robbins, turning to his sister with a lowering cloud upon his brow, and in a voice perfectly audible to the dying man—then adding in a lower tone, "If you'd tell the truth, you'd say you are as glad as I, that—"

"What, Harvey?" and the girl's clear earnest eyes were raised wonderingly, questioningly, to the young man's face.

"Glad of what?" she repeated, for her brother hesitated.

"That we shall soon be our own master and mistress, since you are so dull to understand; that we will be at liberty to go and come, when we please; and more than all that we shall have the pleasure of spending that which the old man has been so long laying up for our especial use, this many years."

"O, Harvey!"

There was genuine sorrow, anguish, in the girl's voice.

"O, Harvey, to talk so of our poor dear father."

"Might as well say it, as to think it," muttered Harvey Robbins, doggedly.

"But you surely—surely do not think such a thing as that?" questioned Emily, the tears starting afresh down her cheeks.

"O, you're very innocent, Lady Em!" sneered the young man, "you know your fingers ache as well as mine to get possession of the old man's property, only you are too hypocritical to tell the blunt, unpolished truth as I do!"

"You are unkind, Harvey," replied the sister, sadly, again burying her face in her hands. "God judges between us. He knows you have misjudged me."

"Humph!"

Harvey Robbins yawned, and then arose and left the room; the physician gave a few directions to Emily, and then followed the young man down stairs; the two met in a small private apartment on the first floor. Harvey Robbins, after bidding the physician be seated, locked the door, produced two cigars, gave one to Dr. Ryan, and hit the other himself, gave two or three whiffs, and then said, in a low and guarded voice:

"What do you think, doctor?"

"That he cannot possibly last but a few hours, until midnight I should say at the furthest, and this is—let me see—two o'clock, P. M.?"

"Yes," replied the young man, consulting his gold repeater.

"Has your father made his will?" asked the physician, a little anxiously.

"Yes."

"When?"

"This forenoon at half-past ten, I put him off as long as I could, but—"

"What?"

"He sent unknown to me for an attorney and witnesses, and made the will in spite of my teeth."

"He did?"

"Yes."

"Do you know how it stands—in whose favor it is made?" questioned the physician, twisting uneasily in his chair.

"No."

"You're a fool, Harvey Robbins," hissed the other from between his shut teeth, "you'll slip out of your rightful property after all, and then—"

"Then what?"

"Where will be the five thousand I am to receive?"

"Perhaps you can guess as well as I," replied the young man, carelessly.

"You are insulting!" said Dr. Ryan, his face crimsoning; "for the part I have taken in this transaction, I was to receive five thousand dollars."

"I have not disputed it—but if I lose, of course you will. Of course you will, doctor, and all you can do will be either to extricate me from the difficulty, and thereby ensure yourself the reward I promised you, or—"

"What?"

"I shall find means to accomplish my ends without you, and I shall pay you nothing, not a red copper, Dr. Ryan!"

"You would fear to defraud me in that manner, Harvey Robbins," returned the other, growing pale with rage.

"Fear?" questioned the young man, snapping his fingers—"fear, Dr. Ryan, not that, you are far more in my power than I in yours!"

For a few moments neither spoke, the physician bowed his head upon his folded hands in thought. Harvey Robbins puffed away at his cigar, perfectly cool and unconcerned; finally the former said in a conciliatory tone:

"Then what do you purpose to do?"

"What I do is my own business, Dr. Ryan."

"O, certainly—certainly."

"You may come in to-morrow morning at nine o'clock. I shall have breakfasted by that time, and then no doubt I shall be prepared to plan a little with you—till then, good afternoon, Dr. Ryan," and the young man opened the door, and bowed the physician from the room.

Harvey Robbins closed the door, and paced slowly up and down the elegant room, with a lowering brow, and a cold, cruel look in his eyes—"Dr. Ryan was right," he said, "I was a fool." Then he went up to the room where his father lay dying. Emily sat near him holding one wrinkled hand in one of her own, and with the other she smoothed the gray damp hair back from the furrowed brow.

"Let me come here, Em," said Harvey, touching his sister upon the shoulder. "I wish you'd go away a few minutes, I want to talk with the old man alone."

"Can I do anything for you, father?" asked the girl, stooping and kissing the white lips of the sufferer.

"Only a sip of water, Emily."

A glass of that cooling and refreshing beverage was held to his lips by the same hand that had smoothed his pillow, and supplied his wants during his entire sickness; for Emily had allowed no stranger to perform these acts of kindness for her sick parent, love could so much better suggest and carry out. For more than a week, night and day, this devoted girl had watched over her dying father, regardless of her own weariness—forgetful that her own health was far from good, and that she was growing very pale, and weak, from the constant confinement.

"I have a few words to say to you, father," said the young man, after his sister had left the room; "a few questions to ask you."

The sick man pressed his hands over his eyes, and waited for his son to continue.

"You made your will to-day?"

"Yes," replied the old man, faintly.

"May I ask in whose favor?"

A sudden flush of animation passed over the pale shrunken face, and there was strength and energy in the voice that replied:

"You have been an undutiful son to me, Harvey Robbins; you have brought my gray hairs down to the grave in sorrow; in return for all my kindness to you, you have requited me by disobedience and disrespect, and not one acre of my broad lands, not an eagle of my gold, not the slightest hold on this old homestead will you ever possess. I do not fear to tell you this, Harvey Robbins, take the dollar the law allows you, and buy a rope to hang yourself, I care not!"

The old man sank back upon his pillow exhausted.

"And you have made your will to that effect?" asked the son, his black serpent-like eyes glowing and scintillating, his voice hard and cold in its tone. "You have made a will to that effect? Who then, may I ask, is to be your heir or heiress?"

"I might question your right to ask this, Harvey Robbins—but I will tell you; your sister Emily, but for whose tender care I should have lacked for every comfort, she is my heiress—and I do not fear to tell you so."

"And I do not fear to tell you such a will can never stand," replied Harvey, a dark, wicked smile illuminating his countenance. "I shall break that will, miserable, old man—I swear it to you—"

"You will?" cried Squire Robbins, energetically, "you will? dare to tell me that again, and I will curse you, bone, blood, sinew; curse you, body and soul, for time, and for eternity!"

For a moment the young man stood irresolute; he did not reply, and the dying man continued:

"The will shall stand! dare to break it after I am dead, and as I hope for heaven, I will haunt you until your dying day! I will give you misery and anguish of mind and body, day and night—I will make your friends your enemies—your own kindred shall turn from you. I will haunt your dreams, your waking nights—beware, Harvey Robbins, beware!"

"And I dare your power!" cried the young man, scornfully. "The dead cannot affect the living, change your will or destroy it, or by the powers that be—"

"Then be the curse upon your own head, Harvey Robbins, a curse upon your life, your riches, your dearest hopes—a father's dying curse it is, take it, you have called it down upon your own head!"

That night Squire Robbins died.

The next morning Dr. Ryan called according to agreement, and was closeted with Harvey Robbins for an hour in private consultation. At the close of the conference the former departed with a look of satisfied determination; the latter sought his sister whom he found in her dressing-room, and addressed her with more of brotherly tenderness in his tone than he had used for many years.

"I am sorry to see you looking so sad and ill, Em."

The poor girl was indeed looking weary and wan; there were dark heavy semi-circles beneath her eyes—eyes that were large and unnaturally bright, while her face was very pale, except the spot of crimson that glowed in the centre of either cheek. To her brother's greeting, she replied with a sad smile, and made room for him on the sofa by her side.

"I have been talking with Dr. Ryan," began the young man at length, looking searchingly into the girl's innocent face with his wicked black eyes.

"Have you?" replied the sister, abstractedly.

"Yes—shall I tell you what he said in regard to father's illness?"

"What was it, Harvey?"

"You know Dr. Ryan graduated from one of the first medical colleges at the east?" queried Harvey Robbins, noting closely the expression of the girl's countenance as he spoke.

"Yes."

"Is a skillful practitioner?"

"Termed such, I believe."

"With an experience of some five years?" pursued Harvey, watching his sister's every expression.

"Well?"

"You were satisfied everything was done for our dear father that could be done, Em?" asked the young man, his great black eyes still gazing intently into the girl's face.

"What do you mean, Harvey?" And Emily Robbins worked her hands together uneasily.

"Simply this, Em, that I want to know if you have perfect confidence in Dr. Ryan?"

"Why, yes, of course I have; but what makes you ask, Harvey?"

"Simply this; that Dr. Ryan has informed me of something I had not guessed before, something that at first quite startled me. He did not give me the English name of the disease which he discovered had affected our father, and as I am unacquainted with Latin, I cannot give the name he did. Enough, Em, that if he had lived, he would have been a maniac the rest of his life."

"How very dreadful!" shuddered the girl.

"Yes, indeed. He informed me also that this disease has been working in his system for months, perhaps years, and that he has not been in his right mind, that is to say perfectly sane, during his entire illness."

"And why does he think so?" asked Emily, raising her brown, earnest eyes to her brother's sober face.

"I'm sure I don't know; I never studied medicine, Em, you are aware, and come to think of it, don't you think father appeared rather out of his right mind before he died, especially the last few days?"

"Perhaps he did. Some of the time he talked very curious," said Emily, meditatively.

"Yes, I recollect he did—very strange in fact. Don't you think so, Em?"

"Come to think of it, I don't know but that he did."

"He said a great many things calculated to injure the feelings of the neighbors. Once in particular I remember—you were not in the room, I believe—he fairly ordered some visitors from the apartment. I felt very badly, of course, but what could I do?" said Harvey, falsely.

"Did he really—poor father?" sighed Emily, tears filling her eyes.

"And considering all this, I have thought it would be as well for it to be understood he was out of his right mind during his recent illness, as that was of course the case, and it will save the feelings of a great many whom he almost insulted, for no one could be heartless enough to bear ill-will towards an insane man—you understand, dear Em?"

"Yes."

"And it would be as well for you to mention it while speaking of his illness to any one, that he was delirious most of the time, for as Dr. Ryan says that was the case, of course it must have been."

Emily was a good, kind-hearted girl, and she took but a surface view of things. She did not dream that beneath her brother's words there lay a deep, cunning design in the end to destroy her. She only understood the meaning of her brother's words, not the motive which prompted them.

In due time, the funeral of Squire Robbins took place. It was a grand affair, for neither trouble nor expense were spared upon the occasion, and the overwhelming sorrow of the two young mourners, Harvey Robbins in particular, was noted by those who were present.

"What filial affection!" said the neighbors to each other.

"What an affecting scene—a son weeping so bitterly over a father's remains!" remarked the clergyman.

Harvey Robbins played his part well. Even his sister was a stranger to the extent of his hypocrisy; and yet, as the young man gazed down into the dead face for the last time, had as he was, conscience whispered reprovingly, and his father's curse sounded in his ears like a prophecy, "I will haunt you until your dying day! You shall have misery of mind and of body, both day and night, a curse that will be upon your life, your riches, your dearest hopes—a father's dying curse, Harvey Robbins; you have called it upon your own head!"

It is not necessary for the development of our story that we should minutely describe the days intervening between the funeral of Squire Robbins and the reading of the will, in due time, in open court. Enough to say that the validity of the will of the deceased was contested on the ground of the insanity of Squire Robbins during his illness, to which Dr. Ryan gave in his medical testimony, and as it was not disputed after a formal trial, the will was pronounced null, and the property was equally divided between Harvey Robbins and his sister Emily.

With the curse of a dying father ringing in his ears, the young man rejoiced in his good fortune, as he termed it, and in his secret heart set about a new plan, by which he hoped to come in possession of not only half but the whole of his father's property. And now follows the strangest part of our story:

One evening Dr. Ryan and Harvey Robbins were closeted in private consultation—the former came at dusk, and did not leave until after eleven o'clock, P. M.

The next morning at breakfast, Emily did not appear. Mrs. Elmer the housekeeper, fearing she was ill, sought her room, but found it vacant, but a note was upon the table, sealed and directed to any one who might desire to read it. And thus the note ran:

"When you read this note I shall be no more. Ever since my father's death an uncontrollable melancholy has been stealing over me, and my existence has become a burden. I am tired of living, and I seek rest in that long sleep that knows no awakening. Farewell.

"EMILY ROBBINS."

Of course the whole neighborhood was aroused, and started out upon a search for the unhappy girl, dead or alive. Mrs. Elmer testified that she had noticed Emily had of late appeared greatly depressed, and that she feared her grief had or soon would overpower her reason, and she believed that had been the case. She said also that she appeared rather more cheerful than usual the evening before her disappearance, that she chatted pleasantly with her brother and Dr. Ryan at the tea-table, at eight o'clock, P. M., retired to her room at nine, complaining of feeling slightly indisposed; that she (the housekeeper) retired to rest between nine and ten o'clock, and slept soundly until five A. M. This was all she knew concerning the subject.

Harvey appeared overwhelmed with grief at the loss of his sister, offered a large reward for the recovery of her remains, if she had indeed committed self-destruction, and himself headed a large company of neighbors, who sought for the unhappy girl.

A bonnet was recognized as belonging to Emily Robbins, a light scarf, and a glove with her name marked in it, and a small shawl she had often been seen to wear, were found upon the bank of a narrow, rapid river, a mile or so distant from the Robbins mansion. The river was dragged, but the body of the girl was not found. The general impression was, that in a fit of melancholy she had committed suicide by throwing herself into the river, and after a time the search was given up, and otherwise than as a very sad circumstance the affair was forgotten. The Robbins estate lay some mile or mile and a half from the village of Glenvale—a pretty little village, by the way. The mansion was of dry limestone, two stories high, surrounded by grounds artistically laid out, and the broad meadow lands, fine orchard and fields of waving grain, excited the envy of farmers for miles around. Harvey superintended the management of the farm, and had expressed his determination never to see the old homestead sold; but soon after his sister's mysterious disappearance, he changed his mind, and declaring that he had lost all taste for farming, wished to sell out or lease the place for a number of years, as he desired to travel for some length of time. A purchaser or tenant, however, to suit the young man did not offer himself, and Harvey, although he appeared to be settling into a morbid melancholy, did not find an opportunity of seeking a change of place and scenery, as he evidently wished to do. It was in harvesting time, and he was needed to overlook the work and direct the hands. Harvey Robbins grew pale and nervous; he was evidently laboring under some kind of mental depression, but what, could not be guessed, unless it were the loss of his father and sister. Some said that insanity was hereditary in the family, that his father had died insane—his sister in a fit of madness had ended her own life, and that Harvey would no doubt sooner or later become a raving maniac.

A year had scarcely elapsed since the decease of Squire Robbins, and the curse was beginning its work! Harvey Robbins grew paler as the cool months advanced. His black eyes had a wild, strange gleam in them, and he could not be induced to be out after dark under any circumstance whatever. The least noise frightened him—he started at his own shadow—at the reflection of his face in the mirror, and in his sleep he would groan and cry out in such a manner as to alarm the housekeeper and servants, whose rooms were on the same floor with his own. The cause of Harvey Robbins's strange conduct was attributed to his affliction at the loss of his father and sister, and when questioned in regard to his unusual actions, he would shiver, turn pale, and give no answer whatever.

"Did you hear anything—any unusual noise last night in the hall, Mrs. Elmer?" he asked of the housekeeper, one morning.

"La, no," replied the old lady, "did you?"

Harvey did not reply, only turned a shade paler, and arose to leave the room, when a servant met him and informed him that Dr. Ryan was in the parlor and wished to see him. This was the first time Harvey had met his friend the physician since his sister's mysterious disappearance, for Dr. Ryan had been absent from the village. He gasped rather than said, as they met:

"You back again, Ryan?"

"Yes."

"For what? I thought never to have beheld your face again—but it is well enough."

Harvey Robbins locked the door, and then drew a chair close to Dr. Robbins's side.

"Tell me all about it," he said.

"About what? Talk plainly, so I can understand you."

"About Emily," whispered the young man, grasping Dr. Ryan's arm and gazing earnestly into his face.

"She is dead."

"You swear this to me, Ryan?"

The physician turned uneasily from his interrogator—"Why do you ask?"

"Do you swear to me she is dead? Answer me!"

"Yes."

Harvey Robbins's face grew very white. "The property is all mine now," he said.

"Except the portion you are to pay to me; that is what I have come to you for. Give me what you owe me, and I'll never trouble you again."

"How much is it, Ryan?"

"The little sum of a thousand or so, I believe. But you are looking miserable enough with all your property, Harvey."

"Yes, hang it! I'll tell you the truth of it, doctor, I'm under a curse—the curse of a dead father, and it crushes me down day and night. I don't believe there is peace for me again in this world, and most surely none in the next."

"And why?"

Harvey Robbins arose from his chair, went to the door, opened it, saw that there were no listeners, closed and locked it again. Then he paced the room several times with his hands pressed upon his forehead, groaned heavily once or twice, and then resumed his seat.

"I'll tell you all about it, doctor," he said, at length, removing his hands from his face, and speaking in a low, hurried, and excited manner. "Perhaps I shall feel better to tell some one, than keep all hidden in my own heart. Ryan, I shall die if there is not a change soon. I am haunted to death!"

It was the young man's manner and tone, more than his words, that checked the sneering laugh Dr. Ryan was about giving utterance to.

"How?"

"Every way. It commenced the very night after I had commenced the contestation of the old man's will. You remember the night perhaps; it was dark and stormy, the worst night of the season, in fact. You remember it, Ryan?"

"Perhaps I do—yes, I attended old Harmon Locker—disease of the lungs. I remember the night because of its blackness. But go on, Harvey."

"Well, you remember it. Let me see where I was. O yes, I recollect now—I was saying the night was very stormy—I was in my room alone, and I could not sleep, though I was in bed, for I kept thinking, thinking of the old man's curse, and how he had threatened to haunt me till the latest day of my life, if I ever contested that will. So I could not sleep, and there I lay listening to the winds, and the sleet as it dashed against the windows, and to the old clock in the hall—for, in spite of the storm, I could hear its "tick, tick," as plain as I can hear it now if I listen. I heard the old clock strike ten. An hour afterwards—it seemed an age—it sounded eleven. I arose from the bed, lit a candle and tried to read. Failing in this, I walked the floor for a while, then blew out the light and threw myself upon the bed. Then I arose again and lit the candle. The darkness seemed to oppress me, to choke, or suffocate me—I must have light. Again the clock struck. I counted every stroke and there were thirteen! I heard every one distinctly."

"You are sure?"

"Yes, I am sure. Then I listened, and by-and-by I heard a tramp, tramp, tramp, and a noise that sounded like the clanking of a heavy chain upon the stairs. Nearer and nearer it came, and finally stopped directly in front of my chamber door. I heard it."

"All imagination," said Dr. Ryan, insolently.

"No, it was not imagination. Do you take me for a fool, Ryan? I tell you it was not imagination. I heard the clock and the tramp just as plain as I ever heard anything in my life. I lay and listened until I heard it stop in front of my chamber; then there came a thundering knock at my door; that seemed to jar the whole house; then I heard the clanking of the chain again, and—"

"What?"

"I did not believe in ghostly visitations, but somehow I thought of Marley's ghost, and almost expected to see a wierd, airy, transparent spirit come in through the keyhole; but after a moment's reflection, I regained my courage, sprang from my bed and dashed out into the hall. Nothing was to be seen—all was still and quiet. I went down stairs and looked at the clock. The time was ten minutes past twelve! The outer door was locked, and everything as usual. I went back to my room, threw myself upon my bed, and then again I heard in the hall the tramping and the clanking. I tell you, Ryan, it was terrible!"

Harvey Robbins shuddered.

"That was the beginning, but not the end. I tell you, Ryan, since then I have not enjoyed one night of undisturbed sleep. Sometimes I awake with a sensation of choking, or suffocation; at other times I see lights dancing across the room in the midnight darkness. I hear steps about my chamber—steps sometimes too heavy, and then too light for a mortal. In the daytime I seem to see faces, white, dead ones, just like the old man's as it looked in the coffin—such faces peep over my shoulder, and I hear strange voices whenever I am alone. I have not had one hour of peace and happiness—not one. I am, I have been ever since that will was broken—haunted!"

Harvey Robbins concluded with a shudder.

"I have not told you all," continued the young man. "Since the disappearance of Emily I have been more tormented than ever; I have dreamed of her, and waking, I have heard her voice as plainly as I hear my own. Last night—" Harvey Robbins paused.

"What of last night?" questioned Dr. Ryan.

"Last night I heard steps all along the hall, up stairs and then down, up stairs and down. I could not sleep—how could I? And then, in the darkness I heard my door open; then I felt rather than heard something moving about the room; then I had a consciousness of a cold hand passing over my face—ah, so cold, so icy cold—then, I do believe I fainted, for, for a long time I knew no more. When I did return to my senses, the clock struck three, and it could not have been more than eleven when it came first. How long I lay shivering with terror after I half awoke to consciousness, I cannot tell. The moonlight streamed in at the window, and there, where I could see perfectly distinctly, stood—Emily!—ah, so white—so very deathly white, her sad eyes looking straight into my face—O, Ryan, it was no dream, and you say she is dead!”

For a moment the young man paused, buried his face in his hands, and then groaned aloud; then he arose from his chair and paced the room several times hurriedly, excitedly; finally he went to the mantel-shelf, bowed his head upon it over his folded hands, and said, in a voice hoarse and tremulous:

“Yes, I saw her!”

Dr. Ryan was not unmoved during the young man’s recital; his face rapidly changed its expression and color, and his foot tapped the carpet nervously.

“And what then?” he asked, after waiting a time for Harvey to continue his narrative.

The young man shuddered.

“You do not believe in spiritual manifestations,” he said at length.

“And what if I do not?”

“Then I need not tell you any more; I have said too much already. Forget what I have said, Ryan—forget it. I am nearly wild—but I heard her voice as plain as you hear mine now—‘Murderer! murderer! my father’s murderer!’ Yes, I heard her say that, and her dead eyes looked into mine—so cold and stony—and then she left the room, and all the rest of the night I lay and trembled and trembled— But what ails you, Ryan?”

The young physician was paling and trembling.

“Nothing.”

“Yes there is—but listen! did you hear nothing? I thought I detected a step in the entry.” And Harvey Robbins arose and opening the door, glanced out into the hall; but seeing no one, he returned and resumed the conversation.

“How did Emily die?” he asked, hoarsely.

Dr. Ryan turned from his interrogator.

“I must go,” he said. “There is a little account between us, I believe. The night I performed that last matter of business for you, I was promised—”

Before Dr. Ryan had time to conclude his sentence, steps were heard in the hall, and the next moment the door was burst open and a sheriff, accompanied by several other men, entered the room, followed by Mrs. Elmer the housekeeper. The two young men turned pale, and tremblingly attempted to escape; but this they were prevented from doing, and were arrested in due form for the murder of Squire Robbins.

Driven to desperation, Harvey Robbins made a full confession; and Dr. Ryan, seeing that concealment was useless, did the same. They were both afterwards convicted upon their own evidence, and sentenced to the penitentiary.

It seems that Harvey Robbins, disliking the restraint of his father’s presence, and coveting the possession of his broad lands and yellow gold, had bribed Dr. Ryan to administer poison to his father in such a manner as to excite no suspicions, and afterwards to swear in court to his father’s insanity at the time of making his will. Afterwards, wishing to possess the whole of the Robbins estate, Harvey Robbins employed his confederate to despatch Emily. He himself drugged her tea the night of her disappearance, wrote the note which purported to have been from the unhappy girl, and assisted Dr. Ryan to convey her, in her insensibility, from her room to the physician’s carriage which was in waiting.

The plan was to consign her to the cold waters in her unconsciousness; but Dr. Ryan, having been smitten with the charms of the young girl, conceived the idea of sparing her life and reserving her for a fate far worse than death.

In a fit of drunken insanity, one day, Dr. Ryan revealed his intentions in regard to herself, and the part taken by himself and her brother in her father’s death, to the poor girl, who took the first opportunity presented and escaped from her captor.

It was the night before the arrest of the young men that she arrived at her native village, and it was Emily Robbins in the body, rather than in the spirit, who visited Harvey as he himself related. Making herself known to the housekeeper, she remained secreted, wishing to wait for the coming of Dr. Ryan, as she doubted not he would sooner or later. She is married now, and is the mother of several blooming children, and leads a happy life in the old family mansion.

As for Dr. Ryan, he is still an inmate of the penitentiary—his term of years not half expired—but it is of Harvey Robbins we would speak in conclusion:

“I saw him,” said a friend, speaking to me one day, “I saw him as I was passing through the prison—a wild-eyed, pale, emaciated-looking being—pointed out to me by the keeper as one tormented by some great mental suffering. He said that this man would pace his cell almost distractedly nights, scarcely ever sleeping, and when he did, crying out as if in the most acute bodily misery, and remarked that he had often thought him a more fit subject for a lunatic asylum, than a State prison.”

There is more I have heard of Harvey Robbins—that he died, a short time since, in the greatest physical and mental anguish, crying out:

“Haunted! haunted! a dead father’s curse has been visited upon me! It crushes me even now, down, down, DOWN!”

We may add that all the mysterious and ghostly visitations experienced by Harvey Robbins, before the arrest, were easily accounted for from natural causes, viz., the trickery of a juvenile servant in the family. Yet many there are who to this day believe the old house to be haunted, and relate to wondering listeners, in a more marvellous but less truthful manner than ours, the story of the dead man’s curse.

—♦♦♦— DON’T FRET.

This is a world of ups and downs, of crosses and contradictions. Every day turns up something to disturb the equanimity of one’s temper. But it is worse than useless to fret. Fretting is like a caustic applied to a sore. It inflames but never cures. A fretful spirit is never happy, and it drives happiness from all other spirits with which it comes in contact. We say, then, if the world goes wrong, and it does that pretty often, don’t fret. If a man cheats, and then laughs at you for a verdant one, make the best of it and keep cool. Fretting will only make a bad thing worse. If you break your leg, or find your favorite seat at the lyceum occupied; if the stage upsets, or the cars leave you behind; if the cook spoils your dinner, or the thick-headed servant mis-delivers an important message; if “the dear image of its beautiful mother” repays your caresses by thrusting its tiny fingers into your plate of soup and wiping them on your “snow-white” shirt bosom; if banks fail and States repudiate, keep your temper. Repeat the alphabet, read the one hundred and nineteenth psalm, do and say anything, “lovely and of good report,” but as you value quietness of mind and the good temper of others, don’t fret. It is marvellous how much good nature and patience will do towards curing the ills to which flesh and spirit are heirs.—Salem Observer.

—♦♦♦— THE COST OF AN ARGUMENT.

Sheridan had been driving out three or four hours in a hackney coach, when, seeing Richardson pass, he hailed him and made him get in. He instantly contrived to introduce a topic upon which Richardson (who was the very soul of disputatiousness) always differed with him; and at last, affecting to be mortified at R.’s arguments, said:

“You are really too bad; I cannot bear to listen to such things—I will not stay in the same coach with you,” and accordingly got down and left him.

Richardson halloed out triumphantly after him: “Ah, you’re beat, you’re beat!” nor was it till the heat of his victory had a little cooled, that he found out he was left in the lurch to pay for Sheridan’s three hours’ coaching.—Moore’s Diary.

NEVER DO TOO MUCH AT A TIME.

Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, in a lecture recently delivered, gave the following history of his literary habits:—Many persons seeing me so much engaged in active life, and as much about the world as if I had never been a student, have said to me, “When do you get time to write all your books? How on earth do you contrive to do so much work?” I shall surprise you by the answer I make. The answer is this: “I contrive to do so much by never doing too much at a time. A man, to get through work well, must not overwork himself, for, if he do too much to-day, the re-action of fatigue will come, and he will be obliged to do too little to-morrow. Now, since I began really and earnestly to study, which was not till I had left college, and was actually in the world, I may perhaps say I have gone through as large a course of general reading as most men of my time. I have travelled much, and I have seen much; I have mixed much in politics, and the various business of life; and, in addition to all this, I have published somewhere about sixty volumes, some upon subjects requiring much research. And what time, do you think, as a general rule, I have devoted to study—to reading and writing? Not more than three hours a day; and, when Parliament is sitting, not always that. But then, during those hours, I have given my whole attention to what I was about.”—London Examiner.

—♦♦♦— WOULDN’T KNOW IT.

A certain Sunday school teacher was, in the practice of taking up a collection in his juvenile class for missionary objects every Sunday; and his box received scores of pennies which might otherwise have found their way to the drawers of the confectioner and toyman. He was not a little surprised, however, one Sunday, to find a bank-bill crushed in among the weight of copper. He was not long in finding it to be of a broken bank; and on asking the class who put it there, the donor was soon pointed out to him by his classmates, who had seen him deposit it, and thought it a very benevolent gift. “Didn’t you know that this bill was good for nothing?” said the teacher. “Yes,” answered the boy. “Then what did you put it in the box for?” “I didn’t s’pose the little heathen would know the difference, and so it would be just as good for them.”—Knickerbocker.

—♦♦♦— ANALYSIS OF WINE.

A chemist of New York, by a recent analysis, found a bottle of champagne to contain one quarter of an ounce of sugar of lead, and in sixteen samples of so-called Port, Sherry and Madeira wines, was found everything but grape juice. The following astonishing receipt for making port wine, is taken from an English book: “To 12 galls. of port add 6 galls. of rectified spirit, 3 galls. of brandy, 42 galls. of firm rough cider, and red sanderswood or budbear to color the mixture.”

—♦♦♦— CONSCIENCE.

Better be with the dead,
Whom we, to gain our place, have sent to peace,
Than on the torture of the mind to lie
In restless ecstasy.

SHAKESPEARE.

The florist.

Now the bright morning star, day's harbinger,
Comes dancing from the east, and leads with her
The flowery May, who from her green lap throws
The yellow cowslip and the pale primrose.—MILTON.

How to succeed with the Rose.

To succeed well with this flower the ground should be trenched two feet deep, and enriched with good manure. For the finer sorts of perpetuals six or eight inches of small stones may be advantageously thrown into the bottom of the bed, to drain off the surplus moisture. Without such drainage the plants will not grow and bloom satisfactorily, and, unless the soil is naturally quite dry, they will die in winter. During the growing season the ground should be kept loose and free from weeds; and in dry weather an occasional watering of soap-suds, or weak guano-water, will have a beneficial effect. In the fall the beds should be covered with several inches of manure, to serve as a winter protection for the roots, and for the enrichment of the soil; the manure may be forked into the ground in the spring.

The Sensitive Plant.

There is no annual which we cultivate that excites so lively an interest as the mirabilis sensitiva. The peculiarity of the plant consists in its shrinking up or drooping at the touch, or even if blown on with the breath, which is the more singular, as the gentle winds of heaven have no effect. By light touches with a small stick each leaflet will close, independent of the rest; a harder touch will cause all the leaves and footstalk together, or in succession, to close up and droop as if dead, and so on, of the whole plant. The cause of this singular property has never been discovered. It is one of the mysteries of the vegetable kingdom. It is perfectly easy to raise.

Dahlias.

It may well be said that the subjects connected with the garden are inexhaustible, like the notes in music—different combinations are as fresh as they would have been before the millions of tunes now extant were composed. So it is with flowers, every season produces some novelty. A few years back, and in the recollection of many, the dahlia was introduced—a single flower, of velvet-like texture, with only half a dozen petals. For years we had no double ones of any color. But when they, among a succession of seedlings, began to give now and then a species of double flower, by saving seeds from them we were not long without perfectly double, full flowers. There are now any number of beautiful blossoms.

Erysimum.

Hedge Mustard. Most of the kinds are weedy plants, generally biennials, and seldom grown in gardens. One species, E. Perofskianum, is an annual, with dark orange flowers, and since 1838, when it was first introduced, has become a favorite from its beauty. These plants grow best in sandy peat, mixed with a little loam. They are quite hardy, and very showy.

To save frozen House-Plants.

When plants are found to have been frozen during the night, they should not be removed to a warm place, but on the contrary, they should be dipped in cold water, and set in some cool place where they will not freeze, and also in the dark. They will then have a chance to recover, if not completely dead.

Flower-Plants in Pots.

Many persons find it more difficult to keep their pot-plants in summer than in winter. And the principal cause of this is, allowing the soil in the pots to become too dry before they are watered, owing to the sun striking against the sides of the pots and scorching the roots; for when they are injured by drought, their roots usually decay on the application of water. When a plant appears sickly, it should be taken out of the pot, and its roots examined, and all that are decayed should be cut off; the plant should then be re-potted in fresh soil, and kept a little moist, but not too wet, and, if not much injured, it will soon recover. When plants are kept too wet, or in too damp a situation, worms are apt to get at their roots and injure them. If the plants are small, they may be taken out, and the worms picked out of them, and the plants replaced. If the plants are too large to permit that, the worms may be got out with lime water, applying it two or three times, in a clean state.

The Tuberose.

The tuberose has long whitish green leaves, with the flower stem from four to five feet high, terminating in a sparse spike of white flowers of a very powerful fragrance. The double kind only should be grown, as the single, though equally fragrant, is not near so beautiful.

"The tuberose, with her silver light,
That in the gardens of Malay
Is called the mistress of the night,
So like a bride, scented and bright,
She comes out when the sun's away."

Pansies.

The qualities of a good pansy are size, roundness, thickness of the petal, evenness of edges and color. Prepare ground by the middle of June—select deep moist soil if possible. Put on six inches cow manure and three inches of sand, dig deep, and incorporate these dressings thoroughly with the soil. Then plant one foot apart. After planted draw up sand round each plant in the form of a saucer. This, and frequent waterings with mild liquid manure will ensure good pansies.

Diosma.

Cape shrubs, with hair-like roots, which require to be grown in pots in a greenhouse, or in a room, in sandy peat, well drained and frequently watered. They have a very peculiar smell, which some persons like, and which remains on the gloves or any article of dress which may have touched the plant for a long time. The Hottentot belles are said to use it as a perfume. The plants have heath-like leaves, and small but pretty flowers; they are propagated by cuttings, which root freely in sand under glass.

Flower-Stems.

Flower-stems should always be cut with a knife, and never with scissors, as the tubes will not draw up the water, if they are bruised and lacerated, and partly closed. Two or three drops of camphor in every ounce of milk-warm water, will often restore faded flowers, as it does a fainting person.

Francoa.

Handsome plants, most of which may be treated either as annuals or perennials, and may always be raised from the seed. They are nearly hardy, and will grow in any common garden soil. F. remota, with white flowers, is generally kept in the greenhouse, and will not admit of being treated as an annual.

Curious Matters.

Curious Fire.

The coach carrying the mail from Lock Haven to Tyrone, Huntingdon county, Pennsylvania, recently took fire between Lock Haven and Bellefonte, and was entirely consumed, together with the mails and the baggage belonging to the passengers. The accident occurred through the negligence of one of the passengers throwing a lighted match into the straw in the bottom of the coach. In an instant everything was enveloped in flames. It was with difficulty that the passengers escaped from the stage unhurt—and to make matters worse, the horses took fright and ran. Before they could be stopped the coach was so much burned that neither mails nor baggage could be saved. It was fortunate that no ladies were on board, as they could not have been rescued, the flames spread so rapidly. We doubt whether there is a similar accident on record.

Rare Bird.

A beautiful bird known as the White Heron (Ardea Canadensis), was shot at or near the pond in West Brookfield, recently. They are common on Long Island, and are called by the gamers, "White Pike." They frequent the salt marshes, mud-flats and sand-bars, in search of crabs, lizards and worms—which, with aquatic plants, furnish their subsistence. They usually visit Massachusetts late in the spring or in the summer. Wilson found them breeding among the branches of the red cedars of Somers Beach, on the coast of Cape May, some trees having three or four nests, built of sticks, each containing three eggs, of a pale, greenish-blue color, being an inch and three-fourths in length, and deemed a table luxury. The bird migrates to the South in September.

A queer Character.

A grocer woman died recently in Glasgow, Scotland, at the age of eighty-one, who left a fortune of £28,000, collected from earnings from a small shop which she had rented for about forty years. She was never married, and studiously avoided paring with a single farthing that she could avoid. She bequeathed the sum in £4 annuities to destitute people of good moral character, who are natives of, and have lived in, the Gorbals parish of Glasgow forty years, and who have attained the age of 65 years. As the parish is small, but few claimants can exist. She left nothing to any of her relations.

Singular Discovery.

The California papers notice the discovery of the fossil remains of a large sized whale, in Santa Cruz, in that State. It was found embedded in chalk rock, about 12 feet below the surface. The upper strata of chalk is covered with soil varying from one to two feet in thickness. No part of the whale, except the vertebrae, retains its original shape, it having become so identified with the surrounding rock as to be almost indistinguishable. Some portions of the vertebrae, however, are in quite a good state of preservation.

Wonderful Dexterity.

The Albany Journal says that Hezekiah Dubois, who is about eighteen years of age, and now confined in the penitentiary, makes daily forty-three pairs of brogans with apparent ease. The person who saw him on the bench at work, says "that he appeared to blow the pegs from his mouth into the shoe, and never made a miss while he was looking at him."

Awful Alternative.

The last will of a queer old miser, who has just died, is much talked of at Vienna. He cut off all his nearest relatives, and made a very distant one, an extremely handsome young girl, sole heiress of his considerable property. So far there is nothing extraordinary; but there is a condition added to it. The testator was a hunchback, and had a club-foot, which defects probably had obstructed many attempts of his to marry. He has made it, therefore, a condition, sine qua non, that the heiress is to get the property only when she marries a man shaped as he was. She is, besides, to live in a convent three months in each year, to pray for his soul. The heirs-at-law have attacked this odd last will, on the plea that when it was made the testator must evidently have been mad. As there is, however, no equity jurisdiction in Austria, they may find their task not an easy one.

Curious Formation.

In a limestone quarry, in Scotland, a cave comparatively uniform in breadth, but very irregular in height, has been brought to notice, the chief objects of interest being the stalactites which cover the sides and roof, some of them in shapes which arrest the attention of the spectator. One has the form of a human skull, another bears an exact semblance to a horse's jaw-bone, while a little further on one is struck by the appearance of a complete set of organ-pipes. In other places the sides and roof look as if they had been carved by some sculptor of remarkable skill but erratic genius; and as the visitor proceeds this changes, and on looking up the place resembles an arched passage richly hung with drapery. The explorations so far have only extended some forty or fifty yards.

A curious Case.

The reporter of the Memphis Avalanche was present, recently, at the disinterment of the body of a young lady, who had been buried more than five years. The body was enclosed in a metallic case, which, when opened, revealed the following singular phenomena:—The body was in an excellent state of preservation—the hair, particularly, was very lifelike; and, what was more astonishing, a full-blown camellia japonica, which some affectionate hand had twined in the tresses of the hair, was remarkably fresh looking—the leaves retaining their soft, greenish hue to perfection.

Strange Accident.

At Buffalo a Mr. Lohouse and his wife had been away from home during the day. On their return they found the house full of gas, which had escaped in some way. Mr. L., without suspecting danger, lighted a match, and a terrific explosion instantly occurred, blowing out the windows in the building and shattering it in a serious manner, and even blowing out the windows in buildings across the street. Mr. Lohouse was badly injured, though not fatally. The explosion made a report like heavy artillery, and startled the whole city.

Singular Incident.

A daughter of Mr. Meredith, who resides near Ludlow, England, recently met her death from the following incident:—Returning from Ludlow, and finding her lip much chapped from the wind, she applied some tallow to it, which is supposed to have contained some poisonous matter, or fat that had been much decomposed. Her lip shortly afterward began to swell, and increased every day for a week, when she expired in the greatest agony.

Remarkable Incident.

A curious circumstance occurred on a Central Railroad freight train. The train was drawn by the locomotive "Ledyard," W. W. Rogers, engineer. About four miles west of Batavia, while the train was running at good speed, suddenly a crash occurred forward, and the head light was extinguished. After the first surprise subsided, Mr. R. directed his fireman to go and re-light the lamp, but subsequently concluded to wait till he arrived at Alden, for fear an accident might occur to the man. On reaching the latter place, a wild pigeon was found inside the lantern, dying. It had a broken wing, and was otherwise injured. The glass in front, three-sixteenths of an inch in thickness, had a hole broken through it just large enough to allow the bird to enter; and the appearance of the aperture was similar to that usually made when a rifle ball is shot through glass. It is supposed that the train encountered a flock of pigeons, and that one of them, dazzled by the powerful light of the head lamp, dashed at it, and was caught as above related.

A Dog's Tale.

A Mr. Esler, of the Johnson Reef, Australia, recently went overland to Adelaide, taking with him his brother's dog. On arriving the dog appeared ill at ease; he determined to see if he would return, and accordingly wrote a letter to his brother, and wrapping it up, tied it to the dog's neck, which then started. A letter was then posted to the brother, which read as follows:—"Dear brother—Arrived here safely. For further particulars see dog." This was, of course, perfectly unintelligible to him; but the day after receiving the letter, the dog arrived with his "further particulars" round his neck. After his journey of six hundred miles he did not appear much fatigued, but seemed overjoyed at regaining his own town again.

An eccentric Will.

A curious will case has just been decided after a long trial in the Superior Court at Norwich, Ct. The will of Stiles Park, disposing of property amounting to $34,000, contained a provision that none of the money should be applied in any manner whatever, directly or indirectly, to the support or for the benefit of any religious teacher, society, church or denomination, on condition of reverting the property to the Retreat for the Insane, in Hartford, for the support of the insane poor. The validity of the will was sustained.

An ancient Watch.

Mr. Solomon True, of Freeport, Me., has a watch and chain which have been in the possession of his family for two hundred and five years. The watch is silver-cased, with a silver face, and appears to have been manufactured by "Robbins, London." There is a watch-paper inside the case of "Joseph Lovis, Watchmaker, at the sign of the Gold Watch, Fish Street, Portland." Lovis probably repaired the watch the last time it had anything done to it. It is an antique-looking thing, and a high price has been refused for it.

Old Wedding-Cake.

The Elmira Press says there is an elderly lady residing in that place, who has in her possession the remains of a piece of her own wedding-cake, which she has preserved for over forty years! It is wrapped in the same piece of paper that was put around it to "dream by" on the night of her wedding. There is also some writing on it, but its age has so obliterated it, that its chirography is scarcely perceptible.

The Shirt-Tree.

The accounts of travellers have made us well acquainted with the "bread-tree," but it remained for the indefatigable Humboldt to discover, in the wilds of South America, a tree which produces ready-made shirts. We copy this account of this tree:—"We saw on the slope of the Cerra Duida," says M. Humboldt, "shirt trees fifty feet high. The Indians cut off cylindrical pieces two feet in diameter, from which they peel the red and fibrous bark, without making any longitudinal incision. The bark affords them a sort of garment, which resembles sacks of a very coarse texture, and without a seam. The upper opening serves for the head, and two lateral holes are cut to admit the arms. The natives wear three shirts of marins in the rainy season; they have the form of the ponchos and ruanoes of cotton which are so common in New Granada, at Quito, and in Peru."

A Gipsy Queen.

A tribe of gipseys, numbering between three and four hundred, was lately encamped at Forest Grove, near Cleveland. The Herald says:—"This is the tribe, the death of whose king, Stanley, has attracted so much notice. Lady Stanley, wife of the late king, is a superb looking woman. She is tall and majestic in appearance, with regular and really beautiful features, and converses fluently in half a dozen different languages. She is with the tribe lately encamped at Forest Grove, as are also her sisters, two dark-eyed gipsy beauties. The appointments of the tribe are extensive, embracing some fifty horses, a large number of baggage-wagons, tents, etc."

The oldest Belgian Book.

A book connected with the history of Arras was lately sold by auction at Cologne. It is the treaty concluded at Arras on the 8th of April, 1483, by which Charles VIII. repairs part of the disasters inflicted on the Artesian capital by the violence of Louis XI. This treaty, which is found in all diplomatic collections, and has been published many times, was sold on the present occasion for 480 francs. It consists of twelve pages only, but is valuable as being the first book printed at Ghent. The book hitherto supposed to be the first was published in September, 1488; but that now disposed of, as appears from a note on the back, appeared in April of that year.

Yellow Bees.

At the last meeting of the British Apian Society, Mr. Tegetmeier, the honorable secretary, stated that the apis ligustica, or yellow Ligurian bee, had been recently introduced with success into England, and also into Germany and America. It is regarded as a more valuable species than the ordinary honey-bee (apis mellifica). It is singular that a species that has been known and preferred since the time of Virgil, who, in the fourth book of the Georgics, described the best bees of a golden color, should only recently have been diffused over Europe.

An eccentric Character.

The Marquis de la Cousseaye, who died lately at his villa, near Paris, bequeathed a sum of fifty thousand francs to the commune of Enghien upon trust, to pay the interest thereof to some well-conducted girl for her marriage portion—but upon this condition, that the maiden to be annually elected shall, in the month of May, place a garland upon the testator's tomb with one hand while she receives her fortune with the other.

The Housewife.

To stew a Breast of Veal.

Cut it in pieces, and put it into a pot with a bunch of sweet herbs, a small piece of bacon, a little mace, and a few black peppercorns, salt, and one or two onions, and as much water as will cover it; let it stew well over a slow fire; boil some peas and lettuce by themselves, and, when the veal is stewed enough, strain the liquor from it, and put it into a stewpan with part of the liquor, the peas, lettuce and a piece of butter, and let them stew again; thicken with the yolks of two or three eggs and a little flour.

Victoria Pudding.

Pound two ounces of orange-peel with one of bitter almonds. Put it on the fire in a brass pan with an English pint of sweet milk; stir till it boils five minutes. Pour through a fine drainer, add half a pint of cream, stir occasionally till nearly cold. Have a quarter of a pound of ground white sugar beat up with six eggs. Mix all together. Butter and ornament a mould with raisins, pour in the pudding, steam two hours. Serve with a custard and sweetmeats round it.

Snow Pudding.

Dissolve half of a small package of gelatine in half a pint of water; add a pound of ground white sugar, the juice of four lemons, and the whites of two eggs. Beat all up till very light and spongy, then pour into a mould. When wanted, turn into a crystal dish, and serve with a custard round it made of the yolks of two eggs.

South Carolina Johnny Cake.

Half a pint of boiled rice or hominy, two eggs, one table-spoonful of butter, a little salt, flour enough to make a stiff batter; spread on an oaken board, and bake before a hot fire; when nicely baked on one side, turn, and bake the other; cut through the centre, and butter well. It pays for the trouble.

For removing Mildew and Iron-Mould.

When the clothes are washed and ready to boil, pin a few leaves of the common Jamestown weed on the moulded part, and boil as usual. If the article is badly mildewed, throw a handful of leaves in the bottom of the kettle; lay the soiled part next to them. When rinsed, they will be clear from defect.

Bakers' Yeast.

Boil two ounces of hops one hour in nine quarts of water; take seven pounds of mashed potatoes, when the liquor is milk-warm, and add one pound of sugar, two ounces of carbonate of soda, half an ounce of spirits of wine, one pound of flour; and half a pint of brewers' yeast to work it.

Soda Biscuits.

One pound of flour, half a pound of sugar, quarter of a pound of butter, a little carbonate of soda, one gill of new milk or two eggs. Mix well; then roll out until it is about half an inch thick, and cut with a tin into small cakes. Bake in a quick oven.

Method of fixing French Pastry.

This pastry is fixed by white of egg. A veil is formed over the whole by white of egg and white sugar boiled briskly, stirred when it has boiled, and poured over while in a froth.

Yule Cake.

Take one pound of fresh butter, one pound of sugar, one pound and a half of flour, two pounds of currants, a glass of brandy, one pound of sweetmeats, two ounces of sweet almonds, ten eggs, a quarter of an ounce of allspice, and a quarter of an ounce of cinnamon. Melt the butter to a cream, and put in the sugar. Stir it till quite light, adding the allspice and pounded cinnamon; in a quarter of an hour take the yolks of the eggs, and work them two or three at a time; and the whites of the same must by this time be beaten into a strong snow, quite ready to work in. As the paste must not stand to chill the butter, or it will be heavy, work in the whites gradually, then add the orange-peel, lemon and citron, cut in fine strips, and the currants, which must be mixed in well with the sweet almonds; then add the sifted flour and the glass of brandy. Bake this cake in a tin hoop in a hot oven for three hours, and put twelve sheets of paper under it, to keep it from burning.

Luncheon Cake.

Take of white flour, one pound; bi-carbonate of soda, two drachms; sugar, three ounces; butter, three ounces; sour buttermilk, half a pint, or ten ounces. Mix as above, and bake in a quick oven, in a tin, one hour. Or, one pound of flour, half a pound of butter, half a pound of moist sugar, half a pound of currants or raisins, three eggs, half a pint of warm milk, one spoonful of carbonate of soda; rub in the butter well with the flour and sugar, add currants and soda, then the eggs and milk, well mixed; bake it two hours in a slow oven. This is a very good receipt, and the cakes keep fresh and nice for a fortnight.

Beef Collops.

Take some beef that is tender and free from skin, cut it into small thin pieces, hack it with a knife; then butter a stewpan, and put in as much beef as will cover the pan, with a little onion, some cucumber cut small, and salt and pepper; put it over a quick fire, and give it two or three tosses about; two or three minutes will do them; add a little flour, butter and water to the stewpan, after taking the collops out, to make your gravy. Garnish, if approved, with pickles.

To make Orange Pudding.

Put six ounces of fresh butter and eight ounces of lump sugar, pounded, in a mortar. Then grate in the rind of a Seville orange; beat the whole well together, and as you do this, gradually add eight eggs, well beaten and strained. Scrape a hard apple, and mix it with the other ingredients. Put paste at the bottom of the dish, put in the mixture, and then put over it cross-bars of paste. Half an hour will be sufficient to bake it.

Snow Pudding.

Dissolve half of a sixpenny package of gelatine in half a pint of water; add a pound of ground white sugar, the juice of four lemons, and the whites of two eggs. Beat all up till very light and spongy, then pour into a mould. When wanted, turn into a crystal dish, and serve with a custard round it made of the yolks of the eggs.

Blanc-Mange.

Boil one ounce and a half of isinglass, the thin rind of a lemon, and some loaf sugar in a quart of good new milk, stirring it frequently till the isinglass is all dissolved; cleanse it through a piece of muslin, and when nearly cold, add half a pint of sherry and brandy.

Whipped Syllabubs.

Stir gently one pint of scalded cream the same way until it becomes smooth and thick, but not to let it curdle; then add, while stirring, four ounces of loaf sugar rolled and sifted, the grated rind of one lemon and the juice of two, two glasses of sherry wine, and, finally, the whites of three eggs beaten to a high froth with a small pine whisk. Fill your glasses, and having left some syllabub in your bowl to raise the requisite froth for the tops of your filled glasses, begin and whisk it well, taking off every bubble as it rises with a teaspoon, placing it on the glass, and continuing to raise a pyramid of bubbles on each till enough to complete the light appearance. Syllabubs should always be made the day before they are to be eaten, and form a very pretty addition to the supper table.

Apple Custard.

Peel, cut and core a dozen large apples, which put into an earthen-lined saucepan, with a small teaspoonful of cold water; as they heat bruise to a pulp, sweeten with moist sugar to taste, and grate amongst it the peel of one lemon; when cold, press the fruit hard into a pie dish, and pour over it a pint of thick custard made with the best part of the core, a pint of new milk, four eggs well beaten, yolks and whites together, and two ounces of loaf sugar to sweeten; place the dish in a moderate oven, and bake from twenty minutes to half an hour, according to the size. This is a most delicious and sweet dish.

Arrowroot Pudding.

Take two tablespoonfuls of arrowroot and two quarts of fresh milk; mix the arrowroot with a small portion of the milk, and when the remaining part of the milk has boiled, add it to the former; when nearly cold, add the yolks of three eggs well beaten, three ounces of sugar, two ounces of butter, and a little grated nutmeg. Stir the ingredients well together, turn them into a buttered dish, and bake for a quarter of an hour.

To cook Shad.

With iron the shad should never come in contact. A piece of planed plank, two feet long and one foot wide, with a skewer to impale the fish upon it, are all the culinary implements required. A fire of glowing coals, in front of which the shad is placed, gives you a shad cooked as shad should be. Apicius himself could desire nothing more delicious.

German Method of keeping Cucumbers.

Pare and slice (as for table), sprinkle well with salt, in which leave the cucumbers twenty-four hours; strain the liquor well off, and pack in jars, a thick layer of cucumber and then salt alternately; tie close, and when wanted for use take out the quantity required. Rinse in fresh water, and dress as usual, pepper, vinegar, etc.

To make Cream.

Beat up two eggs with a tablespoonful of cold milk; have ready half a pint of milk boiling hot, to be poured gradually on the eggs, stirring all the time; pour backwards and forwards in the saucepan. If not sufficiently thickened, place on the fire for a moment, but be careful it does not boil, or it will curdle and be spoiled.

Rock Cakes.

Beat well two eggs, and then add one pound of crushed lump sugar, and let it stand for an hour; then add nine ounces of flour and a few drops of the essence of almonds. Bake in a slow oven.

Tipsey Cake.

Cut a small savory cake in slices, put them into a basin, and pour some white wine and a little rum over. Let it soak for a few hours, put into a dish, and serve with some custard round. It may be decorated with a few blanched almonds, or whipped cream and fruit. Or it may be made with small sponge cakes, by soaking them in some white wine in which some currant jelly has been dissolved. Take twelve of them, stale. Soak them well, put them in a dish, cover them with jam or jelly, and thus make four layers, decorating the top with cut preserved fruit. Dish with custard or whipped cream around.

Another Recipe.

Pour a pint of marmala over a sponge cake, let it stand till thoroughly moistened. Blanch and cut in strips half an ounce of sweet almonds, stick them in the cake; lay round it some ratafias. Pour over the whole a custard, made as follows:—Boil in a pint of milk, with a bay-leaf, bit of cinnamon, and loaf sugar to taste. Mix a tablespoonful of ground rice in a teaspoonful of cold milk; beat in the yolks of three eggs; gradually mix it with the boiling milk; strain, and stir it over a clear fire till thick; it must not boil. When cold, add two tablespoonfuls of brandy, and pour over the cake.

Rock Biscuits.

Five yolks and two whites of eggs, beat half an hour with a wooden spoon; add one pound of lump sugar, bruised, not very fine, and beat with the eggs; then add one pound of flour and a few caraway seeds. Mix all well together. Put it with a fork on the tins, making it look as rough as possible. Bake them in a quick oven.

To detect Copper in Pickles or Green Tea.

Put a few leaves of the tea, or some of the pickle, cut small, into a phial with two or three drachms of liquid ammonia, diluted with one half the quantity of water. Shake the phial, when, if the most minute portion of copper be present, the liquid will assume a fine blue color.

Stye on the Eyelid.

Put a teaspoonful of black tea in a small bag; pour on it just enough boiling water to moisten it; then put it on the eye pretty warm. Keep it on all night, and in the morning the stye will most likely be gone; if not, a second application is sure to remove it.

Cambridge Pudding.

Two ounces of loaf-sugar pounded, two ounces of fine flour, two ounces of butter, the yolks of three eggs, the whites of two, and half a pint of new milk. Melt the butter in the milk, and mix the whole together. Put it in tencups, and bake half an hour. Serve with wine sauce.

Receipt for Burns.

Lay a thick plaster of soft soap on the burn; renew it constantly during half an hour, or a shorter time, until the heat is drawn out. It should be applied as soon as possible. The wound will heal in a few days.

Block Biscuits.

Half a pound of butter beaten up to a cream, half a pound of ground rice, three-quarters of a pound of flour, half a pound of loaf-sugar, four eggs, and a little sal volatile.

Editor's Table.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

VOLUME TWELVE.

With the present number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly, we commence the twelfth volume of the work. Its continued and increasing popularity leaves us nothing to desire as it regards its success, but as our list of subscribers grows larger and larger each month, we strive by increased liberality and care to merit the extended patronage which the work has received. That it is valued even for preservation we know very well from the thousands of volumes which we are called upon to bind up for our patrons. We placed the rate of binding, per volume, at the low price of thirty-eight cents, because we desired to make it an object for our friends to preserve the Magazine. In renewing subscriptions for the Magazine, our patrons will please remember that we send Ballou's Dollar Monthly and The Welcome Guest (the largest weekly journal in the country), together, for $2 50 a year.

ACQUIRING WEALTH.—Wealth is not acquired, as many persons suppose, by fortunate speculations and splendid enterprises, but by the daily practice of frugality and economy. He who relies upon these means will rarely be found destitute, and whosoever relies upon any other will generally become bankrupt.

A FALSTAFF.—An immoderate drinker of lager beer died lately in Baltimore, weighing 460 pounds. Ten years ago, he weighed but 150 pounds. It is probable that he tested his body's power of expansion to the utmost, and then expired like the frog in the fable, who sought to emulate the ox.

TRUE CHARITY.—All noble natures are hopeful. It is a remarkable fact, that the purest people are the most charitable people.

WORK AND NO WORK.—Where hard work kills ten, idleness kills a hundred men.

OFFENSIVE MOTTO.

In an article in Blackwood, on the rejoicing which took place in celebration of the short peace concluded between England and France in 1800, the following characteristic anecdote occurs: In the evening London was illuminated, and looked as brilliant as lights and transparencies could make it. An odd incident during the day, however, showed of what tetchy materials a great populace is made. Otto, the French resident, in preparing his house for the illumination, had hung in its front a characteristic motto, in colored lamps, consisting of three words, "France, Concord, England." A party of sailors, who had rambled through the streets to see the preparations for the night, could not bring their tongues to relish this juxtaposition, which they read as if it were—"France conquered England." The mob gathered, and were of the same opinion. Jack began to talk loud, and to speak of the motto as a national insult. Fortunately, however, before the latter could proceed to breaking windows, or perhaps worse, some of the envoy's servants informed their master of the equivocal nature of his motto. The obnoxious word was changed accordingly, and the illumination in the evening (which was most splendid) displayed the motto, "France, Peace, England."

COURT COSTUMES.

The subject of the dress of our American representatives at foreign courts, has recently been revived by a resolution of the United States Senate and a reply of the President transmitting an official correspondence relating to it. Prior to 1853, our ministers and other diplomatic agents were wont to comply with the customs of the courts to which they were accredited, and to wear the dress prescribed for official receptions—usually a sort of uniform coat, chapeau, sword, dress pumps with buckles, etc.; a costume, by the way, not a whit more dashing and extravagant than those worn by the fathers of our republic in the days of Washington. But on this side of the water a hue and cry was raised about the wearing of this uniform. It was called a "livery," an insult to free-born American citizens, a "degrading badge of servility," etc., etc.; and such was the popular feeling about this trivial matter, that the late Mr. Marcy, when Secretary of State, issued a somewhat famous circular, dated June 1, 1853, in which our foreign ministers, charges, secretaries of legation, etc., were recommended to appear at court "in the simple dress of an American citizen." It appears that this order was construed in various ways by our diplomatic servants abroad. Some continued the old official uniform; others strictly obeyed the circular, and clothed themselves in the deep black which is the popular garb of the American citizen, worn alike at bridal, funerals, Fourth of July and other festive occasions, while others again invented "stunning" costumes not known in any military or civil service. We know one gentleman who allowed himself to be presented at the French court (that was in Louis Philippe's time, and years before the circular) in a long-waisted black frock coat radiant with brass eagle buttons, yellow gauntlets, a cavalry sabre, a tall chapeau with a red artillery plume, aiguillettes, epaulettes and brass spurs. His only claim to any uniform, by the way, was that he had been chaplain to a militia regiment.

"The simple garb of an American citizen" strikes us as being too indefinite; for American citizens dress in a variety of ways, and as our diplomatic representatives come from all parts of the republic, if they followed local fashions, they would create, occasionally, no little astonishment in European courts. For instance, the "simple dress of an American citizen" who happens to be a California miner is a slouched hat, a red shirt, and India rubber boots reaching half way up his thighs. Mose of the Bowery, who thinks himself as good as the President, wears a red shirt, a white hat with a weed on it, trousers tucked into his boots, and his coat thrown gracefully over the left arm. A fringed hunting-shirt, leggings and moccasins, are the habitual wear of many an American citizen. Other American citizens wear Panama hats, and luxuriate in cool, white linen coats and pantaloons. Other American citizens, again, are fond of pepper-and-salt coats, shawl-pattern waistcoats and checker-board peg-tops. But the usual full-dress suit worn by the gentlemen of our older Atlantic cities, and we presume that is the standard of diplomatic dress, happens to be, as Mr. Buchanan remarks, "exactly that of the upper court servants in England," so that the American minister at St. James's, if he follow the suggestions of the circular, would present precisely the same external appearance as her majesty's flunkies.

In our view, the outcry raised about our ministers abroad wearing a court dress, is "much ado about nothing." We are of opinion that a foreign sovereign has just as much a right to prescribe the costume of his visitors, as a private gentleman has to regulate the details of a party he gives. A protest against the attire usual at any court, and worn alike by all who appear at it, strikes us as absurdly snobbish. We think there are better ways of exhibiting American independence than by the cut and color of a coat, and the hue and form of a pair of pantaloons; and if a man's nationality is shown in every other way, let us not consider him an outlaw and a traitor, if he is willing to hold a chapeau under his arm, or wear a sword at his side, when it is usual for other gentlemen holding the same official position to do so.

A GENTLE HINT.—Don't undertake to write skim-milk poetry when you feel a little disposed towards enthusiasm. Go and do a kind action, or speak an encouraging word to somebody, if the feeling must have vent. Depend upon it, you'll be better satisfied afterward.

AN INTELLIGENT CHILD.—At an examination in the primary department of a Pittsfield school, the listeners were "brought down" by the answer of a juvenile, when asked of what use whales were. One little miss replied that they were "good for hooped skirts!"

WONDERFUL.—A teacher of penmanship, in twelve lessons, taught a lawyer to read his own writing. Give us his name, and we'll make him President of the United States.

NEW OBJECTS.—The mind requires constant enriching by new objects, as the land needs fertilizers. Without replenishing, the intellect withers.

DU CHAILLU AND THE GORILLA.

Those of our readers who have seen the skeleton of the full-grown male gorilla in School Street, will readily plead guilty to a disinclination to meet a live one in a lonely place. How Du Chaillu raised one of those skeletons he tells us in his journal: "Gambo and I rose early this morning, rather discouraged, as we had spent the two preceding days looking in vain for the gorilla. We had seen their tracks, but nothing of them. Before leaving our encampment, which was simply made with a few branches scattered on the ground, on which we slept during the night, we resolved to spend the day in the ravines of the mountains, where we intended to hunt the gorilla. Gambo made great preparations. He cut his hands in many places, in order to let the blood run freely; afterward he rubbed them with some charmed powder, which was to make his hands sure if called to shoot; he painted his body, and covered himself with his war fetiches. As for me, I was dressed in my usual hunting costume, made of dark blue cloth. I blackened my face and hands, in order not to be easily seen; and was, as usual, very careful in loading my gun, in order that it should not miss fire. We spent the greater part of the day in the midst of these impenetrable forests. At last we met, near a spring, tracks of a gorilla which had just left. His footprints were very large, and we foresaw that we would soon have to encounter a most formidable animal. We were not mistaken, for after a while we were startled by the tremendous roar of the monster. At our approach he raised himself erect, beat with his powerful hands his tremendous chest, and advanced boldly toward us, looking with his fiery eyes straight into our faces, as if to bid us defiance. He showed us at the same time, his powerful teeth. There was no time to be lost. We levelled our guns at the monster together and fired. He fell to the ground, uttering a tremendous groan, and was soon a lifeless corpse."

TERRIBLE.—We dread the political squabble to come off between now and the Presidential election. It will be worse than the late international prize fight.

PHILADELPHIA.—The Press says the present population of Philadelphia, counting none but those who actually sleep within the municipal limits, exceeds 650,000.

ENGLAND.—England ought to be called the Great Water-Power, for she claims to be the mistress of the seas.

EARLY METHODIST MINISTERS.

The early ministers of the Methodist church were restricted in their salary to sixty-four dollars a year, which was to include all presents and marriage fees, and out of which they were to provide their own horses, saddles, clothing and books. Marriage was discouraged amongst them, as their official duties required their whole time. Of Bishop Asbury, Mr. Milburn says: "With all respect to Jonathan Edwards, Dr. Dwight, Dr. Channing, and all other eminent and pre-eminent men of New England—I have read them all, and knew some of them—I think that Francis Asbury, the first superintendent and bishop of our Methodist church, was the most renowned and redoubtable soldier of the Cross that ever advanced the standard of the Lord upon this continent. Yet you will not find his name in a single history of the United States, that I know of; and it is a burning shame that it is so. He travelled for fifty years, on horseback, from Maine to Georgia, and from Massachusetts to the Far West, as population extended, journeying in that time, as was computed, about three hundred thousand miles. He had the care of all the churches; was preaching instant in season and out of season; was laboring indefatigably with the young men to inspire and stimulate them; winning back the lost, and bringing amorphous elements into harmony, in a church, which, when he began with it in 1771, numbered probably not fifty members, and which, when he was an old man—he died in 1816—numbered, white and black, from Maine to California, and from far Northwestern Oregon to sunny Southern Florida, nearly a million of members."

GOOD WIVES.—There is nothing men like to write about better than good wives. This is reasonable enough, for there is nothing, certainly, in which mankind are more interested. "A good wife," says one, "is to a man wisdom and courage, and hope and endurance."

HAPPINESS.—It is a great blunder in the pursuit of happiness not to know when we have got it; that is, not to be content with a reasonable and possible measure of it.

MINNESOTA.—More than double the usual number of acres have been sown with wheat this year in Minnesota, we see it stated.

A QUESTION.—A waggish fellow asks if a trade-wind is the same thing as a financial storm?

THE FIRST DEBT.

Admiral Jervis, of the British Navy, afterwards Earl of St. Vincent, in telling the story of his early struggles, speaks, among other things, of his determination to keep out of debt: "My father had a large family," said he, "with limited means. He gave me twenty pounds sterling at starting, and that was all he ever gave me. After I had been a considerable time at the station (at sea) I drew for twenty more, but the bill came back protested. I was mortified at this rebuke, and made a promise which I have ever kept, that I would never draw another bill without a certainty of its being paid. I immediately changed my mode of living, quitted my mess, lived alone, and took up the ship's allowance, which I found quite sufficient; washed and mended my own clothes; made a pair of trousers out of the ticking of my bed; and, having by these means saved as much money as would redeem my honor, I took up my bill, and from that time to this have taken care to keep within my means." Jervis for six years endured pinching privation, but preserved his integrity, studied his profession with success, and gradually and steadily rose by merit and bravery to the highest rank. It is easy for a man who will exercise a healthy resolution to avoid incurring the first obligation, but the facility with which that has been incurred often becomes a temptation to a second, and very soon the unfortunate borrower becomes so entangled that no late exertion of industry can set him free. The first step in debt is like the first step in falsehood, almost involving the necessity of proceeding in the same course—debt follows debt, as lie follows lie.

LITERARY HABITS.—Schiller, during his hours of composition, kept at his side a bottle of champagne, or Rhenish wine, or a cup of strong coffee. Horace Walpole wrote usually from ten to two o'clock at night, always having strong coffee by him. Sir William Jones drank a great deal of coffee to support him in his nocturnal studies.

EASY TO LEARN.—The Chinese language contains only 42,713 characters, and a knowledge of about one-tenth of these is sufficient to enable Chinese works to be understood. The rather startling proposition is advanced that the Chinese is as clear as the easiest of the modern languages.

A FACT.—If all men knew what they say of one another, there would not be four friends in the world. This appears by the quarrels which are sometimes caused by indiscreet reports.

AMATEUR SAILORS.

We have often felt some little nervous trepidation in sailing on our bay, when we have accepted the invitation of some amateur salt of our acquaintance to take a trip among the islands, and have been seduced into his craft, by the natty and 'shipshepe' appearance of our friend's "togs," the rake of his tarpaulin, the breadth of his blue shirt collar, the multitude of his buttons, the tie of his cravat, and above all the professional seasoning of his discourse. Always eschew an amateur who talks about his "tarry toplichts," and "mizzen to' g'ant eyebrows." Be sure he knows nothing of the rocks and sandbars, is perfectly innocent of the mysteries of "tacking," and unconsciously courts a capsize by "belaying his sheets taut" in a gale, and refusing to "luff" even if the wind "blew great guns." What then must be the danger of the crew of a line-of-battle ship when a crowned head undertakes to play the tar, and that crowned head an autocratic sovereign? That these things be, the following case in point illustrates.

It is stated in a recent work upon Russia, that the late emperor on visiting the ship of the line "Russia," while on the stocks, thought there was not sufficient room to walk about, and accordingly commanded the space to be enlarged, even enforcing his opinion against competent judges. Consequently this vessel is the worst sailer in the whole Russian navy, and is very seldom employed. When he took it into his head to command the movements of a ship, which he did almost every time he went to sea, the captain of the vessel took care always to keep behind him, in order, by counter signals, to prevent the strict execution of his majesty's orders, which would inevitably have led to the loss of the ship and its august passenger.

A POMOLOGICAL CONGRESS.—A grand display will be made by the fruit-growers of the United States, on the 12th of September next, at Concert Hall, Philadelphia, on the occasion of the United States Pomological Congress, which will assemble in that city at that time. Some of the most eminent fruit-growers of the country are concerned in this enterprise.

A TRUTH.—You may outlaw the friend of truth, but truth remains; you may humble the poet, the artist and the Christian, but you cannot debase poetry, or art, or Christianity.

POETRY.—"Building the lofty rhyme," has been explained to be writing verses in a garret.

PREDICTED DEATHS.

In all ages, astrologers, fortune-tellers, diviners and the like, have ministered to the passion of mankind for prying into futurity, by undertaking to foretell the hour and the manner of death of certain individuals, and history is full of the records of the accomplishment of such prophecies. In many of these cases, there is little doubt that the prediction has been forged after the event, in others that the death has been produced by the prophecy, that is, the victim dwelt upon the prediction till imagination destroyed him, while in yet other cases the seer or prophet made a lucky guess. For, although accomplished prophecies are faithfully recorded, unaccomplished prophecies are forgotten, and the ratio of the former to the latter is probably as one to a million. Yet such is the superstition and credulity of mankind, that probably not one in a thousand could listen to a prediction of his death by an ignorant, strolling gipsy without a secret terror. We remember in our boyhood hearing an old lady tell the story of a girl of whom a certain fortune-teller predicted that she should die at noon on a certain day. On that day she was out shopping, and was in the act of leaving a store in Province House Row, when the bell of the Old South struck the hour of twelve she fell dead upon the sidewalk. Supposing this story to be authentic, it may be supposed that the prediction of death, acting on a nervous and excitable temperament, produced the result. Let us cite a few cases of predicted deaths.

"In the autumn of the year 913," says the Russian historian, Nestor, "Oleg, Grand-Duke of Russia, bethought himself of a horse which he had sent to be kept, but which he had ceased to ride. This came about because, one day, seeing a sorcerer, he said to him, 'How am I to die?' And the enchanter or sorcerer had answered him, 'Prince, this horse that you love, and on which you are riding, will be the cause of your death.' Oleg trembled, said to himself, 'I will neither ride him nor see him any more.' He accordingly ordered a servant to feed him, but never to bring the horse before him. Some years passed without his seeing him, until the war against the Greeks. On his return to Kief, and five years after the prediction, he thought of the horse, which, according to the soothsayer's declaration, was to be the cause of his death. He sent for his old groom, and said to him, 'What has become of the horse I gave you to feed and take care of?' The latter answered, 'He is dead.' Oleg then began to mock the prophet, reproaching him with his ignorance, and said, 'All that these sorcerers predict is false.

My horse is dead and I am still living.' And he had a horse saddled and rode forth to see the bones; and when he had reached the place where the bones and the carcass lay, he dismounted, and said, 'There is the beast that was to cause my death.' Thereupon he gave the skull a push with his foot; but immediately a serpent came out of his head, and stung his foot and inflicted a grievous wound of which he died."

When Alvaro de Luna, the celebrated minister and favorite of John II., King of Castile, was beheaded, July 5, 1452, "the rumor spread," says the historian, Mariano, "and it was commonly reported that Don Alvaro, having consulted a certain astrologer on his destiny, the latter said that he would die at Cadahaleo; he did not then understand that cadahaleo signified a scaffold, and that he would lose his head there; but he thought it meant a little town of that name which he owned in the kingdom of Toledo and which he was never willing to enter.

The responses of the classic oracles were worded with such ambiguity that however the event turned out, their reputation was saved. Thus the famous response of the oracle to Pyrrhus, "Thou shalt go; thou shalt return. Never in battle shalt thou perish." Trusting to this prophecy, Pyrrhus went boldly into the campaign and perished; the oracle claiming to have predicted, "Thou shalt go; thou shalt return never. In battle shalt thou perish." Here a mistake in punctuation put a "period" to poor Pyrrhus's career.

When James I., King of Scotland, hated by the nobility whose arrogance he labored to repress, was repairing to Perth, in 1437, while a conspiracy laid by Robert Grahame was organizing against him, a Highland woman tried to prevent him from entering the city, and predicted he would perish if he persisted in his resolution. James was struck with these words, which tallied with a prophecy according to which a king would be killed in Scotland that year; but, without attaching much importance to it, he said laughingly, to one of his knights, who was surnamed the "King of Love," "Well, one of us is to die this year, for we are the only two kings in Scotland." Still the event justified the prediction, and James was assassinated on the 20th of February.

The deaths of several princes have been predicted in different ways. Philip le Bel and Clement V. were, it is said, summoned to the bar of God by the Templars whom the King of France had with the consent of the pope, doomed to perish at the stake, and both actually died in 1314.

"In 1312," says Mariana, "Ferdinand IV., king of Castile, caused to be arrested two brothers, Don Pedro and Don Juan de Carvajal, who were accused of having assassinated a lord of the House of Benevides, at Valencia, as they were leaving the palace. It was not certainly known who the assassins were; many persons were suspected of the deed, and withal thoroughly examining whether the suspicion was well or ill-founded, they were treated in their prison with the extremest rigor; but finally the two brothers Carvajal suffered for all the rest. In vain did they repel the charge; no attention was paid to the reasons they alleged in the defence; they were declared guilty of leze-majesty, and as such condemned to death, without having been judicially convicted, and without having made any confession. They were sentenced to be thrown from the top of a steep rock near Martos, without any one daring to speak in their favor, for the king was intractable in his anger when the offence was recent. As the two brothers were led to punishment, they declared with a loud voice that they died innocent, calling on heaven, earth and God himself to witness their innocence, and saying that, since the king was deaf to their just complaints, they appealed to the tribunal of the sovereign judge before whom they cited King Ferdinand to appear in thirty days. At first little attention was paid to these words, but what happened afterwards, either by chance or otherwise, awakened profound reflection. The death of the king was attributed to excessive eating, gluttony being a common failing of his; but others regarded it a just punishment for the execution of the Carvajals, the more so since exactly thirty days elapsed from their execution to the king's death; hence it comes that he was called 'Don Ferdinand the Summoned.'"

FACTS FOR PARENTS.

A number of physicians, practising in New York and in Brooklyn, having "compared notes," have come to the conclusion that one leading cause of the great mortality among children arises from their being left too much to the care of servants. It has been observed that children who are taken care of by their parents—undressed and put to bed by them, and by them dressed in the morning, and kept under a loving mother's eye during the day—are, as a general thing, far more healthy, good-tempered and intelligent than such as are left almost exclusively to the care of servants. In addition to this, it must be remembered that most of the accidents which happen to children, whereby they are seriously injured, and sometimes crippled, maimed or rendered idiotic, occur through the negligence of those in whose care they are left by unthinking or unloving parents. Parents who love their children would do well to give these statements their earnest consideration; for, if they are true, the facts on which they are predicated lie at the very basis of domestic well-being and happiness.

"TIME TRIES ALL THINGS."—An old but true saying, as shown in the instance of Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry, now acknowledged to be the remedy par excellence for the cure of coughs, colds, croup, whooping-cough, bronchitis, asthma, phthisis, sore throat, influenza, and last, but by no means least, consumption. Years of steady trial have placed this remarkable medicine in a position rarely attained by any patent compound, and it has become an article of household necessity everywhere. Buy none unless it has the written signature of "I. Butts" upon the wrapper, which is always the case with the genuine.

A CHAPTER ON DOGS.

If it were necessary to give a reason for devoting a dozen pages of our Magazine, and as many engravings, to the subject of domesticated dogs, we need only quote the words of Sir Walter Scott—clarum et venerabile nomen—as authority for the importance of our theme: "The Almighty, who gave the dog to be the companion of our pleasures and our toils, hath invested him with a nature noble and incapable of deceit. He forgets neither friend nor foe—remembers, and with accuracy, both benefit and injury. He hath a share of man's intelligence, but no share of man's falsehood. You may bribe a soldier to slay a man with his sword, or a witness to take life by false accusation, but you cannot make a dog tear his benefactor. He is the friend of man, save when man justly incurs his enmity." Pope, too, says—"Histories are more full of examples of the fidelity of dogs than of friends." We might, indeed, embroider our text with a thousand quotations from distinguished authors, all eulogizing the important services of dogs, and their admirable qualities. The theme is a prolific one.

PERSIAN GREYHOUND.

KING CHARLES SPANIELS.

The original parentage of the dog is an unsettled question; some writers attribute it to the Dhole or the Buansuah; others to the wolf and others again to the fox. Each of these theories has warm advocates, but the point is still a bone of contention. Be that as it may, there are few parts of the world in which the dog is not found, and wherever found, he contributes either to the pleasure or profit of man, his master.

Our first engraving represents the Persian Greyhound, the noblest representative of the greyhound family—a truly beautiful and graceful animal. Powerful of jaw, quick and supple of limb, the Persian greyhound is chosen to cope with that swift and daring animal, the wild ass, as well as with the no less rapid antelope, and the slower, but more dangerous, wild boar.

Of all these creatures, the wild ass gives the most trouble, for it instinctively keeps to rocky and mountainous neighborhoods, which afford a refuge unassailable by the sure-footed Persian horse, and from which it can only be driven by such agile creatures as the native greyhounds. So untiring is the wild ass, and so boldly does it traverse the rocky mountain spurs among which it loves to dwell, that a single ass is so agile as to baffle the best hounds, and get away fairly into cover, from whence the greyhound, working only by sight, is unable to drive it. Naturally, the greyhound of pure blood is not possessed of a very determined character, and it is therefore found necessary to give these creatures the proper amount of endurance by crossing them with the bull-dog, one of the most determined and courageous animals in existence. As may be supposed, the immediate offspring of a bulldog and a greyhound is a most ungainly animal, but by continually crossing with the pure greyhound, the outward shape of the thick and sturdy bulldog is entirely merged in the more graceful animal, while his stubborn pertinacity remains implanted in its nature. The skeleton of the greyhound is a curious one, and when viewed from behind, bears a marvellous resemblance to that of the ostrich. The narrow head and sharp nose of the greyhound, useful as they are for aiding the progress of the animal by removing every impediment to its passage through the atmosphere, yet deprive it of a most valuable faculty, that of chasing by scent. The muzzle is so narrow in proportion to its length, that the nasal nerves have no room for proper development, and hence the animal is very deficient in its powers of scent. The same circumstance may be noted in many other animals.

In England the greyhound is used for coursing hares. Jesse, in his "Anecdotes of Dogs," says:

"Various have been the opinions upon the difference of speed between a well-bred greyhound and a race-horse, if opposed to each other. Wishes had been frequently indulged by the sporting world, that some criterion could be adopted by which the superiority of speed could be fairly ascertained, when the following circumstance accidentally took place, and afforded some information upon what had been previously considered a matter of great uncertainty. In the month of December, some years ago, a match was to have been run over Doncaster race-course for one hundred guineas; but one of the horses having been drawn, a mare started alone, that by running the ground she might ensure the wager, when having run about one mile in the four, she was accompanied by a greyhound bitch, which joined her from the side of the course, and emulatively entering into the competition, continued to race with the mare for the other three miles, keeping nearly head and head, and affording an excellent treat to the field by the energetic exertions of each. At passing the distance-post, five to four was betted in favor of the greyhound; when parallel with the stand, it was even betting, and any person might have taken his choice from five to ten: the mare, however, had the advantage of a head at the termination of the course.

"The courage and spirit of these dogs is very great. A greyhound ran a hare single-handed and raced her so hard, that, not having time to run through an opening at the bottom of some paling, she and the greyhound made a spring at the same moment at the top of the pales. The dog seized her at the instant she reached it, and in the momentary struggle he slipped between two broken pales, each of which ran into the top of his thighs. In this situation he hung till the horsemen came up, when, to their great surprise, he had the hare fast in his mouth, which was taken from him before he could be released.

"I saw a hare coursed on the Brighton Downs some years ago by two celebrated greyhounds. Such was the length of the course, some of it up very steep hills, that the hare fell dead before the dogs, who were so exhausted that they only reached to within six feet of her. This was one of the severest courses ever witnessed.

"On another occasion, two dogs ran a hare for several miles, and with such speed as to be very soon out of sight of the coursing party. After a considerable search, both the dogs and the hare were found dead within a few yards of each other; nor did it appear that the former had touched the hare. Mr. Daniel, in his 'Rural Sports,' states that a brace of greyhounds, in Lincolnshire, ran a hare from her seat to where she was killed, a distance, measuring straight, of upwards of four miles, in twelve minutes. During the course there was a good number of turns, which must have very considerably increased the space gone over. The hare ran till she died before the greyhounds touched her.

"In the year 1798, a brace of greyhounds, the property of Mr. Courtall of Carlisle, coursed a hare from the Swift, near that city, and killed her at Clemmell, seven miles distant. Both greyhounds were so exhausted, that unless the aid of medical men, who happened to be on the spot, had been immediately given, they would have died, and it was with difficulty they were recovered."

The King Charles Spaniel takes its name from the merry monarch, Charles II. of England, who took great delight in these delicate and playful little creatures, and used to walk in Hyde Park, surrounded by a host of them. It is a very small animal, as a really fine specimen ought not to exceed six or seven pounds in weight. Some of the most valuable King Charles Spaniels weigh as little as five pounds, or even less. These little creatures have been trained to search for and put up game after the manner of their larger relatives, the springers and cockers, but they cannot endure severe exercise, or long-continued exertion, and ought only to be employed on very limited territory. On one occasion, one of these little dogs was the means of saving the life of his mistress.

"About the year 1800, Mrs. Osburn, who lived a few miles out of London, went to town to receive a large sum of money granted her by Parliament for discovering a lithontrypic medicine. She received the money, and returned back with it in her own carriage to the country, without anything particular happening to her on the road. It was evening when she arrived at home; and being fatigued with her journey, she retired early to rest. On her stepping into bed, she was somewhat surprised at the importunities of a small

FOX TERRIER DOG.

SPANIEL.

King Charles's dog, which was a great pet, and always slept in her bedchamber. He became exceedingly troublesome, and kept pulling the bedclothes with all his strength. She chid him repeatedly, and in an angry tone of voice desired him to lie still, that she might go to sleep. The dog, however, still persisted in his efforts, and kept pulling the bedclothes; and at length leaped on the bed, and endeavored with the most determined perseverance to pull off the bedclothes. Mrs. Osburn then conceived there must be some extraordinary cause for this unusual conduct on the part of her dog, and leaped out of bed; and being a lady of some courage, put on her petticoat, and placed a brace of pistols by her side, which she had always ready loaded in a closet adjoining her bed-room, and proceeded down stairs. When she had reached the first landing-place, she saw her coachman coming down the private staircase, which led to the servants' rooms, with a lighted candle in his hand, and full dressed. Suspecting his intentions were bad, and with heroic presence of mind, she presented one of her pistols, and threatened to lodge the contents of it in him, unless he returned to bed forthwith. Subdued by her determined courage, he quietly and silently obeyed. She then went into a back-parlor, when she heard a distant whispering of voices; she approached the window, and threw it up, and fired one of her pistols out of it, in the direction from which the noise proceeded. Everything became silent, and not a whisper was to be heard. After looking through the different rooms on the lower floor, and finding all right, she proceeded to bed and secured the door, and nothing further occurred that night. Next morning she arose at an early hour, went into the garden, and in the direction which she had fired the preceding night she discovered drops of blood, which she traced to the other end of the garden. This left no doubt on her mind of what had been intended. Thinking it imprudent to keep so large a sum of money in her house, she ordered her carriage to drive to town, where she deposited her cash. She then repaired to the house of Sir John Fielding, and related to him the whole affair, who advised her to part with her coachman immediately, and that he would investigate the matter, and, if possible, discover and convict the offenders. But the parties concerned in this affair were never discovered; for the mere fact of the coachman being found coming down the stair was not sufficient to implicate him, although there were strong grounds of suspicion. Thus, by the instinct and fidelity of this little animal, was robbery, and most likely murder, prevented."

The Pomeranian Fox Dog, of which we present a good engraving, is much fancied as a house-dog and companion. It is very intelligent in its character, and its long white fur and bushy tail give it quite a distinguished appearance, of which the animal seems to be thoroughly aware. Sometimes the coat of this animal is a cream color, and very rarely is deep black. The pure white, however, seems to be the favorite. It is a lively little creature, and makes an excellent companion in a country walk.

The Spaniel is a favorite dog with sportsmen, and is a beautiful and intelligent creature. The following old, but interesting anecdote of the spaniel, is taken from Daniel's "Rural Sports:" "A few days before the overthrow of Robespierre, a revolutionary tribunal had condemned M. R——, an upright magistrate and a most estimable man, on a pretence of finding him guilty of a conspiracy. His faithful dog, a spaniel, was with him when he was seized, but was not suffered to enter the prison. He took refuge with a neighbor of his master's, and every day at the same hour returned to the door of the prison, but was still refused admittance. He, however, uniformly passed some time there, and his unremitting fidelity won upon the porter, and the dog was allowed to enter. The meeting may be better imagined than described. The jailor, however, fearful for himself, carried the dog out of the prison; but he returned the next morning, and was regularly admitted on each day afterwards. When the day of sentence arrived, the dog, notwithstanding the guards, penetrated into the hall, where he lay crouched between the legs of his master. Again, at the hour of execution, the faithful dog is there: the knife of the guillotine falls—he will not leave the lifeless and headless body. The first night, the next day, and the second night, his absence alarmed his new patron, who, guessing whither he had retired, sought him, and found him stretched upon his master's grave. From this time, for three months, every morning the mourner returned to his prison merely to receive food, and then again retreated to the grave. At length he refused food, his patience seemed exhausted, and with temporary strength, supplied by his long-trying and unexhausted affection, for twenty-four hours he was observed to employ his weakened limbs in digging up the earth that separated him from the being he had served. His powers, however, here gave way; he shrieked in his struggles, and at length ceased to breathe, with his last look turned upon the grave."

Jesse says: "The late Reverend Mr. Corsellis, of Wivenhoe, in Essex, had an old game-keeper who had reared a spaniel, which became his constant companion, day and night. Whenever the keeper appeared, Dash was close behind him, and was of infinite use in his master's nocturnal excursions. The game at night was never regarded, although in the day no spaniel could find it in better style, or in a greater quantity. If at night, however, a strange foot entered the covert, Dash, by a significant whine, informed his master that an enemy was abroad, and thus many poachers have been detected. After many years of friendly companionship, the keeper was seized with a disease which terminated in death. Whilst the slow but fatal progress of his disorder allowed him to crawl about, Dash, as usual, followed his footsteps; and when nature was nearly exhausted, and he took to his bed, the faithful animal unweariedly attended at the foot of it. When he died, the dog would not quit the body, but lay on the bed by its side. It was with difficulty he could be induced to eat any food; and though after the burial he was caressed with all the tenderness which so fond an attachment naturally called forth, he took every opportunity to steal back to the room where his old master died. Here he would remain for hours, and from thence he daily visited his grave. At the end, however, of fourteen days, notwithstanding every kindness and attention shown him, the poor, faithful animal died, a victim of grief for the loss of his master."

DANISH DOG.

MALTESE DOG.

Buffon was of opinion that the Danish Dog, which is chiefly found in Denmark, Russia, and Northern Germany, is only the Matin (the usual sheep-dog of France) transported into a northern latitude. The color of this dog is generally white, marked all over his body with black spots and patches, in general larger than those of the Dalmatian, of which some have supposed him to be a congener. His ears are for the most part white, while those of the Dalmatian are usually black. The great Danish dog is a fine sprightly animal, but is of little use either for sporting or watching. Like the Dalmatian, he is chiefly used in this country as an attendant on carriages, to which he forms an elegant appendage. Mr. Johnson, a traveller from Manchester, on his route through Scotland on horseback, was benighted, and coming to a small public house on the road, he thought it better to take up his lodgings there, if possible, than to proceed further that night. On entering the house, he found only an old woman, who, to his inquiries, answered she would accommodate him with a bed, and provide for the horse in a small shed, if he would assist her in carrying hay and litter, as there was no other person then in the house. This was readily agreed to by Mr. Johnson, who, after having done so, and taken a little refreshment, was shown by the old woman to his bedroom. A large Danish dog, which accompanied him on his journey, offered to go up to the room with him, which the old woman strongly objected to; but Mr. Johnson firmly persisted in having him admitted. The dog, on entering the room, began to growl, and was altogether very unruly. His master in vain attempted to quiet him—he kept growling and looking angrily under the bed, which induced Mr. Johnson to look there likewise, when, to his utter astonishment, he saw a man concealed at the further end. On encouraging the dog, he sprang immediately at him, whilst Mr. Johnson seized his pistols, and presenting one at the stranger, who had a large knife in his hand, and was struggling with the dog, declared he would instantly shoot him if he made further resistance. The man then submitted to be bound, and acknowledged that his intention was to rob and murder Mr. Johnson, which was thus providentially prevented by the wonderful sagacity of his faithful dog. Mr. Johnson, after securely binding the man and fastening the door, went (accompanied by his dog) to the shed where his horse was left, which he instantly mounted, and escaped without injury to the next town, where he gave to a magistrate a full account of the murderous attempt, and the culprit was taken into custody and afterwards executed. A gamekeeper belonging to the castle of Holstein (in Denmark), returned one evening from a long and fatiguing chase, and deposited the game in the larder, without being aware that he had locked up his dog at the same time.

Business of importance unexpectedly called him away immediately afterwards, and he did not return for five days, when, mindful of his game, he went to the larder, and beheld his dog stretched dead at the door. The gamekeeper stood extremely affected; but what were his sensations, when he saw on the table eleven brace of partridges and five grouse, untouched? This admiration increased his grief, when he found the poor dog had suffered starvation, rather than transgress his duty.

The Maltese Dog, as its name implies, was originally brought from Malta. It is the prettiest and most lovable of all tiny pet dogs. It is a very scarce animal, and at one time was thought to be extinct; but there are still specimens to be obtained by those who have no objection to pay the price which is demanded for these pretty little creatures. The hair of this tiny creature is very long, extremely silky, and almost unique in its glossy sheen, so beautifully fine as to resemble spun glass. In proportion to the size of the animal, the fur is so long that when it is in rapid movement, the real shape is altogether lost in the streaming mass of flossy hair. One of these animals, which barely exceeds three pounds in weight, measures no less than fifteen inches in length of hair across the shoulders. The tail of the Maltese dog curls strongly over the back, and adds its wealth of silken fur to the already superfluous torrent of glistening tresses. It is a lively and very good-tempered little creature, endearing itself by sundry curious little ways to those with whom it is brought in contact.

Every one is familiar with the Poodle, one of the most intelligent and teachable of animals. A dog of this kind is one of the heroes of Bulwer's popular novel—"What Will He Do With It?" Jesse says: "A shoe-black on the Pont Neuf at Paris had a poodle-dog, whose sagacity brought no small profit to his master. If the dog saw a person with well-polished boots go across the bridge, he contrived to dirty them, by having first rolled himself in the mud of the Seine. His master was then employed to clean them. An English gentleman, who had suffered more than ones from the annoyance of having his boots dirtied by a dog, was at last induced to watch his proceedings, and thus detected the tricks he was playing for his master's benefit. He was so much pleased with the animal's sagacity, that he purchased him at a high price and conveyed him to London. On arriving there, he was confined to the house till he appeared perfectly satisfied with his new master and his new situation. He at last, however, contrived to escape, and made his way back to Paris, where he rejoined his old master, and resumed his former occupation. I was at Paris some years ago, where this anecdote was related to me, and it is now published in the records of the French Institute."

The Newfoundland Dog, delineated in one of our engravings, is a truly noble animal. When we reflect on the docility of the Newfoundland dog, his affectionate disposition, his aptitude in receiving instruction, and his instantaneous sense of impending danger, we shall no longer wonder at his being called the friend of his master, whom he is at all times ready to defend at the risk of his own life. How noble is his appearance, and at the same time how serene is his countenance! No animal, perhaps, can show more real courage than this dog. His perseverance in what he undertakes is so great, that he never relinquishes an attempt which has been enjoined on him as long as there is a chance of success. We allude more particularly to storms at sea and consequent shipwreck, when his services, his courage, and indefatigable exertions, have been truly wonderful. Numerous persons have been saved from a watery grave by these dogs, and ropes have been conveyed by them from a sinking ship to the shore amidst foaming billows, by which means whole crews have been saved from destruction. Their feet are particularly well adapted to enable them to swim, being webbed very much like those of a duck, and they are at all times ready to plunge into the water to save a human being from drowning. Some dogs delight in following a fox, others in hunting the hare, or killing vermin. The delight of the Newfoundland dog appears to be in the preservation of the lives of the human race. A story is related, on good authority, of one of these dogs being in the habit, when he saw persons swimming in the Seine at Paris, of seizing them and bringing them to the shore. In the immediate neighborhood of Windsor, England, a servant was saved from drowning by a Newfoundland dog, who seized him by the collar of his coat when he was almost exhausted, and brought him to the banks, where some of the family were assembled watching with great anxiety the exertions of the noble animal.

The English Pointer is a capital sporting dog. While it possesses a sufficiently wide muzzle to permit the development of the olfactory nerves, its limbs are so light and wiry that it can mate almost any dog in speed. Indeed, some of these animals are known to equal a slow greyhound in point of swiftness. This quality is specially useful, because it permits the sportsman to walk forward, at a moderate pace, while his dogs are beating over the field to his right and left. The sagacious animals are so obedient to the voice and gesture of their master, and are so well trained to act with each other, that at a wave of the hand they will separate, one going to the right and the other to the left, and so traverse the entire field in a series of "tacks," to speak nautically, crossing each other regularly in front of the sportsman as he walks forward. When either of them scents a bird, he stops suddenly, arresting even his foot as it is raised in the air, his head thrust forward, his body and limbs fixed, and his tail stretched straight out behind him. This attitude is termed a "point," and on account of this peculiar mode of indicating game, the animal is termed the "pointer." The dogs are so trained that when one of them comes to a point he is backed by his companion, so as to avoid the disturbance of more game than is necessary for the purpose of the sportsman. It is a matter of some difficulty to teach their lesson rightly, for the dogs are quite as liable to error through their over-anxiety to please their master as through sluggishness or carelessness. Such dogs are very provoking in the field, for they will come to a point at almost every strange odor that crosses their nostrils, and so will stand at pigs, sparrows, cats, or any other creature that may come in their way, and will hold so firmly to their "point" that they cannot be induced to move, except by compulsory means. This extreme excitability seems to be caused by too close adherence to the same stock in breeding, and is set right by a judicious admixture with another family. According to "Stonehenge," the marks of a good pointer are as follows: "A moderately large head, wide rather than long, with a high forehead and an intelligent eye, of medium size.

the greyhound, and the depth in the back ribs being proportionably greater than in that dog. The tail, or 'stern,' as it is technically called, is strong at the root, but, suddenly diminishing, it becomes very fine, and then continues nearly of the same size to within two inches of the tip, where it goes off to a point, looking as sharp as the sting of a wasp, and giving the whole very much the appearance of that part of the insect, but magnified as a matter of course. This peculiar shape of the stern characterizes the breed,

NEWFOUNDLAND DOG.

Muzzle broad, with its outline square in front, not receding as in the hound. Flews (i. e. the overhanging lips) manifestly present, but not pendent. The head should be well set on the neck, with a peculiar form at the junction only seen in the pointer. The neck itself should be long, convex in its upper outline, without any tendency to a dewlap or a ruff, as the loose skin covered with long hair round the neck is called. The body is of good length, with a strong loin, wide hips, and rather arched ribs, the chest being well let down, but not in a hatchet shape as in and its absence shows a cross with the hound or some other dog." The author then proceeds to recommend long, slanting, but muscular shoulder-blades, a long upper arm, a very low elbow, and a short fore-arm. The feet must be round and strong, and padded with a thick sole, the knee strong, and the ankle of full size. The color is of comparatively small importance, but ought, if possible, to be white, so that the animal may be visible while beating among heather, clover, or turnips. Black or liver-colored dogs are very handsome to the eye, but often cause much trouble to the sportsman, on account of the difficulty of distinguishing them among the herbage. White dogs, with lemon-colored heads, are the favorites of this author.

The Esquimaux Dogs are extremely like the gray wolves of the Arctic circle in form and color, and nearly equal to them in size. To the Esquimaux Indians the services of this animal are invaluable. He assists them to hunt the bear, the reindeer, and the seal; in summer, while attending his master in the chase, he carries a and the length of his body from the back of the head to the commencement of the tail, is two feet three inches. His coat is long and furry, and is sometimes brindled, sometimes of a dingy red, sometimes black and white, and sometimes almost wholly black. The manner in which the sledge is drawn by these animals is thus described by Captain Parry: "When drawing a sledge the dogs have a simple harness of deer or seal skin, going round the neck by one bight, and another for each of the fore legs, with a single thong weight of thirty pounds; in winter he is yoked to a sledge, and conveys his master over the trackless snows. Several of them drawing together will convey five or six persons, at the rate of seven or eight miles an hour, and will travel sixty miles in a day. In winter he is scantily fed, and roughly treated, yet his fidelity remains unshaken. The Esquimaux dog does not bark. In appearance he comes nearest to the shepherd's dog and the wolf dog. His ears are short and erect, and his bushy tail curves elegantly over his back. His average stature is one foot ten inches, leading over the back, and attached to the sledge as a trace. Though they appear, at first sight, to be huddled together without regard to regularity, there is, in fact, some considerable attention paid to their arrangement, particularly in the selection of a dog with a very peculiar spirit and sagacity, who is allowed, by a longer trace, to precede the rest as leader, and to whom, in turning to the right or left, the driver usually addresses himself. The choice is made without regard to age or sex, and the rest of the dogs take precedence according to their training or sagacity, the least effective being put nearest the sledge. The leader is usually from eighteen to twenty feet from the forepart of the sledge, and the hindmost dog about half the distance; so that when ten or twelve are running together, several are nearly abreast of each other. The driver sits quite low on the fore part of the sledge, with his feet overhanging the snow on one side, and having in his hand a whip, of which the handle is plaited a little way down to stiffen it, and give it a spring, on which much of its use depends; and that which composes the lash is chewed by the women, to make it flexible in frosty weather. The men acquire, from their youth, considerable expertness in the use of this whip, the lash of which is left to trail along the ground by the side of the sledge, and with which they can inflict a very severe blow on any dog at pleasure. Though the dogs are kept in training entirely by fear of the whip, and, indeed, without it, would soon have their own way, its immediate effect is always detrimental to the draught of the sledge; for not only does the individual that is struck draw back, and slacken his trace, but generally turns upon his next neighbor, and this passing on to the next, occasions a general divergency, accompanied by the usual yelping and showing of the teeth. The dogs then come together again by degrees, and the draught of the sledge is accelerated; but even at the best of times, by this rude mode of draught, the traces of one third of the dogs form an angle of thirty or forty degrees on each side of the direction in which the sledge is advancing. Another great inconvenience attending the Esquimaux method of putting the dogs to, besides that of not employing their strength to the best advantage, is the constant entanglement of some of the traces, by the dogs repeatedly doubling under from side to side to avoid the whip; so that after running a few miles the traces always require to be taken off and cleared. In directing the sledge, the whip acts no very essential part, the driver for this purpose using certain words, as the carters do with us, to make the dogs turn more to the right or left. To these a good leader attends with admirable precision, especially if his own name be repeated at the same time, looking behind over his shoulder with great earnestness, as if listening to the directions of the driver. On a beaten track, or even where a single foot or sledge mark is occasionally discernible, there is not the slightest trouble in guiding the dogs; for even in the darkest night, and in the heaviest snow-drift, there is little or no danger of their losing the road, the leader keeping his nose near the ground, and directing the rest with wonderful sagacity. Where, however, there is no beaten track, the best driver among them makes a terrible circuitous course, as all the Esquimaux roads plainly show; these generally occupying an extent of six miles, when with a horse and sledge the journey would scarcely have amounted to five. On rough ground, as among hummocks of ice, the sledge would be frequently overturned, or altogether stopped, if the driver did not repeatedly get off, and by lifting or drawing it on one side, steer clear of those accidents. At all times, indeed, except on a smooth and well-made road, he is pretty constantly employed thus with his feet, which renders the driving of one of these vehicles by no means a pleasant or easy task. When the driver wishes to stop the sledge, he calls out, 'Wo, wo,' exactly as our carters do, but the attention paid to this command depends altogether on his ability to enforce it. Six or seven dogs will draw from eight to ten hundred weight, at the rate of seven or eight miles an hour, for several hours together; and will easily, even under these circumstances, perform a journey of fifty or sixty miles a day over the snow and ice."

The Bloodhound is a noble and intelligent animal, of rare sagacity in tracking a foe. In the good old times of "merry England," they were used in hunting men, but now they are chiefly employed in that country in deer-shooting, aiding the sportsman by singling out some animal, and keeping it ever before him, and by driving it in certain directions, giving to its master an opportunity for a shot from his rifle. Should the deer not fall to the shot, but be only wounded, it dashes off at a greatly increased pace, followed by the bloodhound, which here displays his qualities. Being guided by the blood-drops that stud the path of the wounded animal, the hound has an easy task in keeping the trail, and by dint of persevering exertions is sure to come up with his prey at last. The bloodhound is generally irascible in temper, and therefore a rather dangerous animal to be meddled with by any one excepting its owner. So fierce is its desire for blood, and so utterly is it excited when it reaches its prey, that it will often keep its master at bay when he approaches, and receive his overtures with such unmistakable indications of anger that he will not venture to approach until his dog has satisfied its appetite on the carcass of the animal which it has brought to the ground. When fairly on the track of the deer, the bloodhound utters a peculiar, long, loud, and deep bay, which, if once heard, will never be forgotten. The modern bloodhound is not the same animal as that which was known by the same title in the days of early English history, the breed of which is supposed to be extinct. The ancient bloodhound was, from all accounts, an animal of extremely irritable temper, and therefore more dangerous as a companion than the modern hound. The color of a good bloodhound ought to be nearly uniform, no white being permitted, except on the tip of the stern. The prevailing tints are a blackish tan, or a deep fawn. The tail of this dog is long and sweeping, and by certain expressive wavings and flourishings of that member, the animal indicates its success or failure.

Jesse says: "In 1803, the Thrapston Association for the prosecution of felons in Northamptonshire, procured and trained a bloodhound for the detection of sheep-stealers. In order to prove the utility of the dog, a man was despatched from a spot where a great concourse of people were assembled, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, and an hour afterwards the hound was laid on the scent. After a chase of an hour and a half, the hound found him secreted in a tree many miles from the place of starting. The very knowledge that farmers could readily have recourse to the assistance of such a dog, would serve to prevent the commission of much crime. To try whether a young bloodhound was well instructed, a nobleman (says Mr. Boyle) caused one of his servants to walk to a town four miles off, and then to a market town three miles from thence. The dog, without seeing the man he was to pursue, followed him by the scent to the above-mentioned places, notwithstanding the multitude of people going the same road, and of travellers that had occasion to cross it. When the hound came to the chief market-town, he passed through the streets, without noticing any of the people there, till he got to the house where the man he sought was, and there found him in an upper room."

The Scotch Greyhound, a picture of which closes our series of illustrations, is a noble and powerful animal, of great fleetness and highly valued for his services in the hunting-field.

In addition, likewise, to the beauty, elegance, high spirit, and speed of the greyhound, may be mentioned his mild and affectionate disposition, as well as his fidelity and attachment to those who treat him with kindness. We might give many anecdotes illustrating these and many other traits, especial to the whole dog tribe, but all of our readers are familiar with such facts, and we bring this article to a close, believing that we have given enough to furnish a topic of interest and information worthy of attentive perusal.

CRUELTY.

The spring-time of our years
Is soon dishonored and defiled in most
By budding ill, that ask a prudent hand
To check them. But, alas, none sooner shoot,
If unrestrained, into luxuriant growth
Than cruelty, most devilish of them all!—Cowper.

BERNARDO DEL CARPIO SUING TO THE KING.

BERNARDO DEL CARPIO.

BY FELICIA HEMANS.

We present in this number of the Magazine a series of fine designs, executed expressly for us, illustrating the most striking points in this most popular of Mrs. Hemans's lyrical poems. The story, which the poetess has made immortal, is thrilling and touching. Bernardo del Carpio, a renowned Spanish chieftain, had made frantic efforts to procure the release of his father, the Count of Saldana, who had been kept in prison by Alfonso, king of Asturias, almost from the hour of Bernardo's birth. Bernardo made war upon the crown with such success, that the leading nobles urged upon the king to compromise the matter. Alfonso agreed to restore the count to his son on condition of the latter surrendering the fortresses and prisoners he had taken—and the champion faithfully fulfilled his part of the contract. He rode forth to meet his father—the ballad informs us of the result. The early chronicles and romances leave us entirely in the dark with regard to the ultimate fate of Bernardo. Our artist has sketched five designs—the first, representing Bernardo appealing to the king to release his father; the second, showing him on his way to meet the count; the third, the unhappy discovery of the truth; and the fourth, the champion bringing the king and his victim face to face; and the last, the tomb of Count Saldana. The drawings are full of spirit, and the engravings beautifully executed.

The warrior bowed his crested head
And tamed his heart of fire,
And sued the haughty king to free
His long-imprisoned sire.
"I bring thee here my fortress-keys,
I bring my captive train,

I pledge thee faith, my liege, my lord,
O, break my father's chain!"

"Rise, rise! even now thy father comes,
A ransomed man this day;
Mount thy good horse, and thou and I
Will meet him on his way."
Then lightly rose that loyal son,
And bounded on his steed,
And urged, as if with lance in rest,
The charger's foamy speed.

And lo! from far, as on they passed,
There came a glittering band,
With one that 'midst them stately rode,
As a leader in the land.

"Now haste, Bernardo, haste! for there
In very truth is he—
The father whom thy faithful heart
Hath yearned so long to see."

His dark eye flashed, his proud breast heaved,
His cheek's blood came and went;
He reached that gray-haired chieftain's side,
And there dismounting bent.
A lowly knee on earth he bent,
His father's hand he took—
What was there in his touch that all
His fiery spirit shook?

The hand was cold—a frozen thing—
It dropped from his like lead;
He looked up to the face above—
The face was of the dead!
A plume waved o'er the noble brow—
The brow was fixed and white;
He met at last his father's eyes,
But in them was no sight!

Up from the ground he sprung and gazed;
But who could paint that gaze?
They hushed their very hearts that saw
Its terror and amaze.

They might have chained him as before
That stony form he stood,
For the power was stricken from his arm,
And from his lip the blood.

"Father!" at length he murmured low,
And wept like childhood then:
Talk not of grief till thou hast seen
The tears of warlike men!
He thought of all his glorious hopes,
And all his young renown—
He flung the falchion from his side,
And in the dust sat down.

Then covering with his steel-gloved hands
His darkly mournful brow,
"No more—there is no more," he said,
"To lift the sword for now.

And sternly set them face to face—
The king before the dead!

"Came I not forth upon thy pledge,
My father's hand to kiss?
Be still, and gaze thou on, false king,
And tell me what is this!
The voice, the glance, the heart I sought—
Give answer, where are they?
If thou wouldst clear thy perjured soul,
Send life through this cold clay!

"Into these glassy eyes put light—
Be still, keep down thine ire—
Bid these white lips a blessing speak:
This earth is not my sire!
Give me back him for whom I strove,
For whom my blood was shed;

BERNARDO RIDING TO MEET HIS FATHER.

My king is false, my hope betrayed,
My father—O, the worth,
The glory and the loveliness
Are passed away from earth!

"I thought to stand where banners waved,
My sire! beside thee yet,
I would that there our kindred blood
On Spain's free soil had met;
Thou wouldst have known my spirit then,
For thee my fields were won—
And thou hast perished in thy chains,
As though thou hadst no son!"

Then, starting from the ground once more,
He seized the monarch's rein,
Amidst the pale and wildered looks
Of all the courtier train;
And with a fierce, o'ermastering grasp,
The rearing war horse led,

Thou canst not—and a king? His dust
Be mountains on thy head!"

He loosed the steed; his slack hand fell;
Upon the silent face
He cast one long, deep, troubled look,
Then turned from that sad place:
His hope was crushed, his after-fate
Untold in martial strain—
His banner led the spears no more
Amidst the hills of Spain.

The smallest natural magnets generally possess the greatest proportion of attractive power. The magnet worn by Sir Isaac Newton in his ring, weighed only three grains; yet it was able to take up 746 grains, or nearly 250 times its own weight, whereas magnets above two pounds seldom lift more than five or six times their weight.

BEAU BRUMMELL.

Brummell contrived, like the duke, to pass some five months of every year in the very best country houses in England. The Dukes of Bedford, Beaufort, Devonshire, Dorset and Rutland, were especially gratified by his condescending to visit them—he, the grandson of the London confectioner! He had little taste for rural sports, though he shot well and was a good show-rider. Hunting he did not care for, alleging that a man got nothing for it except having his boots and garments splashed. Even in the field he wore a white neckcloth, and his boot-tops were white, the brown color being discharged by oxalic acid, after which they were sponged with champagne.

At a time when it was fashionable for a nobleman belonging to the four-in-hand club, to wear the dress and affect the manner of a stage-coachman, Brummell made a dead set against the Squire Westerns species, natural or artificial; and when he objected to some country squires being admitted into Watier's club, justified his exclusiveness by declaring that their boots always smelt of bad blacking and the stable.

In London, so great was Brummell's ascendancy in society before he was twenty-five years old, whenever the fashionable journals gave an account of a ball or rout, always put his name first in the list of untitled guests. He was the dictator of fashion, retaining his power by frequent exercise of his strong power of satire. At one of these parties, where the young daughter of a duke appeared for the first time, her chaperon said, "You see that gentleman next to the door? If he should speak to us, endeavor to make a favorable impression. That is Mr. Brummell, whose smile or sneer can make or unmake your position in society."

He prided himself on saying rude things. Dining with a gentleman who vulgarly boasted of his wine and its high price, Brummell refused his glass when the servant brought him the bottle a second time, with—"No, thank you, I don't take cider."

Another time, in a country house, where his host piqued himself upon disliking French wines, which Brummell greatly affected, he was saluted with, "Don't take that thin claret, but have some of this old port." The Beau exclaimed: "Port?—O, I remember now—a dark, intoxicating fluid, much drank by the lower classes!" Assuredly, had Brummell lived in our day, he would have had his nose pulled, if he were thus impertinent.

Once he dined in the city, to the wonder of those who knew how exclusive he was, and said: "Yes, the man wanted me to bring him into notice, and I desired him to give a dinner, to which I invited Alvanley, Mills, Pierrepoint, and a few others." He was asked how the party went off. "Very well—only for one mal-a-propos—the man who gave the dinner positively had the assurance to seat himself at the table with us."

Another time, speaking of a city millionaire, said, "Ungrateful wretch! Once I gave him my arm down St. James Street, and he actually has refused to discount a little bill for a thousand pounds!"

Meeting a rich but undistinguished young gentleman at dinner, Brummell asked the loan of his carriage to take him to a ball at Lady Jersey's. "I am going there," was the reply, "and shall be happy to take you." Brummell answered in his most delicate tone, "Still there is a difficulty. You can't well ride behind your own carriage, and how would it do for me to be seen in it with you?" Here, most certainly, a gay manner of speaking, alone could have carried off this impertinence.

"You have a cold," said some one. "Yes," said Brummell, "I was in to Hutchett's coffee-room yesterday, waiting for Lord Alvanley, and the wretch of an innkeeper brought in a damp stranger."

BERNARDO KNEELING AT THE FEET OF THE COME.

BERNARDO REPROACHING THE KING.

In the month of a very cold August, he was asked if he had ever seen such a summer day?

"Yes—I did—last winter."

"Are you fond of vegetables?" asked a pressing host in the country. Brummell slowly drawled out, "I think—that—I once ate a pea!"

On one occasion, when he declared that he did not like the cut of the prince's coat, that exemplary, corpulent hero blubbered like a whipped school-boy. Brummell, with all his frivolity, real or assumed, contrived to conciliate the favor of many very intellectual persons, among whom may be named Lady Hester Stanhope, the beautiful and poetizing Duchess of Devonshire, Lord Erskine, Crabbe, Moore, Sheridan, and Byron. He had some literary talents, for he wrote occasional verses very passably. It was Brummell's fancy to keep an album, in which the leading wits and belles of his time were very proud to write. —Philadelphia Press.

LOWLY GRAVES.

BY ARTHUR L. MERRIVE.

While the sun goes down in the crimson west,
 Let me take you by the hand;
 And we'll wander adown to the "silent town,"
 Which is in the voiceless land.

No, we'll pause not by the sculptured urns
 That tell of pomp and pride,
 But pass along mid the silent throng,
 O'er to the other side.

Nay, turn not back 'cause weeds have grown
 Above the lowly graves,
 But come with me to yon cypress tree
 That the golden sunset laves.

See these three graves where the grass grows green,
 And the early violets bloom;
 Affection's tear is oft shed here,
 Yet seldom at yonder tomb.

The hands of love o'er this silent group
 Have planted the flowers at even;
 And the tears they shed o'er their household dead
 Were more precious in sight of Heaven

Than the marble shaft that proudly tells
 That a rich man sleeps below,
 Or a warrior brave, that's found a grave
 Close where the cypresses grow.

Ah, the lowly mound o'errun with flowers
 Speaks to the heart far more,
 That the pure white dove of household love
 Thinks of those who've "gone before."

TWICE WOODED:

— OR, —

FRED LYNDE'S FLIRTATION.

BY MARY A. KEABLES.

SHE was a pretty girl; I might have said beautiful, and not gone astray from the truth. Her eyes were of a deep, dark blue, fringed with long brown lashes; her complexion was a blending of the rose and the lily; her features were faultlessly regular, and well defined, while her abundant brown hair—black in the shadow, golden in the sunshine, but a dark beautiful brown seen in a medium light—was parted smoothly from a low, girlish forehead, and half drooping upon the swan-like neck, looped back and fastened in rich braids around her well-shaped head.

Gertie Eldridge was beautiful, her mirror told her so, as well as the weak, foolish woman who loved the bright, fair girl better than her life, and who lavished upon her praises and compliments that were enough to turn the poor child's brain. Mrs. Eldridge worshipped her daughter, and her ill-timed, ill-directed flattery proved her to be entirely unfit to guide the young and sensitive spirit looking to her for direction.

Mrs. Eldridge was a widow, supporting herself and daughter with her needle. They lived in a little brown house in the outskirts of a pleasant country village, Glenvale—brown and low to be sure, as seen from the street, but within, neat and cosy, and furnished with a simple elegance. There were three rooms in the cottage, a kitchen, parlor and bedroom; but all three were clean and cheerful, and, although the little front room boasted but a home-made rag carpet, ten-cent muslin curtains, and the lounge was covered with the cheapest chintz, still there was no lack of visitors to make it resound with merry laughter, for Gertie was the attraction.

Now although she had attained the respectable age of seventeen, and was the prettiest of all the Glenvale lasses, strange to say, Gertie Eldridge had never had a real lover. There was a pretty, scornful way about her that I do believe made the young men afraid of her; for, although they admired at a distance, they blushed and stammered like bashful girls when they tried to address her upon the most trivial subjects, and when one or two, more daring than the rest, offered themselves, at different times, of course, to escort her to some party or picnic, they immediately received a "No, I thank you," for their pains. Some called her coquetish, but we are sure, whatever her faults were, this was not one that could be rightly laid to her charge.

The Academy of Glenvale was an institution noted for miles around for the excellence of its discipline, the capability of its teachers, and the rapid advancement of its pupils. This school Gertie was attending at the time of which we write, endeavoring to fit herself for the capacity of a teacher, and she hoped in a short time to relieve her mother of a burden that had been weighing heavily upon her hands, and to be able, not only to maintain herself, but to render it unnecessary for her mother to work constantly at her needle, an employment that was evidently destroying her health.

This was the state of affairs when Fred Lynde entered the Glenvale Academy as a pupil. He was a handsome young man, with strange, fascinating eyes, the color of which it would be impossible to determine; a fine figure, and manners bespeaking the thorough-bred gentleman.

It was soon rumored that this new comer was wealthy, heir to a large estate that would come into his possession upon his twenty-first birthday, as he had not quite attained his majority. He was from a neighboring State; more than this was not known of him. He was a thorough student, so the teachers said, and altogether he was declared quite an addition to this flourishing and popular school. Among the young men he was considered a first-rate fellow, the girls thought him a charming young gentleman, but old ladies and old gentlemen shook their heads and muttered "too wild, too wild."

Now, to make a long story short, when Fred Lynde's eyes first rested upon the beautiful face of Gertrude Eldridge, he made up his mind she would be a charming lassie to flirt with for a season; and the assurance he received from his classmates that he would waste his time while thus engaged, only strengthened him in his determination.

"'Faint heart never won fair lady,'" he laughed; "if that pretty ring my lady wears upon her finger isn't upon mine in less than two months, expel me from Glenvale Academy, mark that! And mind ye, the first one who tells Miss Scorn of what I have said, shall receive his reward, remember that, boys!" And those bewildering eyes fairly shot glances of fire.

Of course the said boys did not care after this to inform the young lady of the young gentleman's boast, and waited for future developments impatiently.

They came soon enough, too soon. The second week after young Lynde's entrance into school found him at the Widow Eldridge's cottage. He wished a little sewing done, some handkerchiefs hemmed, he had heard she was a beautiful seamstress, and therefore he had troubled her.

Mrs. Eldridge's vanity was aroused; she assured Mr. Lynde his handkerchiefs should be hemmed in the neatest manner, that her daughter Gertrude was a much prettier seamstress than herself, and that she should hem them and mark them for him also if he desired.

Mr. Lynde observed that nothing would give him greater pleasure, that he had lost a great many handkerchiefs in his short lifetime, because they were not marked, and then asked if the charming and talented Miss Eldridge who attended the Glenvale Academy was her daughter? The vain mother answered in the affirmative.

"I should be delighted to make her acquaintance, my dear madam," said young Lynde, in his most condescending manner; "the rules of the academy are so strict I have not been fortunate enough to secure even an introduction."

"Then I beg you will stay and take tea with us, Mr. Lynde," replied Mrs. Eldridge, with a low and deferential bow, and a smirk of self-complacency upon her faded but no doubt once pretty face.

Mr. Lynde regretted he could not accept the invitation as he was engaged very busily at that hour with his studies; but if Mrs. Eldridge would permit him, he would call around in the evening; there would be a lecture at the academy, and perhaps Miss Eldridge would like to be present, as it was upon the very interesting and profitable subject of metaphysics. Did Mrs. Eldridge think her daughter would like to go?

Mrs. Eldridge was very sure she would, and Mr. Lynde took his leave, taking good care to display to view a costly jewelled watch, a massive gold chain, and an ornamental seal, which impressed Mrs. Eldridge so much with the young man's importance that she made up her mind he would be the most eligible match in the world for her daughter, and when Gertie returned from school, informed her of the good fortune that no doubt awaited her.

Now any one at all acquainted with human nature will understand Mrs. Eldridge took entirely the wrong way to impress her daughter with an idea of this "good fortune." Girls are contrary, of course they are, and if the manoeuvring mama had only informed her pretty daughter she should not associate with Mr. Fred Lynde, ten chances to one she would have eloped with him in a month; as it was immediately after tea, Gertie tied on her pretty sun bonnet, and ran over to spend the evening with her dearest friend, Lucy Dwight, leaving Mr. Lynde to be entertained by her mother, who had taken so great a fancy to him.

Now Lucy Dwight had a brother, Harry, a fine fellow, by the way, and he loved pretty Gertie Eldridge with all his heart; but, alas, Harry was neither handsome, learned nor wealthy, awkward as he was good hearted, and as shy and bashful as Gertie was scornful and distant. She never imagined the great overgrown, ungainly lad loved her, and so treated him as she would any other shy and awkward fellow, that is to say, she didn't treat him at all; and this particular evening, as she ran up the little grassy, rose-bordered path, and met Harry upon the steps, she failed to notice him in the least, pushed past him, opened the door, and ran lightly up stairs to her friend Lucy's room.

Now we might describe Lucy, and after saying that she was exactly the opposite of Gertie, say also that she was possessed of as warm and generous a heart as ever throbbed in a human breast; but our story is not of Lucy this time, although her's was no tame, common place life, "and thereon hangs a tale."

Gertie found Lucy busy arranging a bouquet of flowers upon her toilet table, and ere she was aware of an intruder, a pair of white arms were around her neck and a pair of rosy lips were pressed upon her cheek. Lucy gave a little start of surprise, but regained her composure when she saw it was only Gertie, and then the two sat down, school-girl fashion, to chat, and Harry Dwight, his heart thumping loudly against his home-made jacket, looked up to the window from whence he could hear her voice, listened for a moment, and then walked away to the orchard to find the largest and reddest apples to send to her mother; for he wouldn't give them to Gertie for the world, and he knew if he sent them to Mrs. Eldridge, Gertie would be very likely to appropriate as many to her own use as she desired.

So the apples were gathered, and placed in a little basket on the steps where Gertie would find them; then upon second thoughts, he concluded he would run down to Mrs. Eldridge's with them himself, and have a little chat with her to while away the time. But sad to relate, as Harry approached the cottage he espied the accomplished Mr. Lynde sitting by the window in the little parlor, so he passed, and turning a corner, returned home again.

Then he left the basket of apples upon the steps where he first intended, and hearing the academy bell ring, decided he would go to the lecture, just to pass away the time, which he did, and yet he never thought of inviting pretty Gertie Eldridge to accompany him. As he was returning home that evening in the darkness, he heard Fred Lynde's voice behind him.

"Never mind, never mind, boys, not foiled yet! But Gertie Eldridge shall pay dearly for this!"

"Perhaps," suggested another voice.

"No 'perhaps' about it," returned Lynde, "if I don't walk to school with Miss Scorn to-morrow morning, call me a fool for my pains, that's all."

And Fred Lynde did as he had boasted he would do, for apparently very accidentally he fell into her company the next morning, introduced himself, spoke of the beauty of the weather, the loveliness of the scenery, and parted with her in the hall.

All this looked very presuming, very audacious to Gertie Eldridge, but then what could she do? Stop in the street to rid herself of his company? He possibly would stop too. Walk faster? She tried that, but Mr. Lynde was her equal there.

She answered his questions haughtily, and in monosyllables, and turned her pretty head scornfully, but Fred Lynde would not take the hint that his presence was disagreeable, he did not care to. And this was Fred Lynde's first victory over Gertie Eldridge, the prettiest girl in Glenvale Academy.

The old saying is, "we first endure, then pity, then embrace." At first Gertrude merely tolerated Fred Lynde's society, next she thought it really pleasant, and finally fully agreed with her mother that Mr. Lynde was charming company. We do not mean that Gertie was guilty of saying this, even to her dearest friend, Lucy, but we do maintain she admitted it to her own proud and sensitive heart. And this was Fred Lynde's second triumph.

Two months had nearly elapsed since the young man's rash assertion in regard to gaining possession of Gertrude's ring; but he accomplished it in due time in this wise.

He asked her for it to look at one day, and accidentally (?) broke it. Of course he was profuse in his apologies, begged her to wear one of his until he had hers mended, which he would have done shortly; took a pretty, jewelled ring from his own finger, and placed it upon her's so gallantly she could not refuse.

Two days afterwards the students of the Glenvale Academy beheld upon the young man's finger the fair Gertie's ring. And thus it was Fred Lynde gained his third victory.

Poor Gertrude Eldridge, if she had only known the net that this young and unprincipled man was weaving about her, she might have broken the meshes ere they had grown too strong for her feeble strength. She judged others by herself; because her own heart was pure and innocent, she imagined all others to be so likewise. Fred Lynde flattered her vanity by his preference, by his skilful flattery, by his carefully worded compliments. She had not the benefit of a prudent mother's counsel but believed all the young man told her. Her love became infatuation, she was blind to everything except the fact, as she believed, that she loved, and that she was beloved. And this was Fred Lynde's fourth victory.

Gradually an estrangement grew up between Gertie Eldridge and Lucy Dwight. How it began it would be hard to determine; perhaps it was when Lucy said that she did not think Fred Lynde unexceptionable; her strong, penetrating mind had read well the young man's character, and from the first she believed he was but trifling with Gertie's affection; we say perhaps it was then the estrangement commenced.

Be that as it may, but a few weeks elapsed before Gertie's visits to Lucy became very rare, and when together the young girls appeared constrained and embarrassed in each other's society. About this time Lucy left the village on a visit to a distant relative, and Gertrude's calls at the Dwight mansion were discontinued entirely.

The reason we mention this is because we do believe, had the friendship existing once between these young girls remained unbroken, the sad circumstances about to follow had never taken place.

"I'll tell you what it is, boys," said Fred Lynde to his classmates, one day, "she's a verdant little puss. I think of calling her 'my ever-green,' for she will be one, I'm very sure! Ha, ha! ha, ha!" And the young man laughed lightly.

"You're a magician, Lynde," laughed one. "Now that same Gertrude Eldridge would have mitteden you as quick as any of us three months ago, and now—"

"She thinks more of me than her life! Ha, ha, boys, nothing like understanding the business! Now I've made flirting a study, as much as I ever did the sciences. I shall keep Miss Gertie at my feet as long as I please, and then—"

"What?"

"Go home and marry the beautiful and wealthy Miss— Ahem, I don't care to mention her name just now and here."

"And Gertie Eldridge?"

"Ha, ha, don't mention her; what do you suppose I care for the future of a cast-off sweet-heart?"

"You shall not mention Gertrude Eldridge in that manner," said a slow, deliberate voice, and Harry Dwight laid his powerful hand upon Fred Lynde's shoulder. "If Miss Eldridge knew the manner you abuse her confidence, I am very sure she would treat you with the scorn and contempt you deserve."

"Perhaps you will be kind enough to take up the gauntlet in defence of a girl who despises you as she does the worm beneath her feet? Ha, ha!" And Fred Lynde twisted himself from Harry Dwight's grasp, and laughed sneeringly.

The hot blood rushed to the young man's honest face, and his brown eyes flashed.

"If she despised me in a tenfold manner, I should take up the gauntlet in her defence," he said. "She is fatherless, and brotherless, and I have not forgotten that I have a mother, and a sister, Fred Lynde, whose good name I value more than my life. For their sakes I will not bear a defenceless woman spoken evil or lightly of, and the man who speaks of a young and innocent girl, whose only fault is that she has too much faith in a lover's truth, as you have done of Gertrude Eldridge, is a coward and a villain!"

"Do you mean to apply these epithets to me?" inquired Fred Lynde, pale with rage.

"As you please to understand me; but speak lightly of Gertrude Eldridge in my presence again at your peril!"

It would have been hard to recognize in the resolute, fearless youth, whose eyes seemed to blaze with indignation, and whose lips curved proudly with feeling, the bashful youth who blushed at the sound of Gertie Eldridge's voice, and whose heart went pit-a-pat at hearing the sound of her footsteps as she passed by his father's on her way to school.

Fred Lynde's companions were astonished, and fearing a serious quarrel would ensue, and knowing their favorite Fred was no match for the strong and vigorous young farmer, they interposed, and taking him by the arms, almost dragged him away.

As for Harry Dwight, after the young man had left him alone, he stood as if rivetted to the spot, his eyes resting upon the ground, his arms folded tightly across his bosom, his high, full forehead now flushing, and then paling, stood there, while, like the ocean waves in a tempest, tumultuous thoughts surged wildly through his brain, and his heart heaved and throbbed painfully, as if it longed to burst from its confinement. Harry Dwight was not easily excited, but when once aroused his strong nature felt it to the utmost; a variety of emotions contended in his bosom for mastery now—love, jealousy, hate, anger—yes, we will say—pity.

Pity for the poor dove being drawn into the destroyer's net. Harry Dwight crushed back with a mighty effort all other passions, and pity gained the mastery.

"There is but one way," he murmured to himself, "but one way to save her; some one must go to her and tell her of her danger. But who? Yes, who?"

For a long time he pondered, but could arrive at no satisfactory conclusion.

"She is becoming the talk of the town, even now many avoid her as evil; soon her character will be entirely lost in the eyes of the pure and good; but what shall be done? Who will go to her and tell her—tell her all?"

Harry Dwight sought his mother, and after informing her of the state of affairs, besought her to go to Mrs. Eldridge, and tell her of the danger her daughter was in; but Mrs. Dwight was one of those rarely-found individuals who strictly mind their own affairs, and declined to have anything to do in the matter. She thought herself able to attend to her own children, she said, and no doubt Mrs. Eldridge had a like confidence in herself. No, if Gertrude's mother could not see her daughter's danger without having it pointed out to her, all the people in the village could not make her see it. Mrs. Dwight was a kind-hearted woman, and really pitied Gertie; but as for stepping out of her own sphere, and meddling with the affairs of others, she would not do it.

Harry Dwight left his mother's room with a look of determination upon his countenance, and a resolute expression in his fine brown eyes. Mechanically he attended to "doing up the chores," and then going up to his small room, he made his toilet in a neat and simple manner, and then went down stairs, down the narrow, rose-bordered path, strewn over with the yellow autumn leaves, out of the little wicker gate that he closed thoughtfully behind him, and then down the road leading to the Widow Eldridge's cottage.

He paused a moment as he reached the little brown house, half irresolute as to the course he should pursue, weighing all over in his mind, and again pity and love gained the mastery.

The stars were beginning to come out in the September sky, as Harry Dwight opened the gate in front of the little cottage, and walked resolutely up to the door; it was open, so he walked in and sat down on the chintz-covered lounge to await the coming of Mrs. Eldridge or her daughter.

The latter came in at length with a lamp, which she shaded from the evening air with her hand. Harry saw Fred Lynde's ring glittering upon her finger in the light. It unnerved him, for a moment, and only for a moment he regretted that he had come.

Gertrude set the lamp upon the table, and then began to roll up some sewing which lay scattered around. Harry arose and approached; his steps startled her, she turned, expecting it was Fred, who visited her nearly every evening, turned with a smile that darkened into a frown as she observed her mistake.

"You, here, Harry Dwight?"

"Yes."

For an instant she stood irresolute, without speaking, then she said, inquiringly:

"Mother will be in, shortly."

"But I don't want to see her; but you, Gertrude."

"Me?" questioned the girl, scornfully, "and what, pray, do you wish with me?"

"I want to talk to you a few minutes, may I?"

She did not say 'no,' so he proceeded. "I have come to talk to you about Fred Lynde."

"And what of him?" asked Gertrude, haughtily.

"You will pardon me for what I say, I hope you will, Miss Eldridge, but I am sadly afraid—"

The youth paused.

"Of what, Harry Dwight?"

"That Fred Lynde, handsome, pleasing as he is, is trifling with you."

"Thank you for minding my business, Harry Dwight!" cried the girl, contempt and scorn depicted upon her countenance. "Is that all, and if so, may I ask you the facts upon which you found your suppositions?"

"Certainly," he replied, "I have no hesitation in telling you; first, I am quite sure he is engaged to be married to a young lady in his native State; secondly he makes your name a by-word in company, and has even gone so far as to boast of the power he has over you."

For a moment the young man paused, and waited to see what Gertrude would say, but overcome with a variety of emotions, the poor girl remained silent.

At length she said, looking up into Harry Dwight's face, her own crimson with wounded feeling and mortification.

"Are you sure, sure of what you are telling me, Harry Dwight?"

"If I had not been very sure, I should not have troubled you with this information," he said.

For a moment she stood still, her hands pressed tightly over her face; when she removed them her cheeks and brow were white with very rage.

"I do not believe you, Harry Dwight!" she said. "This is a base plan to injure Fred Lynde in my estimation. I thank you for nothing, Mr. Dwight. Go! I hate you!"

The hot blood mounted to the high brow of the young man, then receded and left it marble pale.

"If you hated me ten times as much as you do," he said, "I should again pray of you as you value your good name, to beware of Fred Lynde; he does not love you; he is a base traitor to you—he is only seeking your destruction!"

It was a beautiful faith Gertie Eldridge had in the man she loved. Beautiful, we say, and yet, alas, misplaced. Had Fred Lynde been worthy such devoted, such absorbing, such faithful love, it had been well; but he was not. And that faith in his truth, his constancy, caused Gertrude Eldridge to answer:

"I do not believe you, Harry Dwight! For some cause you hate him, and misrepresent him to me. Go, I will not listen to you, for you speak falsely!"

"Gertrude Eldridge," again said the young man, with a strange, wavering tenderness in his tone, "next week I leave Glenvale, perhaps forever. I have no reason to wish to misrepresent Fred Lynde to you, and I have not. You will know at some future time that I have spoken truthfully, and at the sacrifice of my own feelings. I say you will remember this all at some future day, and perhaps then, even if too late, you will in your heart thank Harry Dwight that he tried his utmost to save you."

Gertrude gave her pretty head a toss and said, scornfully:

"You are quite sentimental, Mr. Dwight; allow me to bid you a good evening."

"Be it so," said the young man, bitterly; "we may never meet again, Gertie Eldridge; but sometimes think kindly of the unprepossessing lad who would have given his life willingly to save you from ruin. Good-by! Heaven protect you, Gertrude!"

A moment more and the young girl was alone. The little brown gate slammed as Harry Dwight closed it behind him, then she listened to his footsteps until the sound died away in the distance, then she threw herself upon the little chintz covered lounge, buried her face in her hands, and cried bitterly.

How long she lay there sobbing she could not tell, but the sound of advancing footsteps along the road, and then the click of the gate, warned her that a visitor was approaching. It was Fred Lynde, handsome, smiling, bewitching as ever.

"In tears, my darling?" he said, tenderly. "In tears! And who, pray, could be heartless enough to provoke them?"

Then Gertrude Eldridge, weak and trusting girl as she was, laid her tearful face upon his shoulder, and told him all.

"The villain!" hissed the young man.

"I knew it was all false, dear Fred," said Gertrude, raising her beautiful eyes to his face; "only tell me, assure me once that there is nothing to found such stories upon."

"Do you doubt me, then?" asked Fred Lynde, his brow darkening.

"No, O, no, not doubt you, Fred, but then—but then—"

"What, my daisy?"

"I—I—"

"You did not know but what I really deserved all that you heard ill of me? Forget it all, dear Gertrude—my own Gertie—believe me to be true until you know me to be false."

"I will," said the trusting, deceived girl, "I will always trust you until then, Fred Lynde." And Gertrude Eldridge fulfilled her promise.

The next week Harry Dwight left Glenvale for a distant State. Leaving him to Dame Fortune's frowns and smiles, let us follow Gertie Eldridge even down into the dark valley of adversity and sorest trial, the valley her tender feet trod painfully and alone.

Gradually the young people of the village left Gertrude to herself; old peopleshook their heads, and said they never thought Gertie Eldridge would come to that, so pretty—what a pity! Young men laughed when her name was mentioned, and even little boys and girls did not care to be seen going with her to school. Gertrude wondered concerning the cause of this change, but as no one cared to deal as honestly by her as Harry Dwight had done, the mystery to her remained unsolved.

The school term was drawing to a close, and all was bustle and excitement, preparing for a grand exhibition, which came off in due time and in fine style.

Fred Lynde delivered the valedictory, and was enthusiastically applauded by the delighted audience, while Gertrude, who took no part in the exercises, sat with the assembled multitude, her eyes filled with happy tears, her true woman's heart overflowing with joy at his success.

That evening Fred Lynde walked home with Gertie Eldridge beneath the quiet stars, the pale, winter moon casting her silver rays over the frosted fields, and the quiet, snow-wreathed village. Very little was spoken by either until they reached the brown wicket gate in front of the cottage, when Gertie said:

"Wont you come in, Fred?"

"Yes," he said, abruptly, "and I want to talk to you, Gertrude."

Mrs. Eldridge had retired, but the lamp was burning brightly upon the table, and a warm fire was blazing cheerily in the grate. Gertrude wheeled the two large arm-chairs close to the crackling fire, took one herself, and motioned Fred to take the other. For a time neither spoke, finally Fred Lynde said, hurriedly:

"I'm going away to-morrow, you know, Gertie."

"Yes."

There were tears in the girl's eyes. Fred Lynde saw them, and his own lit up with a strange, wicked, cruel light.

"Do you care, Gertie?"

"I am sure I shall be very lonely," she said, evasively.

"Will you care, Gertie?"

He asked the question again, looking straight into his face with his strange, bewildering eyes, watching her every expression as the tiger does the motions of his helpless prey.

"Yes, certainly I shall care, Fred," she replied, a vivid flush mantling cheek and brow.

"Then you do care for me a little, Gertie?" he continued, with a soft, bewitching smile.

"Certainly I do," she said.

"Is it only a little you care for me, Gertie?" he questioned again. "Am I asking too much when I say I want your love, your whole love, Gertrude Eldridge?"

"And supposing I cannot give it to you? Supposing you have it now already, Fred?" she asked, timidly, while her whole face flushed crimson.

She was not looking into the young man's countenance, or she could not have mistaken its expression—so perfectly heartless and mocking, that it would have startled her.

"Then you do love me, Gertie?" he questioned. "You will always love me, Gertrude?"

And her answer was just what any other innocent, trusting girl would have given to the object of her heart's first, best and purest affections—"Yes!"

He drew his chair to the other side of the fireplace, leaned his head back, and half closed his eyes. Then he said in a tone very hard for the poor girl to understand:

"Did I ever tell you that I loved you, Gertrude?"

He never had in that set phrase, though a thousand words and actions had implied it.

"So you see I have the advantage of you there. To tell the truth, I generally gain the affections of the fair portion of community without any trouble, and now what I want to tell you is this—that I am to be married to a young and beautiful girl immediately upon my return home."

Had a thunderbolt fallen at the feet of the poor girl, she could not have been more astonished.

"Married?" she whispered, at length. "You are surely jesting, Fred Lynde?"

"No, I am not jesting!" he replied. "True as gospel, every word. Did you imagine I would ever marry you, my little puss? I have enjoyed my flirtation immensely. Allow me to thank you for the amusement it has afforded me, for without it, I am sure I should have died of ennui!"

O the tone—the bitter, sneering, contemptuous tone! It was more the tone, than the words, that sent that thrill of hopeless anguish through the young girl's frame. She had dreamed, and the awakening was like death.

She started from the great rocking-chair—her face whiter than the snow that lay drifted upon the house-tops—her blue eyes dark with pent-up, agonising, hopeless distress—her hands clasping each other so tightly that the pink nails wounded the tender flesh—started from her chair, and going up to Fred Lynde, she said with a strange, forced calmness:

"Then you have never loved me? You have trifled with me all this summer? Tell me this is so, Fred Lynde!"

He laughed scornfully; her beautiful despair pleased him.

"Yes," he answered; "only trifled."

She pressed her hands over her heart. The action was involuntary—she thought it was breaking. Poor child! she did not know how much the human heart can bear and not break. She did not know them.

What she might have said, we do not know; but at that moment a shriek from her mother's bedroom drew her attention in that direction. The poor, weak mother had been listening to the conversation, and heard all. The shock was too great for her, and that scream of agony was the last sound that ever passed the poor woman's lips. The first part of the night she lingered in a dreadful stupor, and the skill of the village physician, and the care and solicitude of the almost distracted daughter, were without avail; for a little after midnight she breathed her last, and Gertrude Eldridge was motherless.

"A stroke of apoplexy," so the physician said. Only Fred Lynde and the miserable daughter knew the real cause.

The young man left Glenvale the next day. It would be strange if his conscience did not upbraid him; we do not doubt it did. As for Gertrude, after the funeral she gathered together what little money was left to her from her mother's hard earnings, and after parting with various articles of household furniture to pay debts that had been contracted, she packed up her trunk and, three days after her mother's burial, took the stage-coach for the station of B—, some twelve miles distant, intending to there go by rail to the city of S—, where a relative of her mother's resided, hoping that there she might find a home at least for a time. But how little we poor mortals know of the future! "Man proposes, but God disposes."

As for Fred Lynde, he arrived home in due time without any particular adventure. Had it not been for the brilliant hopes before him, his glowing anticipations, it is possible his conscience might have troubled him more. As it was, he pictured to himself the warm reception he would meet with from his affianced bride, the wealthy and beautiful Miss Louise Allen, to whom he had been betrothed from his childhood—imagined, we say; but, sad to relate, it never met with a realization.

Fred Lynde had carelessly, thoughtlessly, in a letter to Louise's brother, related the story of his country flirtings—a letter that Louise had the pleasure of perusing. So Mr. Lynde was informed by his affianced that a gentleman who made a boast of winning a young and beautiful girl's affections merely to cast them aside as worthless, could never be her husband. Miss Allen was firm and decided, and so Fred was compelled to submit. Ah, Fred Lynde, Fred Lynde! you did not guess then what the future had in store for you, and what more would come of your country flirtation!

As we said, three days after her mother's burial Gertrude Eldridge took passage in the lumbering stage-coach for a railroad station some twelve or fourteen miles distant. The driver assisted her into the old coach and then busied himself with strapping on the small trunk containing her scant wardrobe.

Gertrude Eldridge sat back in the coach, her veil drawn tightly over her face—for there were tears in her eyes that she did not care that the peering, prying world should see. We say she sat back in the old yellow stage-coach weeping silently and bitterly, for there was no loved voice to say "God speed you, Gertie!" She was an orphan—ay, and more, it was a great sorrow that crushed her—a great grief such as a young and innocent girl can know but once in her whole life. She had loved too blindly—she had dreamed, and her dream had had its awakening.

"All aboard! all aboard!" shouted the stentorian voice of the driver.

There was a slamming of the coach doors, a "ready! all's right!" from the stage-agent, a sudden starting of the lumbering vehicle, and a few minutes sufficed to leave the pretty village of Glenvale far in the distance.

The day was cloudy and cold, and before long, a heavy snow-storm set in. The wind whistled in at the broken coach windows, laden with a burden of sleet, and poor Gertrude, weak and exhausted, felt every blast to her very heart. Her shawl was very thin for the season and for travelling, and before she had proceeded half a dozen miles, she found herself nearly frozen.

There were four occupants of the miserable conveyance, besides Gertie Eldridge; of three of them it is unnecessary to speak—they were gentlemen well wrapped in shawls and great coats—while the fourth was an old lady attired in a warm and heavy travelling costume, rich furs, and a heavy veil that bade defiance to King Frost in whatever guise he should choose to appear.

"Snowing to kill!" exclaimed one of the three gentlemen, drawing his muffler closer around his ears.

"Probably'll take runners before long," remarked a second; while the third merely gave vent to an expressive "ugh!"

The old lady drew aside her veil to look out, but the frosty air caused her to replace it in haste. Then the coach rumbled along slowly over the frozen road, the wind blew colder and colder, a numbing sensation stole over poor Gertrude Eldridge, the tears froze upon her cheeks, and leaning her head back upon the side of the old coach, she fell into a strange lethargic slumber. And still the old coach rumbled on, in its snowy way.

"Jerden's a hard road to travel, I believe," sang the driver, clapping his hands against his sides to prevent them from freezing.

By-and-by he became less musical, and exercised his hands more industriously; while the three gentlemen inside the old yellow coach pondered over the rise and fall of stocks, the depression of the money market and the mercury, the rise of provisions and the increasing storm. The old lady was wondering quietly to herself why such public conveyances were allowed to impose upon travellers, and how much further it could be to the next station; and Gertie, poor Gertie Eldridge, was dreaming of her mother and Fred Lynde—and the sad, reproachful brown eyes of Harry Dwight would intrude themselves. Poor Gertrude! in the numbing lethargic slumber, she was happy.

By-and-by there was a stopping of the coach wheels, a "whoa, whoa!" in the half frozen articulation of the driver, and a—"Here we are at last, pity save us all!" as the stage doors were thrown open and the steps let down.

The three gentlemen descended the lumbering vehicle first, then the old lady in her costly wrappings, but Gertie Eldridge neither moved nor spoke.

"Come, ma'am, be quick!" cried the driver, impatiently. Then he added, with an exclamation of affright: "Good heavens! the girl is frozen!"

"On your hand that pure altar I vow,
Though I've looked, and have liked, and have fel
That I never have loved till now."

Some seven or eight years after the events last narrated, in a handsomely furnished apartment in a large "brown stone front" on Broadway, sat a lady and gentleman earnestly engaged in conversation. The former might have been twenty or twenty-five years of age; it would have been impossible to determine exactly. Her manners were faultlessly graceful, and her face and form displayed uncommon beauty and symmetry. Miss Allwin the heiress—the belle of the day—kind reader, and her companion was none other than our friend Harry Dwight, now a rising and popular young lawyer, and a nominee for the legislature at the coming election. Report said that it was very probable he would be elected, for, young as he was, he possessed the confidence of the people, as well as the respect and esteem even of his political opponents.

Energy and perseverance had done much for Harry Dwight, the once awkward and unprepossessing lad of Glenvale Academy. Harry Dwight had changed much in these eight years; and yet the clear, earnest brown eyes were the same—full of deep, kind, truthful feeling, that welled up from a generous and noble heart. Flattery and applause had not spoiled him; he had not grown vain and self-important, as many another might have done. Harry Dwight had a mother and sister, and their advice, their counsel, had proved a safeguard against the follies and fashionable evils of a large city.

The full-lighted chandelier cast a cheerful glow over the magnificently furnished apartment, with its statues and pictures from the studios of the best artists, its mirrors and curiosities all arranged with faultless taste and order. Miss Allwin and her lover, for such was her companion, sat upon a luxurious sofa. The former was toying carelessly with her fan, while the latter was speaking of his ambitious dreams—dreams that he had woven when a boy, and that he fondly trusted would be more than realized, should his life and health be spared.

"And yet," he said, in conclusion, "after all, fame is but a bauble. It is unsatisfying; it fails to answer the cravings of the heart. A man turns wearily from the applause of the multitude, and longs for a quiet, happy, peaceful home, where the woman he loves reigns supreme."

Miss Allwin's eyes were downcast, and her face averted from the speaker.

"Love is mightier than ambition," continued Harry Dwight. "My dear Miss Allwin, I would gladly give up my dearest dreams of fame, could I thus secure for myself the dearer realities of domestic love and peace."

The fair maiden turned her face towards the young man and gazed full into his brown, truthful eyes as he spoke.

"And why do you not?" she asked, blushing.

"Because," he answered, "I have until this evening lacked courage sufficient to ask of you this great boon. Will you be my wife?"

The beautiful face of Miss Allwin turned first crimson and then very pale; the proud lips worked convulsively; the white, jewelled fingers clasped each other almost painfully. Finally, raising her eyes, and gazing full into his, she asked:

"Have you given me your heart's first love, Harry Dwight?"

For a moment he paused. Then he said earnestly, truthfully:

"No, Miss Allwin, I will not deceive you. In my boyhood, Gertrude Eldridge was dearer to me than my life—Gertie Eldridge, I used to call her. She was my idol then; but my idol was clay, God forgive me!"

"And now—"

"I offer you such a love as a man may offer a mortal. Will you accept such an one, Miss Allwin?"

"I will never be second in the heart of any man," she said, scornfully. "Go, Harry Dwight! perhaps Gertie Eldridge, the rustic maid of your dreams, may prove the bright star that shall illumine your domestic horizon."

The young man arose and said, sadly:

"I mistook your character, Miss Allwin. I fancied you loved candor and truth, and very few men will you find who have not had their boy loves. I might have asked you if your girlhood had none, but that is nothing to me; your present, and not your past love, was all I asked of you."

"While I ask both of the man I wed," said Miss Allwin, haughtily; then she added, in a softer and more womanly tone: "Favor me with a call to-morrow morning at nine o'clock, Mr. Dwight, if you please. Till then, adieu!"

A moment more, and Harry Dwight found himself alone; another, and he was descending the broad stone steps of the mansion and was soon traversing the great thoroughfare of the metropolis.

A few moments more, and in the privacy of his own room Harry Dwight took up his pen and wrote: "Another dream is over! Heaven help me!"

In another part of the city, in one of the fashionable billiard and drinking-saloons that are the curse of every large city, enticing young men and older ones too, in fact, to destruction, and wasting money that should supply widowed mothers, perhaps, and starving children—in such a place, at the precise time Harry Dwight wrote "Heaven help me!" two young men sat near a card table, one shuffling a pack of "kingly" and "queenly" pictures carelessly, the other, whose brow was darkened, and whose eyes flashed angrily, in the act of counting out the contents of a nearly emptied purse, which he piled upon the table, muttering:

"There, that's the last I have in the world! One more game!"

Again the cards were shuffled and the game began. Again was the agitated young man the loser, and again the tempter cried out to him—"One more game may retrieve all." But the tempter spoke falsely; when Fred Lynde left the saloon, he was in debt to the amount of several thousand dollars.

Fred Lynde reeled to his boarding-house, maddened with loss and with wine. When he reached his room, he threw himself upon his bed, and, falling into a deep slumber, did not awake until nearly eight o'clock the next morning.

Alarmed at finding the hour so late, he proceeded to make his toilet. The cause of his haste may be inferred from the contents of a note that lay upon the table, which had come in answer to a letter written by himself, a few days before, to the lady whose favor he sought.

"Call to-morrow morning at nine o'clock, Mr. Lynde; then you shall receive your answer."

And this note was in the hand-writing of the beautiful and accomplished Miss Allwin, whose love he had sought. Again Fred Lynde and Harry Dwight were rivals—although each was not aware of the other's feelings.

Fred Lynde made a hasty but careful toilet. This morning, he felt, would decide all. If he received, as he fondly hoped, a "yes" to his important question, Miss Allwin's property would fall into his hands, and after paying all his debts of "honor," he would be a rich man. "Otherwise"—Fred Lynde, handsome, heartless Fred Lynde shuddered; "otherwise"—but the sentence remained unfinished.

Fred Lynde was esteemed a fashionable, elegant young gentleman in society. Young ladies and their maneuvering mamas considered him unexceptionable; dear things, they didn't know of his dissipated habits—how should they? and if they had, why "the young men of these days are rather fast, you know—and then he's rich!" That would have been the comment in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred.

Now whether Miss Allwin was that one exceptional case, remains to be seen. She had treated him, to be sure, with considerable favor, smiled upon him—and so she had upon Harry Dwight, poor fellow!—but then, in his elegant note, Mr. Fred Lynde had informed Miss Allwin that she was his first and only love; that all the bright faces he had ever seen in his lifetime had failed in winning the heart he humbly laid at her feet. He told her that he did not seek her because of her wealth or station—that it was for the love he bore her on account of her gentleness and beauty, and the purity of her heart. All this Mr. Lynde said in his elegant, perfumed, embossed note. All this Miss Allwin had read, with a quiet smile and a toss of the head.

Just exactly five minutes to nine o'clock, Fred Lynde stood upon the broad marble steps in front of Miss Allwin's mansion, with his hand upon the bell-knob. A servant opened the door and ushered him into an elegant parlor, where he was left to await the coming of the mistress of the mansion.

Just at nine o'clock the bell rang again, and to the astonishment of Fred Lynde, Harry Dwight was shown in by the self-same servant.

"The deuce! you here, Dwight?" muttered Fred Lynde, in astonishment.

"Fred Lynde!" ejaculated the other, in a surprised tone.

"And may I ask for what?" queried Lynde, with a supercilious glance.

"Certainly you may," replied Harry Dwight, composedly taking a seat upon the sofa, "though I shall of course reserve the privilege of answering you or not, as I see fit."

"Then let me say that your presence is unnecessary here, this morning," said Fred Lynde. "I come here, by appointment, to see Miss Allwin," he continued, triumphantly.

Harry Dwight's brow flushed, but he made no reply.

"I have yet the pleasure of thanking you for a service you did me eight or nine years ago—of meddling with my business in my affair with Gertrude Eldridge. I have not yet forgiven you for that, and if duelling was not contrary to law I should most assuredly call you out."

The memory of the olden days came back with an overwhelming rush to Harry Dwight. With a mighty effort, he controlled his feelings.

"I shall consider the source from which such language emanates—but it will be sad for you, if you mention Gertrude Eldridge's name thus in my presence again."

Fred Lynde arose to his feet with a show of courage; but the words he was about to utter were cut short by the entrance of Miss Allwin, who smiled blandly upon the two young men, merely saying: "Mr. Lynde—Mr. Dwight."

Of course Fred Lynde expected she would appear surprised at the intrusion of Harry Dwight, while the latter waited impatiently to see why he had been invited to call upon her at the precise hour as his rival. He waited, we say; but the denouement came full soon.

"I invited you both here this morning, gentlemen," began Miss Allwin, seating herself at a short distance from her rival lovers, "in the first place, to thank you for the preference you have shown me, and secondly, to tell you a little story—a story a part of which may not be unfamiliar to you.

"Nearly nine years ago, in a little quiet village, lived a young girl with a widowed mother. This daughter was the poor woman's all; to her she looked as the staff of her old age—the one who should smooth the rough path of life as she journeyed on towards the grave. The daughter was young and trusting. I need not repeat the story; you both know it. You, Fred Lynde, know who won that love and cast it away as worthless. It was you, my mother's murderer! Go! know now I have waited for my hour of triumph. It has come, at length. You know me now! I am Gertrude Eldridge!"

Both young men started to their feet in surprise—Fred Lynde, pale, trembling, with an abject, miserable terror that seemed to call down the speaker's disgust and indignation.

"Go!" she said, pointing to the door; "go! and let this be a solace for your disappointment, that Miss Allwin hates, far more than Gertrude Eldridge ever loved you!"

Like a whipped cur, young Lynde sneaked from the apartment, and then it was that Gertrude, for so we may now term her, turned towards the astonished Harry Dwight.

"Harry," she said, sadly, "Harry Dwight, tell me—tell me that you do not despise me!"

"I never could do that," he replied.

"Now that you know me as I am, can you repeat truthfully that which you said to me last night?"

"On one condition," he answered; "that you reconsider your answer."

"I have nothing to reconsider," she replied.

"If Miss Allwin does not accept the second, Gertie Eldridge will be the first love of your heart, Harry Dwight!"

Reader, we need not repeat what followed; lovers dislike a third person, so we will step aside for a few moments.

"And now tell me all about this strange metamorphosis," said Harry, at length.

And then Gertrude told him the whole story of her mother's death and burial—her determination to leave Glenvale and seek a home in the family of her mother's uncle, who lived in a neighboring State—her narrow escape from freezing in the old coach that bitter cold day—the pity for her expressed by the rich old lady, her travelling companion, who, being a widow and childless, adopted her as her own, with this condition, that she should adopt her name, which she did—of the life of peace and happiness she had led beneath Miss Allwin's roof, up to the present time. All this Gertrude Eldridge told her lover, as they sat side by side upon the sofa; and she did not forget to tell him, too, of her blind, youthful love for Fred Lynde, with a crimson blush of shame, and begged Harry to forgive her for the deception she had practised in keeping him in ignorance of her identity.

Of course all was forgiven—certainly it was; and ere long, an announcement something like the following appeared in one of the city papers:

"MARRIED.—On the 15th inst., by the Rev. Dr. —, Mr. Henry L. Dwight to Miss Gertrude Eldridge Allwin, all of this city. We understand that the happy couple are to spend their honey-moon travelling. Our best wishes go with them."

The day after their return home, in looking over the morning's paper, Gertrude Dwight read a paragraph that caused her cheek to blanch, and her hand to tremble. She passed the paper to her husband, and he read aloud:

"DREADFUL AFFRAY.—We are sorry to notice, in our columns, the deeds of wickedness daily and nightly committed in our city, which call for some active measures on the part of our police. This morning, at half past two o'clock, an affray between several noted gamblers took place at an infamous drinking and billiard saloon, between — and — Streets, in which two men were mortally wounded, and one killed. The murdered man's name was Fred Lynde, and was, we think, the originator of the difficulty."

"Heaven forgive him!" murmured Harry, letting the paper fall.

"Amen!" responded Gertrude Dwight, fervently. "May Heaven forgive him, even as I do."

Harry Dwight is now a member of Congress—his wife, one of Washington's "bright, particular stars." Only the names we have used are fictitious.

BELLE ASHLEY.

BY MRS. CAROLINE A. SOULE.

"DEAR, dear, dear!" And with a curl on her crimson lip, Belle Ashley tossed the magazine she had been reading half-way to the ceiling, and then flirited her tiny, slippered foot so impatiently against a cushioned stool, that it turned a noiseless somerset on the velvet carpet.

"What is it, Belle?" And the inquirer, a gentleman who had been for some time furtively watching her from behind his evening paper, now looked her fairly in the face.

"Why, that story, guardy—it has exasperated me beyond the powers of endurance."

"Why did you read it?"

"Why? A pretty question to ask me. You know as well as I do, that I had to read it. I must pass away my time somehow or other."

"And there was nothing in this wide world for you to read but that silly story, Belle?" And he glanced at the draperied alcoves of the library, for it was there they sat.

"I know what you mean," she said, quickly; "but I haven't brain enough for those ponderous tomes, and if I had, what good would it do me to know just how many soldiers have been killed since the world was created, or why I am what I am, and why everybody isn't somebody else—pshaw! I detest history and philosophy, and metaphysics, theology and the like. The truth is, guardy, I am dying of ennui. I want something to do."

"Why don't you sew?"

"Sew! What would become of poor little Emily Bird then? Don't she half support herself and mother out of what I pay her to keep my wardrobe in order. No indeed; I should feel as if I had been stealing lambs if I took a stitch for myself."

"Practise then."

"I do," she answered, hotly. "Practise! There isn't a key on the piano that I didn't thumb and finger forty times this morning before you were up."

"Paint—draw."

"I spent two hours at my easel this forenoon. That is as long as I can endure the smell of oil."

"Walk."

"I've worn out a pair of boots every month the last year, tramping over the hills and dales of this wretched country town."

"Ride."

"I gallop ten miles every day of my life."

"Assist Mrs. Gray."

"She won't let me; says I make her more trouble than I do good—salt the custards and sugar the soups. It's a fib too, I could beat her if I'd try. Wait till I keep house. You see how it is, guardy, now—I am really and literally dying for the want of something to do. I sometimes wish I was poor, poor as a church-mouse. Then I'd have something to do; then my life wouldn't be such a sinful waste of time; then—"

"What would you do, Belle, if you were poor?"

"Do! Why I'd work!" She spoke energetically, and as she did, her whole expression changed, and she seemed transformed at once from a giddy girl to a thoughtful woman. "I'd have to, you know; because I haven't a relative in the world to look to for help."

"But what would you do? Make shirts at six cents a piece, be snubbed about as a governess—be—"

"No, guardy, no; neither of them. Indeed, I hardly know what I would do, but God would open some way for me, in which to earn an honest livelihood, and how I should enjoy it. I am so weary of this do nothing life." And she folded her arms over her heart, as if to still its impatient throbbings.

"And meanwhile, Belle, what would become of me?"

"Of you?" And she looked up quickly.

"Yes, of me. Who would pour my coffee for me at breakfast; bring me my dainty lunch at eleven o'clock—my fruit and cream; help me to soup at dinner; make my tea at evening; air my dressing-gown and slippers; keep my buttons on my wristbands, and the strings on my collars; knit me soft lambs-wool stockings, embroider me smoking-caps and hem my handkerchiefs; who would read to me when I am weary, nurse me when I am sick, sing to me when I am sad? Belle, my little ward, the old house would be very lonely without you." He might have added, "and my heart too."

The color came and went in her cheeks while he was speaking, but when he paused she was pale as death, with a mist upon her eyes. Murmuring plaintively, "I'm glad if I am good for anything," she left her seat and walked quietly out of the room. Her guardian rose as if to follow her; then, abruptly checking his steps, he sat down again and hid his face in his hands.

"We pluck not cherries in autumn-time." The words came from his lips with a low, moaning tone, which spoke eloquently of the struggle in his heart.

But was it autumn-time with Herbert Sidney? True, he was past thirty, but not a single thread of silver glistened in the glossy masses of raven hair which his little ward had so often pushed back from his high, white forehead in his hours of headache; not a wrinkle seamed his face; his eye was like an eagle's; his heart warmer now than in his boyhood. He loved Belle Ashley with all the depth and fervor of his strong, passionate nature, but he had never whispered a word of his feelings to her; a grim sense of their disparity of years made his lips dumb.

And Belle, a beauty of eighteen, an heiress, too, whom a score of suitors had already strove to win, Belle loved her guardian as only a woman of her temperament can love. She would have died to save him a sorrow. Yet she had her secret so deep down in her heart, that even her own keen eyes could scarcely see it. Now she lay panting on her bed, her face wet with tears, her white lips crying continually, "to him I am but a child."

A month later and she sat alone in the library reading; not out of a magazine, though they lay scattered all about her, but from one of those very ponderous tomes of which she had spoken so disdainfully to her guardian. It was one she had seen often in his hands, and now secure of interruption, for he was many miles away, she was bending all the quick powers of her mind to the erudite pages.

A servant entered bearing a silver salver. Mechanically she took the letter it held. One glance at her name, so boldly written, and a glad cry dropped from her lips.

"It is from Herbert, bless him." And she read it. Her cheek lost its crimson as she took in the import of the message.

"MY LITTLE WARD:—But that I fear you will be torturing yourself with anxieties about my health, I would not write you at all, but reserve my tidings until I see you, which will be in a week's time. I am well, perfectly well, only a little tired. Belle, prepare yourself now for unpleasant news. Perhaps you do not know it, but I have been for a long time distrustful of the integrity of the firm to whom your uncle loaned your money. I came here to satisfy myself. Belle, not a dollar of the immense sum loaned them is now in their hands. I have been very busy unravelling the affair, and will give you the particulars when I come home. Do not worry, Belle, over the matter, and above all things, do nothing rashly. Wait till I meet you and talk it over. Now as ever, yours,
"H. SIDNEY."

What she had so often lightly wished for, had come to pass. She was poor; an orphan and poor—no blood of hers in the veins of either man or woman. Poor and alone in the world.

Did she weep? Not a tear. She read the letter thrice over, then folded it in its original creases, replaced it in the envelope, and put it in her bosom. Pushing aside the table, she rose and paced the room back and forth; first with quick, nervous steps, afterwards with slow, quiet ones. At midnight she ceased and went carefully about the room, gathering up the books and ornaments which belonged to her. She made several trips to her chamber ere she had carried them all. Locking herself in, she drew her travelling trunks from the closet and commenced emptying her bureau and wardrobe, folding and packing. It was nearly daylight when she turned the keys and buckled down the straps. Her plainest travelling suit was left out. Then she counted her money; the quarter was nearly gone, and she had but forty dollars left. She smiled half sadly as she put back the little roll of bills and the silver change. Then she went back to the library and took up a pen, but as she traced a few lines on the sheet she had chosen, her features worked convulsively. For the first time she realized that she was leaving him, her guardian. Dashing off the burning drops that streamed over her face, she compelled her fingers to be calm, and wrote:

"MY DEAR GUARDIAN:—Your note revealing the loss of my wealth, was received last evening. Alone, poor, there is of course but one thing for me to do—work—earn my own living. I know all your generous, noble heart would tempt you to say, but, Herbert, I cannot brook dependence, even from you. Do not seek to find me, or, if you do come across me in your wanderings, do not seek to break my resolution. When I have proved to you that I am no longer a child, but a woman—a woman capable of caring for herself, then I will write you. Till then, adieu. Your little ward, BELLE."

To the servant who came in to clear the grate, and who looked surprised to see her there dressed for a journey, she said, briefly:

"Order the carriage for me. I must be at the station in half an hour, and ask the cook to send me a cup of coffee and some crackers."

An hour afterwards, and she was speeding by express to a city a hundred miles off. She had been there before, and ordered the porter to carry her luggage to the same hotel she had before frequented. Before her bonnet and cloak were laid aside, she had written this note and despatched it to the office of a daily paper:

"WANTED.—By a young lady, a situation as companion to some invalid lady. Wages not so much an object as a comfortable home. Apply at room No. 57, A—Hotel, between the hours of ten and five."

Then changing her dress, she sat down quietly by the window and watched the passing crowd. As soon as the fashionable dinner was over, she retired to the couch, and wearied with excitement and travel, slept soundly till morning. She dressed herself with more than usual care that day, and with a book in hand which she vainly strove to read, she awaited the issue of her advertisement. Slowly, tediously, the day wore on. Her face began to be troubled, and her heart to sink. But at three o'clock there came a rap at her parlor door. She opened it, and bowed courteously to the middle-aged gentleman who entered.

"This is yours, I believe, handing her a slip of newspaper.

"Yes, sir, I am the young lady. My name is Isabella Ashley, and my references are these—" and she handed him the cards of the different teachers whose tuition she had enjoyed from time to time.

He looked at them carefully, and was apparently satisfied, for he said at once: "My name is Olmstead, Ralph Olmstead, of the firm of Olmstead & Baring. I come in behalf of my mother, who has been an invalid for years, though but lately debarred society and confined to her chamber. We have succeeded in procuring an excellent nurse, but she needs something more—attentions such as a daughter or interested friend might give. It will be an arduous task for you, if you conclude to undertake it, but she as well as myself is wealthy, and will amply remunerate you for the time you may spend with her."

"When can I see her?"

"Now, this afternoon, if you will. My carriage is at the door."

"I will go with you, sir." And she was soon rattling over the paved streets.

They stopped at a palatial home, and Belle was soon ushered into a darkened chamber. A strong smell of camphor greeted her first, then a medley of odors, anything but agreeable to one whose life was the breath of flowers. An aged woman, wan and wasted, lay upon the couch towards which she bent her noiseless footsteps. She moaned as if in pain, and frequently threw her hands to her head. Belle noticed that her gray hair was sadly disordered, and the cloth which lay upon it stiff and dry.

"Your head aches badly," she said, in her lowest, sweetest tone.

"It crazes me almost. But who are you?" And the half-closed eyelids opened wide.

"It is the young lady whose advertisement I read to you, mother. She has called to see if she and you can agree to keep company a while."

"Her voice suits me. That nurse, where is she, Edward?"

"Gone out a moment."

"She nearly kills me with her tones, so shrill and owl-like.—Child,"—and she put her wrinkled hand in the soft palm of the stranger—"it will be a weary task for you, for I am grown querulous with suffering, and should try an angel's patience. My eyes are weak, too, and my room has to be kept very dark. Think well, ere you decide to come."

"Do you think I shall suit you, ma'am?"

"Yes, I do. Your step is light, your touch gentle, and your voice low and musical. Yes, you will suit."

"Then I will come at once."

"I will pay you just what I used to Ralph's governess, six hundred a year. I shall be more trouble though than he was, but I will make it right. Can you stay now? O, my head! my head!" And a spasm convulsed her face.

"You will see to my trunks, sir. I will give you an order. Your mother needs me now if ever." And pencilling a line, she gave it to him, and then laying aside her bonnet and shawl, went again to the bedside.

"Bring me some cool water, and a bit of soft, fresh linen, and a comb and brush," she said, quietly to the nurse.

"O, you mustn't touch her hair; it will kill her at once."

"Please do as I say; I will be responsible." She spoke gently, but there was something in the tone that enforced obedience.

Very grateful to the fevered skin was the soft, cooling touch of the damp linen, as Belle wiped the face and hands, and like mesmeric touches, the parting and smoothing of the long, thin locks. She was half asleep ere the cap was tied on, and a few lulling words, such as a mother half-sings, half-whispers to the babe as she puts it in the cradle, finished the charm and the lids were closed.

"She is sleeping very quietly," said the physician to her son, an hour afterwards, as he stood at her bedside. "I have not seen her so calm since she was taken down. How is it?"

"She has done it," said the nurse, a woman nowise disposed to be jealous. "She understands her case better than I do."

The physician glanced at Belle, who timidly shrunk from observation into the darkest corner. Crossing the room, he came directly to her. "I do not know what you have done, my friend, but your prescriptions are more powerful than mine. No opiate has ever made her so quiet. Continue your attentions and watch her symptoms carefully."

Then taking the son by the arm, he led him from the room, saying earnestly, "You must retain her, though it cost five dollars a day. Your mother can never be well again; all we can do is to smooth her passage to the grave. That young girl can do it better than you or I. Mind what I say; keep her, and let the other go. They will only come in conflict."

The next morning the nurse was dismissed with presents that gladdened her heart, and Belle was left alone with the invalid. It was, as the aged woman said, an arduous task she had undertaken, but she never faltered, though her face grew pale as the sick one's, and her cheeks lost their roundness and her eyes their brightness. She had never known confinement or restraint, and the close air of that darkened chamber seemed to poison her blood. Many things she missed; the fragrance of the spring flowers which she knew were now sunning themselves in the mossy depths of the woodland; the breath of the April breeze as it lingered in the green boughs of the trees; the morning and evening sky-tints, and the golden banners of noonday; the music of the wild birds; the long rambles in the country; the gay gallops on the jet-black pony; the precious hours in the library with her guardian to talk to, and the yet more precious ones in the parlor at eventide, when they sang together the ballads of olden times.

Mr. Olmstead was kind and thoughtful, tendering her every attention in his power; the servants smoothed her way all they could, for they soon came to dote on the young mistress, as they called her, and even the invalid, worn and worried with years of suffering, suppressed many a moan to spare her little nurse. And yet, with all they did for her, it was a sad, sad life Belle Ashley led in that darkened room. Not as in other times, was she weary because she had nothing to do, but tired now with having so many duties.

Spring brightened into summer; that faded into autumn, and then her vigils were over, for the tremulous nerves and the unsteady heart of the sick woman were quiet under the shroud-folds. Belle was once more at liberty, and as she counted the contents of the purse the mourning son had placed in her hands—six hundred dollars all told (for such had been the request of the dying mother), though but half the year was up, she felt an irrepressible desire to exhibit her earnings to her guardian. She longed to have him know that she was something more than he had ever thought her—stronger, better, nobler. As though he did not know all about her, the cautious spy. As though he would have let his one ewe lamb wander a moment from his fold without his guardian care.

He sat alone in his library, Herbert Sidney—but though his eyes rested on the page before him, his thoughts were far away in that distant city, where his little ward was losing her health and strength, and learning the great lesson of life—patience—patience. The bell-wire tinkled softly. He did not notice it; that, nor the little bustle in the hall, and when half an hour afterwards, there came a light footfall on the carpet, and the rustle of a woman's garment as it brushed the furniture, he did not stir or look up. He was lost to outward sounds and sights. Away down deep in his heart nestled a bonny love, and he was doting on it, his hidden, darling treasure.

"Are you deaf, dumb, blind, guardy? Have you no word of welcome for your little ward?"

How he started, and what a crimson flushed his face as he caught her for a moment to his heart.

"So you have come back to me," he said, as she sat down beside him; "I always believed you would."

"But I have not come to stay," she said, quickly.

"And why not, Belle? It's very lonesome living here with no one but Mrs. Gray and the servants to speak to day after day. Why can't you keep me company?"

How her heart swelled! How her pulse quickened! But she shook her head resolutely, and forcing calmness into her voice, she said:

"Because it is impossible. I am poor and must work."

"And is it pleasant, Belle, to earn your own living?"

"Pleasant—pleasant," she murmured; "no, it is not pleasant, but then it is my duty, and I shall learn by-and-by to be satisfied with that."

"Tell me of your wanderings, Belle. Sit down here as you used to." And he dropped a velvet cushion at his feet.

She did so, and told him all. Had she looked into his face, she would have seen it wet and pale as she spoke.

"And your earnings, Belle?"

She showered the bills and coins into his hands.

"You can afford to rest awhile," he said, quietly, as he counted them.

"I know it, guardy, and have come to visit you."

A month passed on. They two went on in the old way pretty much, save that Belle did not tease him quite as much as of old, and was never heard to complain of ennui.

They stood together beside the mantel one evening, both looking into the blazing grate—both thinking of the great and holy love they bore each other.

"Have you looked you up a new situation yet, Belle?" Mr. Sidney spoke quietly, as any man would remark of a purely business matter.

Belle's lips quivered and her eyes grew dim, but she was growing strong, and soon answered gently, "I wrote an advertisement to-day, but I have not sent it."

"And what do you propose to do now?"

"Keep house for some old grandfather, guardy."

"Keep house?" He spoke quizzically. "Can you tell me the ingredients of a loaf of bread?"

"Flour, salt, yeast and milk or water, as you can afford, guardy. I have been taking daily lessons of Mrs. Gray for four weeks, and she says she can recommend me."

"I wonder she didn't mention your name to me this morning then."

Belle looked up inquiringly.

"You see, she gave me notice she was going to leave in a month. She has had a legacy, and is going to set up housekeeping for herself. She named several who she said would suit me. Strange she did not mention you."

"Would I suit you?"

"Would you suit me?" He lingered on the syllables—he repeated them; then looking into her face, he said, gently: "Yes, Belle, I think you would suit me."

"What are your terms?" She spoke gravely, though something like a dimple wavered in her cheeks.

"Four hundred a year, with a suite of rooms to yourself. Are they satisfactory?"

"Perfectly."

"You are then engaged, Belle." The emphasized word brought a brighter flush to her cheek, and involuntarily it seemed, she murmured:

"Yes, engaged."

Mr. Sidney looked at her earnestly awhile; then taking from the mantel one of the hands she had rested there, he held it a moment in his own. Then, slipping a jewelled ring upon one of the slender fingers, he said, in a voice that fruitlessly strove to be calm, "and this seals our engagement, Belle."

An instant her eyes met his; then he drew her to him and pressed a holier seal upon her lips, whispering, "you are too young, darling, to be my housekeeper—just old enough to be my wife."

"I will be both, sir. You know I must have something to do."

There was a dash of her old playfulness in the tones, yet Mr. Sidney felt she was in earnest.

Little Emily Bird was very busy the next month cutting and sewing, for the whole bridal wardrobe was given up to her, and quite a little fortune did she earn in preparing the dainty garments. Old Mrs. Gray, too, was very busy, for every room in that spacious mansion had to be torn upside down and put to rights, and if she did not earn, she certainly spent quite a little fortune in baking and icing wedding cakes. Mr. Sidney and Belle were very busy, too, it seemed, telling and hearing the old, yet ever new and delicious story of human love. They sat together in the twilight the night before the bridal, not as in olden time, he by the table, and she in the recess of a window, but side by side upon a sofa drawn near the fire.

"Belle," asked he, after a long silence, "what did you ever do with that letter I wrote you once, the one that sent you wandering over the world?"

"I have it yet."

"Bring it here."

She did so. "Read it to me by the firelight, can't you, darling?" She obeyed. "Once more," he continued.

A sudden light flashed over her mind, and she said, looking him closely in the face, "You wrote that to try me, Herbert. I am not poor—never was. It was a precious little fib!"

"One that cost me many a pang, darling. But the temptation to try the strength of your womanhood was too strong to be resisted. But I little dreamed you would run away as you did; and Belle, when you came back to me, thin and pale and careworn, I almost cursed myself for yielding as I did to the temptation of a moment. A lifetime of devotion can only half atone for the great wrong I did you."

"Do not call it wrong, Herbert. It was a great good; the greatest that ever befell me. In my lonely watches beside the sick bed of my mother-friend, I learned lessons that will go with me through life, that will guide me to heaven. I was fast lapsing into a selfish woman of the world, but that letter started up my latent energy, my hidden goodness. Then did I realize what a blessing it is to be rich, and that the rich man or woman can never truly say they have nothing to do. There is ever something before them that cries piercingly, "help, help!" I am glad to know that my money is not lost, because I can answer those cries now, and shall always have something to do."

"The poor ye have always with you," said her lover, solemnly. And then he folded her to his heart and blessed God for this last, best gift to him—a noble woman's love.

THE TWO CLOUDLETS.

BY ISA. ARNOLD BERNHART.

O, do you remember, dear Mary,
An evening in beautiful June,
When we sat in a bower of roses,
And gazed on the rising moon?

And do you remember the cloudlets
That hung in the silvery light?
They looked like the beds of angels,
So beautiful, pure and white.

They seemed to be wooing each other:
And somehow we chanced to see,
In the happy and love-laden cloudlets,
A picture of you and me.

I never could tell how we knew it,
But both seemed to feel that a heart
Was lodged in each cloud, and we trembled,
And feared the bright cloudlets would part.

But while we were anxiously gazing,
And love-glances trembled in sight,
The beautiful cloudlets were waning,
And faded away in the light.

To-night I was silently sitting
Beside the same roses of June,
And lo, the same beautiful cloudlets
Came wooing the love-wedded moon!

And still they grew larger and brighter,
Each gleamed like a rising sun;
And, drawing still nearer each other,
They mingled, and now they are one.

O, say, must the love we have cherished
Grow fainter and vanish away?
Or may it, like yon happy cloudlet,
Grow heavenward and brighter each day?

THE ITALIAN PHYSICIAN.

SUGGESTED BY RUFFIN'S "DOCTOR ANTONIO."

BY MRS. M. T. CALDON.

IN the month of April, 184—, a travelling-carriage dashed rapidly down the steep, neglected road leading from B—, a small village in Southern Italy, toward Naples. The Sicilian postilion was in exuberant spirits, and rather recklessly endeavored to convince the tall, stiff English valet on the box with him, of his superior skill in handling the reins, which proceeding the latter regarded with mingled alarm and disgust, muttering something about "tearing over such heathenish roads at that rate," and concluding with an affecting reminiscence of the smooth drives in his own unrivalled land.

Notwithstanding their mutual sentiments were so unintelligible through the common medium of language, yet, spite of his ignorance of Italian, Tom Dexter had managed to give Antoine a clear view of his own supreme contempt for Italy and the hapless race who owned it for their country. So Antoine, in wicked retaliation, snapped his long whip about the horses' ears and set the animals into a hurried canter, the more delighted as the alarm on the valet's face became more apparent, for the narrowness and sudden descent of the road made it as dangerous, as the rough, uneven ground caused it to be uncomfortable and annoying.

A commanding voice, in angry expostulation, came from the coach window, and Antoine was obliged to check his revengeful pleasantries and, if he could, his awakened horses—which last was quite another thing, for, though the creatures had come quietly enough thus far, yet Antoine's whip seemed to have inoculated them with some of his own vindictiveness. Away they sped, plunging and dashing along the highway, threatening every moment to upset the reeling coach down the narrow, rocky precipice which separated the road from the beach (where the blue Mediterranean waves came surging up in short, full swells, curling away in snowy drifts among the sands), and then nearly crushing the stout crested panels against the mountainous wall on the other side.

Just where the street turns abruptly around the brow of the hill and leads into the straggling, retired little village of B—, the catastrophe came. An antiquated one-horse vehicle was just then, unluckily, upon the curve of the road; and the furious steeds, quite unmindful of Antoine's vigorous, desperate pull at the reins, made a plunge for the centre of the approaching gig. Such a scene as ensued! Such voluble shrieks of Italian, and round, sturdy oaths of English, as from this untoward mixture of nations and classes one after another prostrate figure disengaged itself from the promiscuous heap of broken panels and glass, baskets and books, and looked around, in indignant inquiry, as to the cause and extent of the calamity!

First and foremost, like all true Englishmen prompt to act in the hour of danger, however timid before, John Dexter sprang up and held the violently struggling horse still left in the shafts, until his fellow-travellers had likewise an opportunity to extricate themselves. The other horse had fortunately cleared himself and was dashing away out of sight, long before Antoine's bruised and rueful face was raised from the dust of the highway. Next, as stout and nationally expressive a Briton as ever wandered away from the Thames, raised himself from his undignified position, bearing a slender, girlish form in his arms. At the same time, a tall, spare lady's maid emerged from the other side, with a face as dubious and rueful as the crushed band-boxes at her feet.

Sir Richard Hereford laid his helpless burden tenderly on the turf by the roadside, and turned fiercely to the luckless Antoine, who stood mute and motionless with consternation; but he was interrupted by a tall, singularly handsome, yet coarsely-dressed man, who addressed him in Italian, while he bent anxiously over the insensible girl.

"I don't understand half your jargon," cried the excited baronet. "All I wish, is to find a physician and another carriage; but I suppose neither is to be found in this accursed country, short of Naples."

To his equal relief and surprise, the stranger (who was no other than the driver of the stout gig which had escaped the collision with no other harm but that of an overturn) addressed him in respectable English.

"That is what I say, sir—that I am a physician, and, with your permission, will examine into the amount of injury the lady has received."

Sir Richard eyed him sharply; but somewhat mollified by hearing his native language, and forgetting his dignity and haughtiness in his anxiety for his daughter, replied eagerly:

"Do so, at once. You don't imagine it is anything serious, do you?"

The Italian doctor had explored the delicate wrist and lifted the fair, drooping head; and glancing over at the father's troubled face, he forgave the discourteous treatment he had received himself, in pity for his anxiety, and replied, soothingly:

"Be not alarmed, signor; there is life and strength here."

Just then the sufferer's snowy lids unclosed, and a pair of wondrously soft blue eyes looked into the speaker's face. He bowed smilingly, and said, in a tone tender as a parent might use to a suffering child:

"Don't be alarmed, dear lady! You have fainted from a little fright."

A sweet, childish smile wreathed the pale lips, and she made an effort to rise; but wincing with pain, and half suppressing a shriek, she sank back again.

He looked instantly and anxiously at the slender ankle, passed his hand lightly across it, and then leaving his patient half supported by the maid, drew Sir Richard one side to say:

"The lady's ankle is fractured. Rather a difficult case, but I have no doubt careful treatment and perfect quiet will restore it, in due time, to its original strength. You shall have the most comfortable quarters the village can offer."

Sir Richard Hereford looked almost as much annoyed at the last, as the first sentence. His brow was as gloomy as if fate had conspired to thwart every plan he could propose for his own enjoyment.

"Good heavens! poor dear Edith!" was the first ejaculation. Then he muttered: "What is coming next? That horrible steamboat detention, the murderous drivers of these abominable roads overturning, and now lodgings in that miserable village! I tell you, I never can stand it! We must get on to Naples someway, where there's a chance of finding Christian comforts in this heathenish land." His voice grew louder and angrier as he proceeded. "Stay here, indeed! Don't I know all about it? I dare say there isn't a pot of butter, or a bowl of milk, in the whole village—nothing but olives, and that villanous oil for one's bread."

The doctor's keen eye had been scanning the florid face, and he obtained a very fair estimate of the character of the sturdy baronet, not so much, perhaps, to his own awe and admiration as that dignified individual might have imagined.

"Well, sir," said Dr. Pietro, with quiet dignity, "what have you decided? Shall I attend to the lady? I assure you speedy attention will relieve the pain very much, and any attempt to go on to Naples will be as dangerous as unnecessary."

But Sir Richard could not all at once relinquish his British dignity and obstinacy; so he kept the whole party, around whom a group of peasants had by this time gathered, waiting there in anxious suspense.

"How do I know it is dangerous?" he muttered, testily. "All doctors are ready to make out a desperate case, for their own curing. And then, again, if it is a serious case, how dare I trust her to an Italian quack?"

But a flash of the Italian's eye and a groan from his daughter, compelled him to a decision.

"Stay, stay!" he cried, hastily, as the former was turning proudly away. "Attend to her, by all means, and use your utmost care and skill. Your patient is Miss Hereford, of Hereford Manor. And I am Sir Richard Hereford."

A slightly sarcastic smile curled the young physician's lip; but it faded off, as his glance wandered to the pallid face of the lonely sufferer, and he replied at once:

"Very well. I will do the best I can. I assure you I am not one to attempt anything I cannot carry through, although I am only the parish doctor of this poor little town."

An hour afterward, the street was cleared of the carriage wreck, and the whole party safely, and, despite the ungracious Englishman's moodiness, comfortably situated in a queer little box of a house, half hidden by myrtle and orange trees, and commanding a refreshing view of the sea. The house was occupied by a poor widow and her daughter, who were as delighted, and sensible of the unusual honor and privilege granted them through such noble guests, as even Sir Richard himself could ask.

The pale English girl was lying on a snowy couch, half covered with flowers (the graceful offering of pretty Francesca's warm southern heart to the suffering English signora), just as the doctor had left her when the painful operation was completed, and the ankle carefully bandaged. Opening her eyes from a drowsing slumber, she found him standing by her side sorting out the flowers, some of which he left her, but by far the greater portion he had thrown away.

"These ardent orange buds are too powerful for a sick room," he said. "Francesca must not bring you any more. How do I find you? has the pain abated?"

Miss Hereford smiled back into the kindly face with a touching expression of confidence and trust doubly refreshing, in contrast with her father's suspicious, distrustful manner.

"Thanks to your kindness," she said, "I am much relieved. How long do you think it will be before we go on to Naples?"

He shook his head. "Not for many weeks, certainly. Do you care so much?" he asked, seeing the blank dismay her face expressed.

"O, no—not for myself, but papa! How will he ever manage to be contented? Because—you see"—she paused, at a loss how to express her meaning without wounding his national pride—"he has been used to such different ways of living!"

"O, yes!" interrupted Dr. Pietro, good humoredly. "I understand your doubts, but Francesca and her mother will do the best they can. There is his own valet, and your waiting-woman, and last—not least, in this case—myself. Believe me, Miss Hereford, your father will enjoy himself much better than he imagines. The greatest difficulty he anticipated will soon be obviated. I have despatched a peasant to one of the farms in the neighboring town for a cow, and you shall soon enjoy your accustomed luxuries, milk and butter, which I confess are seldom found in this benighted place. For us, the oil answers every purpose. Habit is second nature," he added, laughing at the rueful face she wore at mention of the oil. "Now, then, I must try my hand at upholstering."

Whereupon he opened the bundle he had brought, and produced hammer and tacks, a roll of carpeting and chintz, and several other little trifles. Then, while Edith watched him smilingly, he quietly and noiselessly hung up curtains at the window, pasted over all cracks that admitted the air in treacherous draughts, spread down a carpet on the floor, and finally hung up an exquisite painting on the wall opposite the couch.

"Now, then, Miss Hereford, you will seem a little more comfortable."

She had been quietly following with her eye the busy, fitting figure, and wondering what nameless charm he possessed, that had so completely won her confidence and friendship.

"Thank you, I have no fears for my own comfort or contentedness. Is there a shop in the village where you found the chintz?"

He shook his head. "Our poor little town is far more limited in its resources than you imagine. In fact, you English people have very little idea of how few are the requirements of simple living, in cheerfulness and usefulness, at that."

He did not tell her how his ruthless hand had left his own room desolate, to make up for the deficiencies of hers.

So day after day passed on. Dr. Pietro was constant and thoughtful in his attentions to the invalid, not more in his professional character than in the light of a tender and watchful friend trying every means to amuse and beguile the tedious hours of confinement. And Edith Hereford became more and more impressed with the singular beauty and simplicity of a character so full of fire and genius, and a mind so stored with deep and varied knowledge, and yet contented to minister to the needs of the poor, oppressed, ignorant population about him.

Sir Richard, too, began to receive him with his natural hearty cordiality, when his tall form appeared in the doorway, and Dr. Pietro's arrival kindled a glow on his ruddy face almost as vivid as the pink tinge that transformed Edith's cheek from a waxen lily to a warmly-tinted rose. In fact, Sir Richard had grown to be not only contented, but even charmed with the pastoral life he led—more especially since he had purchased a fine horse, sent down for his inspection from a neighboring town at Dr. Pietro's suggestion, and received a liberal supply of accustomed luxuries from Naples.

Possibly, too, the magic of the air and sky had imparted Italian languor and love of ease, in place of his usual restless, bustling life. Edith was rejoiced to find he no longer murmured at their detention, or railed at the uncomfortable accommodations offered him.

And for Edith herself, a new life seemed to have dawned. Although debarred from the invigorating walks she had hitherto accustomed herself to take, yet the soft fresh air had worked magically upon her constitution, and the pallor of her beautiful face was rapidly disappearing beneath a healthy bloom. And when, at length, she was able to bear wheeling her couch into the verandah, to catch, with the glimpse of the sparkling water, a fresh sea-breeze on her forehead, her girlish vivacity was charming to behold. At least so thought her delighted father and her gratified physician, as well as the admiring Francesca peeping out from the basement window to enjoy the scene.

Rarer days came, when the cautious Dr. Pietro consented she should try walking, with his steady arm for her support; and charming strolls and drives followed, and even after Miss Hereford was quite able to bear the journey to Naples, neither her father nor herself made any allusion to forsaking their pleasant retreat.

Occasionally, to be sure, Sir Richard's conscience accused him of indolence, warning him how time was slipping away, while their tour on the continent remained so incomplete and unsatisfactory; but the wonderfully beneficial effects of the air and manner of living upon Edith's delicate constitution was sufficient excuse for their prolonged stay, and so he relapsed into his delicious reveries, his quiet morning canters and afternoon siestas, so entirely foreign to his active English habits.

A rude interruption to all this peaceful tranquillity came in the person of Captain Edward Hereford, the only son and brother, who had slipped away from his regiment at Dover and come down, post haste, to see what had become of his relatives, whom his Naples acquaintances reported as buried in some retired, benighted spot, out of sight and sound of humanity—i. e., English people. A rough, tyrannical, pompous fellow was Ned Hereford, with all his father's obstinate prejudices deepened into actual passions.

The first glance he caught of his sister, sitting in her shady, green-strewed room, so fair and smiling and happy, listening to a poem Dr. Pietro was translating, he gave a terrible frown with his huge, dark eyebrows, and a low, significant whistle, forming at that very moment a cruel plan which he was not long in executing.

The moment she beheld her brother, poor Edith's innocent heart felt a foreboding chill. Too well she knew his relentless determination —that with his presence vanished peace and quiet—and nerveless and trembling, she sank back in her chair, while Dr. Pietro bowed with dignified courtesy, in answer to the captain's insolent stare, and quietly retreated from the house.

"Edith," said Captain Ned, the next day, "that Dr. Pietro is a fine-looking man. By Jove, I wish he was an Englishman and a count!"

Edith's glowing cheek was veiled by a myrtle bough, as she returned:

"Why do you wish that? He seems perfectly contented as he is, and the people around here almost worship him."

"I dare say; but in case he was a British peer, you see, you and he would make a splendid couple. As it is"—he paused; his stern, cruel, pitiless face was bent close to the shrinking girl's—"as it is, I would rather see you ~~dead~~ and buried, than married to such a low-born adventurer! You understand? I shouldn't be long disposing of him."

She did understand. Full well she knew the tyrannical persecutions before her, his iron will, that so pitilessly could crush her unyielding disposition, and her own sad fate. Pale and drooping, like a bruised lily, she crept to her easy-chair, not daring even to indulge her heart, parched and scorched with the sudden fever of grief, with even the cooling shower of tears.

And in this rude, unfeeling manner was the veil torn from Edith's gentle heart; and with the first discovery of her love, came the knowledge of its utter hopelessness!

A week from the day of Captain Hereford's arrival, another coach stood before the door, and from the window Edith's sweet face, as pale as when she was borne in from the accident, looked forth a mute, agonized farewell to the upright form and sternly controlled features of Dr. Pietro. Never a word had been exchanged between them, except upon the most indifferent topics, before her father and brother—and yet how well each torn and bleeding heart comprehended the depth, as well as hopelessness, of the love only their eyes had dared to speak!

Pietro was left to toil on, in patient self-abnegation, for his humble, hapless brethren, and to work silently and steadily for the relief of his oppressed, downtrodden country. His was one of those rare and noble minds, content to see their genius and worth remain unknown and obscure, if thereby they can more steadily advance the one grand aim that swallows up all personal joy and comfort. He was left alone—but in the midst of the scenes her presence had hallowed and beautified! How sweet, and yet how torturing, his daily passing to and fro to his patients, before the house from whose deserted balcony no longer shone the soft blue eyes whose gaze could never be effaced from his heart! And now the energies and strength wasted upon a hopeless passion, were bestowed with redoubled vigor in the service of his hapless country.

And Edith—languid, silent and uncomplaining, she was borne away to gay society and brilliant scenes and endless festivities! Perhaps Captain Hereford believed the whirl of gaiety, into which she was plunged, would shut out from her remembrance the mellow, Italian voice and handsome, manly face. How little he knew gentle Edith's loyal heart, that sickened, amid the splendor and adulation around her, for the low, vine-wreathed walls and homely rooms and luxurious quiet of the hamlet house at B—.

Never a word of complaint, however, escaped her lips. The magic talisman that held Edith captive to her brother's cruelty, was her fear for Pietro, and she did, what many another weak, yielding woman has done before her, she quietly sacrificed her own happiness for the safety of the one beloved.

So when, one day, her brother said, in his abrupt way, "Viscount Englington will lay before my father and you a proposal of marriage, to-morrow—he is a most suitable husband for you—if you decline I shall soon understand the reason why, and remove the obstacle by relieving Italy of one of her fortune-hunting beggars," she only shivered, pressed her hand closely against her fluttering heart, and answered the noble viscount as cheerfully as possible, accepting the hand and name he offered her.

The aching heart was hidden beneath jewelled bands and costly lace, and that marvel of mistiness—woven, one would think, of moonbeams—the bridal veil, concealed the wildly gleaming eye and ashy cheek from the happy eyes of the noble bridegroom.

But once Viscountess Englington, Edith tried to fulfil every duty with heroic faithfulness. And she succeeded. Never was wife more beloved and venerated than she, and little enough did her husband suspect the pining, shivering, remorseful heart that throbbed and tortured itself away because of the little it had to give in return for his devotion. And while the sensitive, newly-awakened conscience suffered, the cheek paled, the eye dimmed, the rounded form grew thin and attenuated, and Edith's health grew every day more feeble.

In anxious solicitude the viscount gathered a bevy of physicians around her. They shook their wise heads with portentous gravity, and declared it a most singular case, threatening to baffle all their skill. Then Sir Richard suggested:

"Go to B—, Edith; you remember how wonderfully the air agreed with you, and how well Dr. Pietro seemed to understand your illness."

A hectic glow shone a moment on Edith's faded cheek, but she shook her head sadly. "She should never see B— or Italy again."

But who can foretell the future? The delicate wife was still pale and drooping, when a sudden and violent fever laid low the stout and healthy viscount, and at twenty-six Edith was a widow.

Then once more was her face turned to Italy, as a last hope for her failing strength, and eight years from the day the overturned carriage drew such attention in B—, the handsome private equipage of Viscountess Englington passed down the same steep road, with the Mediterranean on one hand, and the rising mountain side upon the other, while the sweet-faced invalid gazed wistfully and tearfully upon the unaltered scene. Unaltered? Nay, not so, for she starts nervously to find only a blackened ruin, where arose the vine-wreathed, well-remembered walls, and directs the postilion to pause at the neighboring cottage. The bright-faced mistress of the house comes to the door, and the viscountess asks faintly:

"What has become of Dame Marguerite and Francesca, who lived in that house eight years ago?"

The woman stares. "Eight years, signora pardon me, but I have never heard of such people, for I've only been here five years back."

Edith's trembling lip tries twice vainly, ere it articulates:

"And Dr. Pietro, is he not here?"

The forefinger of the peasant rests musingly on the fresh, scarlet mouth.

"Dr. Pietro! Dr. Pietro! We've no such person here. Our parish doctor is Dr. Giovanni. But signora will please wait. Is she the great English lady who was hurt here so long ago, and did so many generous deeds? I've often heard of her. And now I remember, Dr. Pietro was the poor man's name who was left behind, and he went away very soon to Naples."

The viscountess could ask no more, she had sunk back in one of the fainting fits so common with her of late. As soon as she had recovered, the carriage moved on to Naples, where the lodgings and luxuries, suitable to her rank and position, were at once secured, and very soon, notwithstanding her feeble health, the Viscountess Englington became well-known throughout the city, because of her constant appearance, here, there, and everywhere, at all public places and assemblies, and some little comments made, in her own circle, upon the excited curiosity the lovely invalid betrayed to see all the sights where medical or military men were prominent.

At length, by means of an attache who had obtained his position through the exertions of her late noble husband, she obtained cards for the reception levee of the king, and there, amid the crowd, she beheld a face that gladdened her vision like a flash of sunshine. Clad in garments very different from the coarse habiliments of the parish doctor, still she recognized at once, that tall, upright form, so light and airy of carriage, yet so strong and powerful, with its muscles of steel-enduring energy.

Her heart beat wildly. Would he recognize, in the pale, drooping woman of to-day the youthful patient he had cared so tenderly for? She did not know what a sudden bloom, like the rose of youth, had blossomed on her cheek, nor what unwonted gleam of joy had kindled the old light in the clear blue eyes. His face caught the illumination of hers, and he came instantly to her side.

"Is it possible I see you again?" The keen eye, as of old, was searching her face. "And ill, too. Have you come to try the benefit of Italian air a second time?"

She gave a smile of inexpressible thankfulness and relief.

"Yes, I have returned to be cured again by my old doctor, whose care is not yet forgotten. I went to B—— for you, and then continued the search in Naples."

While she spoke he was scanning her sable dress, and wondering.

"Is it possible she is free again? I saw her marriage, years ago, among the fashionable news from England. What has become of her husband?"

Yet he went on quietly giving her directions for selecting a more salubrious residence than her present situation in the grand square of the city, and ere long discovered the true state of affairs. And how could he conceal his delight and satisfaction, when he learned that she had left home especially to seek his aid, and perceived the childish trust and confidence she reposed in his kindness and skill?

Something like the renewal of old times followed. The girlish laugh Edith had believed forever silenced, echoed again, and the morbid, gloomy oppression vanished before the light, elastic spirits of returning happiness. Not a word of past sorrow and struggle, or of future hope and joy, had passed the lips of either. They seemed willing to live only in the freedom and peace of the present.

Dr. Pietro related all his patriotic hopes and fears. He acquainted her with his efforts to obtain the abolition of certain tyrannical laws, that crushed down so many of his hapless countrymen, and confided to her his belief that he was, even then, near the successful removal of one of the most obnoxious measures, and Edith listened with kindling sympathy, and unbounded admiration, and in return, laid before him the gloomy presentiments that had haunted her when she left England, and her firm belief that she was only journeying to find an Italian grave, gratefully assuring him, that even then his skilful care was restoring strength and hope.

One rare month of unsullied happiness was granted them, wherein they read, they sang, they rode together, and talked of all things else but the one great love that throbbed in either heart. Then came the cloud, the crash, the lightning stroke, suddenly, as from a hurrying summer tempest.

They were sitting together in the shaded balcony of the charming retreat on the outskirts of the city, which the limitless wealth of the viscountess had enabled her to secure, talking upon Pietro's favorite theme, the hope of future freedom for down-trodden Italy, when a sudden tumult, and firing in the populous portion of the town arrested an eloquent sentence on Pietro's lips. He sprang to his feet, his black eye flaming, his firm lip ashy white with the retreat of the startled blood to his heroic heart.

"Edith," he said (it was the first time he had ever addressed her thus), "he has deceived me! My friends are quartered there. There is treason, mutiny, betrayal, or there would be no such commotion. My place is with them. I must go!"

The viscountess clung frantically to his arm. In her sudden fright at the dangerous exigency his face betrayed, womanly pride and reserve were swept away.

"Pietro, Pietro," she cried, "it will be of no avail for your single arm to interpose. Your life may be the forfeit. Do you not know mine hangs on yours—will you crush them both? Remain with me, for my sake, stay!"

A soft, lambent glow quenched the fire in his eye. Solemn and earnest was the reply.

"Edith, from the moment I beheld you first, your image has been the dearest and most sacred earth could find for me. The love I bear for you is too strong and pure for words to express it, but that love, I have always believed a hopeless one, and therefore to Italy have I consecrated what heart, and life, and strength was left me. Now my mistress calls me, I must go. Nothing else in the wide world, Edith, before you, but Italy, my poor, down-trodden Italy!"

The noble, heroic spirit penetrated even her gentle heart. She received calmly the first thrilling kiss—alas, so plainly the last farewell caress likewise!—comprehended his meaning as he said, "I will return to-night, or—" pointing silently upward—and sank down mute and tearless, as his firm, ringing tread died away in the distance.

But with the long, weary hours of suspense the enthusiasm of lofty emotion died away, and horrible fears and sickening doubts filled the poor heart so lately returned to peace and hope.

Evening saw a pale face peering anxiously from the palazzo window, but no Pietro's graceful form disturbed the myrtle shrouded portal. The stars shone down, serene and bright, throughout that livelong night, but gave no answer back to the imploring agony of those wild, watchful eyes.

Weeks came and went, and notwithstanding her cautious inquiries, and the efforts of a few influential English friends, no tidings of Dr. Pietro's fate could be obtained.

Who does not know the terrible scenes, so hidden from sight, and yet so plain to a careful examiner, which the people of Italy and Sicily have known for the last twenty years, without daring to breathe a word of complaint, surrounded as they are in all directions, by the spies of government?

The sinking, hopeless invalid had no faith that Pietro was living, but some of his friends cherished a forlorn hope that he might be one of the prisoners who were saved from the summary punishment of most of those engaged in the revolt. Not shot down like cattle, but immured amid tenfold horrors through a live-long death. Those who were accused, as most active in opposition to the royal decrees, were granted the insult and mockery of a trial where neither justice nor pretence of fairness reigned.

And among the crowd, in the gallery, Viscountess Englington, closely veiled, and accompanied by her servant, and the attache, found her way to catch a glimpse of the prisoners. Yes, he was there. And when the dread sentence of imprisonment for life was pronounced upon them all, a woman's shriek disturbed the sudden silence, and a fainting form was borne out from the hall, while a tall figure, amid the condemned, started up wildly, wrenching at the manacles that fettered the muscular wrists. Hapless Pietro! Wretched Edith!

The prisoners were borne away to the guarded fort, on one of the neighboring islands. There, also, in sight of the frowning prison walls, the viscountess finally removed, for the sake of her extremely delicate health, the world said. Her physicians had likewise recommended constant indulgence in sea air. The Viscountess Englington was fabulously wealthy. The whims and caprices of such are never wondered at, so it excited little attention when a fine little steamer yacht, with luxurious accommodations, arrived for her especial use. So Edith was living almost constantly upon the water, steaming around from one bay to another, until she had become well-known to all the harbor officials, and they ceased to interrogate, or investigate, when the graceful little yacht appeared in view, and they caught sight of the sick lady's sweet, sorrowful face from the couch on deck.

So cautious were their movements, no one was aware, either, of the servant who assisted the jailor at the prison, and came to buy fish at the wharf where the steamer was moored once at least every week, so none mistrusted how every package of fish was wound about with a long loop of strong, nicely twisted silk, carefully prepared by the fair hands of the gentle Englishwoman, only kept alive by this one last, forlorn hope.

Came at length, a dark, rainy night, when the little steamer lay anchored far out in the bay, with the viscountess pacing the deck, unmindful of the falling rain, crying restlessly:

"What has delayed him? Why does he not come?"

Just before the gray morning broke, a boat that had been lying in the shade of the rocks, below the fort, came off to the steamer, and with a sorrowful glance at the haggard, excited face of her ladyship, the attache handed her a tiny fragment of paper with these words scrawled with a coal:

"It will not do. I cannot leave these four tried comrades. They will suffer so much worse, if I escape. God keep you!"

The disappointment was terrible, but Edith's pale lips repeated feebly:

"We will save all three."

But the next day the steamer received a visit from the superintendent of the prison. The viscountess felt her heart throbbing wildly, as he entered the cabin, and chatted gaily over the news and gossip of the town. Although it seemed only a friendly call, too well she knew their treacherous policy to doubt there was a motive for the visit. At length he said:

"What a fine little steamer your ladyship has! You were out in the bay, last night, pray did you know it was rather dangerous? We learned this morning some kind of a craft was about to rescue the prisoners in the fort. So, to-day we have sent them off to a more secure retreat."

Edith forced her quivering lip to say, calmly: "Ah, indeed, but pray where can you find a safer asylum?"

An exulting, meaning smile broke over his face, as he replied:

"Ah, madame, that is my secret, and you will scarcely follow them this time."

When he was gone, the viscountess sank back upon the velvet sofa with a white, heart-broken misery stamped upon her face, too deep and terrible for sighs or tears. She rested her cold cheek against the pillow, closed her eyes wearily, and folded the thin, white hands in prayer. One only burden the petition bore: "Let me die, O, my Father, let me die!"

She might have died, then and there, from very languor and exhaustion, the chilled blood stagnating about the heart, too hopeless to care to throb another pulse of life. All day her attendants ministered to her, and with anxious pathetic affection entreated her to rouse herself, but not a word or look could they obtain. At dusk the attache came on board and hurried to her side, shocked and alarmed at the change. He called her name. The white lids raised, and the blue eyes looked wistfully into his face, then closed again.

"It is all right," he cried, putting his lips to the heedless ear; "they are all saved. Does your ladyship hear me? They are all safe, and the steamer must sail to-night."

He might as well have talked to the marble statue by the couch. In frantic distress he hurried to the shore again. When he returned, a rough, uncouth-looking boatman assisted him at the oars; but the moment the deck was reached, the boatman hastened into the cabin, threw off the rough jacket, and brushed carefully the wild, neglected hair, and then bending over the prostrate figure on the couch, kissed softly the pale, speechless lips. As he chafed the chilly hands, and moistened the parched lips, his warm tears fell upon the fast closed lids.

"Edith, Edith," he cried, "do not die, now that all is safe. It is I. It is Pietro who speaks to you."

As the ringing, well-known voice echoed through the cabin, the viscountess started, opened her eyes wildly, glanced at the worn, yet still handsome face bending over her, burst into a flood of tears, and then fainted.

"It is all right now," said the calm physician, forgetting the agitated lover in the offices of his old vocation.

At midnight another boat came off from the shore with the four escaped prisoners, and the little steamer, so many weeks before in secret readiness for her departure, quietly slipped out from the bay, on her way to England.

When Edith awoke from her long, refreshing slumber, she found her hand clasped tightly in that of Pietro, and his anxious eyes bent tenderly and assuringly upon her bewildered face.

"Lie quiet, dearest," he said, with his accustomed playful peremptoriness, "do not try to talk, and I will tell you what you do not understand. Your friend, as well as you and I, believed all hope of escape lost, and was on his way to Naples, lest the superintendent of the prison should call on him to make further investigations, when he stumbled upon our escort, taking us, still fettered, from the prison to a boat, to remove us before daylight. There were only half a dozen soldiers for us five men. He hurried away for his employes, found four vagabonds willing to sell their liberty for gold, and the moderate fare of a prison, and with them overtook our train, mixed in with us apparently accidentally, and, covered by the darkness, left the others locked into the cells on board the frigate in yonder harbor, and brought us away with them. The soldiers were stupid hirelings, or such a shallow stratagem would never have succeeded. It will be likely to become known to-night; but we are far on our way, and I have little fear of further molestation, for once out of Italy, the government bears no malice toward us. Alas, poor Italy, I never thought to flee from your shores! But, Edith, for your sake—"

Her touching, joyous smile answered him, and the English shores were safely won, and health and happiness returned; but Captain Hereford was not there to frown or storm, when at a quiet wedding in London, the wealthy Viscountess Englington laid aside her title and widow's weeds, to become the beloved and happy wife of Dr. Pietro. Captain Hereford had been thrown from his horse and instantly killed, while riding out with a pretty actress who had created a great sensation in town. But Sir Richard was there, the most jovial and delighted of all the guests, declaring to all he had prophesied rightly when he assured his daughter that Italian air and Dr. Pietro could restore her fading bloom and health.

WAITING.

BY ANNIE CHAMBERS KETCHUM.

Waiting for health and strength—
 Counting each flickering pulse, each passing hour,
 And sighing when my weary frame at length
 Sinks like a drooping flower.

Waiting for rest and peace—
 Rest from unravelling life's perplexing woof;
 Peace from the doubts that crouch like hidden foes,
 And glare at me aloof.

Waiting for absent eyes,
 Brighter than sunrise to the lonesome sea;
 Lovely as life to youth's expectant gaze,
 'And dear as heaven to me.

Thou who didst watch and pray,
 Quickened the pulse, bidd'st doubt and weeping flee!
 Or, if these must abide, still let me cry,
 Bring back the loved to me!

THE OLD LADY'S STORY.

BY ELIZA FRANCES MORIARTY.

LISTEN to my story; simple it is to be sure, but then it may not be altogether uninteresting.

Far away in the country, in the depths of a green valley can be seen the little village of Bradford. I lived close by the roadside at the entrance to the valley, and from my own door I could see into Widow Clare's thatched cottage embowered among fragrant shrubs and a garden full of flowers. Farther down the valley, the tower of the old church overtopped the massive oaks and elms that were the pride of all the country round.

Mrs. Clare was the widow of the late curate, who had died some years before, leaving a slight provision for his wife and only child. But though poor they were respected, and Ally Clare, "little Ally" as she was called, grew up petted by all Bradford. Fair in face, gay as a lark, a little wayward, perhaps, yet with a temper as sweet as the roses in June, her presence was welcomed at every fireside in our village.

Many and many a time would she come up to my cottage of an evening, to hear me tell over and over again all about the queen's coronation. Ah, my poor James, now dead and gone, had carried me all the way to London, a good three days' journey then, to see the crowning of the young queen, God bless her!

Little Ally would never tire of hearing all that I had to tell of the great city, and thanking me in her gentle way, she would go away sighing because her lot was cast in such an out of the way place as Bradford.

Well, Time went wandering on through the world, making his wonderful changes in young and old; and while the silver threads of age were gathering fast on the comely head of Widow Clare, her sweet daughter, now the tallest and prettiest maiden in the parish, was causing many a heart-ache among the merry swains of Bradford.

Among them all there wasn't a more likely youth than Philip Hart. Poor lad, his was a hard lot. At the tender age of nine he was motherless, and his father marrying soon after a woman of ungovernable temper, the little orphan met with nothing but blows and abuse from his cruel step-mother. The greatest sorrow of the poor child's life was, that his father, once fond and indulgent, now turned to dislike him, lavishing all his love on the young children given to him in this second marriage.

Notwithstanding all the unkind treatment that he had received, Philip grew up to be a handsome, active and intelligent young man; and now that he was able to do for himself, he would have emigrated to America, where he had an uncle settled for many years, but that old associations and old memories bound him to the place of his birth. So said the villagers, though it was a plain case that Philip had fallen in love, as the saying is, with Widow Clare's pretty daughter.

Well, it was hard to say whether little Ally favored young Philip or not. At one time she seemed to prefer him above all others, delighting his heart with her sweet words, as he stood waiting for her at the church porch after the Sabbath service. Then it would do one's heart good to see them both, side by side, so young, so comely and so happy. Why did a cloud lower upon them, darkening all the sunshine of their youth? On more than one of those blessed Sundays have I seen little Ally place her hand in Philip's, and while her mother lingered behind in friendly chat with the neighbors, the two would trip away across the meadows, where the grass was green and bright beneath their feet, and the birds sang around them as if they shared in their happiness. At other times again, that same pretty hand would be refused to Philip in the dance, and mischievous Ally, tossing her head with affected indifference, would turn away with some more fortunate swain to join in the merry reel.

Well, things had been going on in this way for some time, when one soft summer evening as little Ally sat at the door of her mother's cottage, singing like a lark, and spinning in the meantime, a foreign looking gentleman suddenly stood before the startled girl. He held his hat in his hand with as much respect as if he was speaking to a lord's daughter, and with a voice low and soft as a woman's, asked her some trifling question about the village.

The Widow Clare, who prided herself on her good manners, on hearing the stranger's voice was at the door in an instant. And well pleased was she to see the respect that was paid her daughter by one whose dress and appearance betokened a gentleman. She immediately invited him to rest himself in the cottage, saying that she hoped she would be able to give him the information he desired. As may be supposed, this wasn't his last visit to the cottage. His name was Colamber Fitz Arthur, and he had taken lodgings in the village, as he intended remaining for a few weeks taking sketches. He was no painter, as we had supposed at first, but a gentleman from Shropshire, travelling for his amusement.

The whole village was full of surmises about the stranger, and while some were greatly taken with his handsome face and winning manners, others again would shake their heads and say, "Time will show who and what he is." As to Widow Clare, she was highly indignant that anybody should look with suspicion on so grand-looking a gentleman; though I smiled at her notion of his being a great lord in disguise, I agreed with her in blaming those who were so hasty in declaring their judgments on the stranger.

The following Sunday, Mr. Fitz Arthur was bright and early in the little church, but instead of paying attention to the service, he never took his eyes off of Miss Ally's sweet face, that drooped lower and lower under his steady and admiring gaze—so everybody said, and, moreover, that the young girl felt flattered by his notice. Didn't everybody in the church remark the half-triumphant smile that played around her pretty mouth all the time that Mr. Fitz Arthur's two eyes were upon her? Yet everybody seemed as attentive to the services as little Ally herself.

Mr. Fitz Arthur went out with the congregation, not without casting a lover-like look towards Widow Clare's pew, where little Ally still sat with her head bent over her book, though I fear me that she knew little of its holy contents that blessed day. When a minute afterwards Philip Hart approached her and spoke to her in a low voice, she started as if wakened out of a trance.

What passed between them, I never knew, but Philip went alone across the meadow that day. Little Ally had pleasant company though, for

Mr. Fitz Arthur joined her and her mother as soon as they left the church. He walked as far as the cottage with them, and, of course, on being asked in as before to rest himself, he was but too glad of an excuse to enter and gain a firmer footing in the cottage.

I could see all from my own cottage-door, where I was standing, looking at the people passing along the road on their return from church, when I was startled by the form of a man rising up from a clump of bushes that had hidden him from view. In a moment, I knew Philip Hart, and on seeing that he was observed he came quickly towards me, saying, in a broken, hurried voice:

"Mrs. Malahide, you always pitied me when a boy—do so now."

He was off in an instant. Never shall I forget the look of hopeless love, grief and anger that was stamped upon his face—and that face itself deadly pale—nor the strange harshness of his tones that used to ring on my ear like rich music. While the tears stood in my eyes as I watched the poor lad dashing away across the meadows towards the home that was no home to him, I was wicked enough to wish Mr. Colamber Fitz Arthur at the bottom of the Red Sea.

The next day and the next, found Mr. Fitz Arthur wandering around the widow's cottage with his sketch-book under his arm, though no one ever saw him making any use of it. As for Ally Clare, she was the envy of all the pretty girls in Bradford, who tried in vain to win the notice of the distinguished-looking stranger.

One by one, the suitors for the hand of the village beauty were dropping away before so great a rival. But Philip, who was proud to a fault, hid all his love and jealousy under a look of cold indifference. Then people said that Philip Hart cared very little for the fair young girl who it was thought would be his future wife. Ah, could they have seen him crouching among the bushes on the roadside, watching his little Ally bestowing her smiles and sweet words on a stranger—words and smiles that should be his—they would have felt for him as I did.

Well, things went on in this way for about a fortnight. The Widow Clare was in high glee, and went singing about her cottage like any young girl. Being an old friend of Mrs. Clare, and loving her child as if she were my own, I took the first opportunity to speak a good word for my favorite, Philip. Great was my surprise, when she said in an offended tone:

"You know, Mrs. Malahide, that Philip Hart wouldn't make a suitable husband for my daughter. He hasn't the means of supporting a wife, and will not have for some years to come. Indeed," she added, in an exulting tone, "I have far different prospects in view for her. It was but half an hour ago that her hand was claimed from me in marriage."

"Mr. Fitz Arthur?" I ventured to ask.

"Mr. Colamber Fitz Arthur," she went on to say, with a vain effort to conceal her pride and gratification, "wishes to make Ally his wife—he has my full consent, having fully satisfied me as to his rank and prospects."

"And does Ally give her consent?" I asked, in a tone of disappointment, not having so strong a faith in the gentleman's "rank and prospects" as the hopeful mother.

"Why, what do you think?" she returned coldly. "If you glance through the back window you can see the two lovers walking together in the meadow."

A deep groan startled us both, at the same instant that we observed Philip Hart standing at the half-open door. He was sadly changed; his eyes looked sunken, his cheeks hollow, and a deadly paleness overspread his face.

"Mrs. Clare," he said, in a heart-broken voice, "I have heard all. I came here to see Ally and know the worst. But, for God's sake tell me truly, will she marry this—this stranger?"

"What right have you to ask that question, Philip Hart?" she returned, reddening with anger. "This stranger, indeed. You must know that Mr. Fitz Arthur can buy all Bradford. I hope," she continued in a different tone, taking some pity on his wretched looks, "that you will not cloud my daughter's happiness by troubling her with a profession of your love, which can never find a return."

"You need not fear it," he said, bitterly. "She shall never see me again."

The poor fellow turned round, wished me good-by, in a choking voice, and hurried out of sight. As I arose to go, old Madge the village gossip entered, and I felt sure then that Mr. Fitz Arthur's proposal would be the talk of every fireside in Bradford before evening.

Of course, the news spread about, and everyone wished well to little Ally. But while the many thought her fortune was made, a few, and myself among the number, had a suspicion that Mr. Fitz Arthur wasn't what he represented himself to be.

To the surprise of every one, little Ally herself, was the first to contradict the report of her engagement with Mr. Fitz Arthur—and though it was easy to see that the widow's heart was set upon the match, she loved her child too well to force her to wed against her inclinations.

The next day it was rumored through the village that Mr. Fitz Arthur had suddenly and mysteriously disappeared; and later still in the day, the news went about that Philip Hart had not been seen since the previous noon.

I was alone in the cottage that same afternoon; pondering on the strange disappearance of Ally Clare's two lovers, and dreading the worst—it was now the belief of all that they had met and quarrelled, though none offered a conjecture as to the result—when the door was flung open, and Widow Clare and her poor child stood before me. They were both very pale, and Ally looked bewildered, almost breathless, with grief excitement.

I saw at a glance that the pride of yesterday had vanished, while the good widow was now humbled and sorrowful. She had come to learn if I knew anything of Philip, and on telling her that I had seen him last under her own roof, she shook her head with something of a sad meaning, saying:

"Ah, my heart misgave me yesterday when he broke away so, with his wild looks and tones. May Heaven preserve us from every danger! I trust and pray that the poor boy hasn't fallen into any sin."

A low, heart-breaking cry from Ally checked her. I knew then, as well as I did afterwards, that the foolish child loved none other than Philip Hart; but piqued at his seeming indifference, with a young girl's desire for admiration, she had permitted the attentions of Mr. Fitz Arthur.

Before night the mystery was partly cleared up, giving the good people of Bradford food for talk for many a long day. Two strangers had arrived in the village, and at once sought out old Dan Brown, from whom Mr. Fitz Arthur had taken lodgings. They were closeted with him for half an hour, and after spending a shorter time at Widow Clare's, they rode away in another direction from that in which they had come.

After that, the news spread like wild-fire through the village that they were two detective policemen from London, who had been for weeks in search of a noted swindler. His real name was Mike Grigs, they said, but he had passed under a dozen others, the last of which was known to be Colamber Fitz Arthur. The next morning early they were seen riding through Bradford, with Mr. Grigs mounted between them, his sketch-book before him on the saddle, and his whole air showing the utmost effrontery. It was supposed he had learned by some means that the police were in pursuit of him, and left Bradford immediately.

At the end of a week, a long, dreary week to poor Ally, a letter came to her from Philip, dated from Liverpool, and written on the day of his departure for America. In it he told her of his love and disappointment, bade her a long farewell, and ended by wishing her the happiness that was lost to him forever.

After that a fever seized upon the poor girl, and kept her prostrate for six long weeks. The Widow Clare herself looked wasted and haggard, and while she felt grateful to Heaven for saving her child from the wiles of that wicked impostor Grigs, she repented her harsh words to the upright Philip.

"Ah! if he would come back now, he should have my child with a mother's blessing," she would sigh, when her eyes rested upon the pale face of her darling.

For two years nothing was heard of Philip, until a son of old Dan Brown's, who had been in America, returned home and reported that he had seen him in Philadelphia, where he was in partnership with his uncle, a wealthy commission merchant. Philip was much respected, and he had heard it said that Mr. Hart would soon bestow his name on a beautiful rich young lady.

Poor little Ally—she had been hoping all along that Philip would return, and that they would yet know true happiness. This news fell heavily upon her heart, and every one in that happy valley grieved to see its fairest flower drooping slowly into the grave.

Time changes us all; I was even then an old woman, and that is ten years ago—when I turned my back upon the old place forever. My two sons were married and living in Manchester, where they were very well off, and I was now going to them, so as to end my days by my children's hearthstone.

I had gone to break bread for the last time with my old neighbor, Widow Clare. Full three months had passed since young Brown's news, of the approaching marriage of Philip Hart, had struck a final death-blow to Ally's hopes. She now exerted herself to appear cheerful, not wishing that I should carry away a sad impression of my parting visit. Well, we had been sitting over our tea for some time, and talking of old times, when the door was suddenly pushed open, and Madge, the news vender of the entire parish, put in her head, and said:

"Hah! I see by your faces that you haven't heard the news? Philip Hart has returned home from America with his young bride. He arrived two hours ago at his father's; but after spending the honey-moon in England he will go back again."

Without saying another word she was off to spread the news elsewhere. I glanced at Ally, she was deadly pale and held the cup to her lips to hide the tears that were flowing down her cheeks. Not a word was spoken for many minutes; then the sound of footsteps startled us, for they had paused outside the cottage door. A slight knock followed, and as Mrs. Clare looked agitated after old Madge's visit, I opened the door. A gentleman stood there, young and handsome, with a very beautiful girl beside him. A second look brought my heart into my mouth, for I recognized Philip Hart.

"Am I so changed that you have all forgotten me?" He entered the room without ceremony as he spoke, and I had left a motherly, welcoming kiss upon his cheek as Mrs. Clare came forward and greeted him, appearing quite embarrassed as she did so. Poor Ally stood leaning against the wall for support, but calling all a woman's pride to her aid, she received him with a cold and distant manner. He appeared not to notice it, but said, in a tender and manly way:

"Ally, it is a long time since we met—I never inquired for you, because I thought you was the wife of another." A low sob burst from poor Ally. "An old neighbor arrived from Bradford some six weeks since, and stopped in Philadelphia. From him I learned all. I am now here to ask your forgiveness for ever having wronged you in thought."

"Why should you ask my forgiveness, Mr. Hart?" she said, proudly.

The young stranger had come close to Philip and placed her hand beseechingly upon his shoulder.

"Ally," said he, "let this sweet girl plead in my behalf. Wont you listen to my—" But Ally had fainted.

What is the use of prolonging the story? You can imagine the happy scene that followed, better than I can describe it. Little Ally recovered to learn that Philip's cousin wasn't his wife, and that he had ever remained true to her; the report of his approaching marriage having been mere idle talk. He had come to England to claim little Ally for his wife, and his cousin had accompanied him, to see the land that was hallowed in the memories of her parents.

I delayed my journey for another week in order to attend my little Ally's wedding. It was a merry affair, and every one enjoyed himself to his heart's content. Well, if I had remained in Bradford how lonely I would have been after my dear friends. Three weeks after the wedding Mrs. Clare accompanied her children to their home in the New World, where she is now the happiest grandmother living.

MY COUSIN ADA.

BY MARGARET VERNE.

WHEN papa forbade Charley Hamilton the house, I was both glad and sorry—so much so, that I could hardly tell which feeling predominated. Glad, because although every one else in the house (with one exception) supposed his visits were on my account, I knew that Ada, my little pink and white faced doll of a cousin, was the magnet which attracted him, and it did me a world of good to spite her; yet sorry for the reason that his handsome face had bewitched me, and to have it banished from my sight was a continual pain which only those who love can understand. To be sure, I might have set it all right and had him back in a twinkling, if I had had the will or the wish to explain; for, although papa objected to having a poor clerk for a son-in-law, he wouldn't have uttered a word of remonstrance, or raised a single obstacle in his way, had he known him to be only a suitor for the hand of his penniless niece. The match was a very suitable one for her, and we were all tired of having her in the family.

Perhaps I ought not to say all. The children were mighty fond of her. She had a fawning, sweet way with them, that made them take to her wonderfully. The baby would lie in her arms and coo and laugh by the hour together, while if I touched it, it would squall itself black in the face (the obstinate little thing!) and kick its feet—vigorous ones they were too, let me tell you, for such tiny bits of things—into my side and stomach, till I was glad enough to drop her; though perhaps that wasn't much to be wondered at, seeing that I never noticed it only when we had visitors, and even then was mortally afraid of her tumbling my silks and tearing my laces.

And then papa himself—hard and unyielding as he was to the rest of us—his own family, too—was always kind to Ada, and never thought his dressing-gown properly aired, or his slippers half warmed, unless she was 'round to see to them. I don't think he half understood, himself, the influence the artful creature had gained over him, with her pretty, wheedling ways and soft words. I have known him to take her in his arms, or draw her down upon his knee, as I, his own daughter, could not remember of being taken since I was a little child, and fondle her bright hair (I used to envy her her hair—it was so long and thick and golden!) and kiss her cheeks and eyes and lips, right before mama's face and mine; and if we ventured to say a word about it, he would turn upon us with one of those queer, stern looks of his, which always made me feel so uncomfortably, and ask us if he was to be compelled to beg our permission every time he wished to kiss his dead sister's child—his dead sister, who had been kinder to him while she lived, and truer to him, even in her memory, after she was dead, than his own wife and daughter.

I think this was why we hated her so—mama and I! At any rate, I had determined to thwart her in her maneuverings after Charley Hamilton—partly because I knew (though she had never given me her confidence—trust a woman to read another woman's heart!) that there was no other way I could wound her so deeply and surely, and partly, as I said before, because I was bewitched, and in spite of his poverty and my aristocratic breeding, would sooner have married Charley than a lord duke.

"I can't see why a man is the worse for being poor!" I said, defiantly, at the breakfast-table the next morning after papa informed us that he had warned Mr. Hamilton to discontinue his visits.

My remark occasioned quite a variety of feeling among my hearers, if I may judge from the different expressions of countenance. I saw Ada's face brighten, and there was a cordial "thank you, cousin," in the sparkling blue eyes she turned towards me. Mama gave her plate a little push, as if in her astonishment she could think of nothing else to do, and then leaned back in her chair with a surprised—"hear the child!" Brother Frank held up both hands and whistled, and papa, abstractedly soaking a burnt muffin in his coffee, asked me a little curtly if "I hadn't changed my mind since the time I broke off my engagement with Henry Kimball because his father failed in business?"

"But Henry Kimball and Charley Hamilton are so unlike each other, I persisted, pretending not to notice the half smile that ran round the table at my father's words, though I couldn't help the angry color mounting up to my cheeks.

"To be sure," my father replied, crustily.

"If a man is honorable and intelligent and manly, I can't see the wisdom or beauty of turning him out of doors, simply because he is poor, which is plainly no fault of his, since everybody would be rich if they could."

I had that grateful light smiling out of Ada's eyes again, and for a moment I thought she was going to reach her hand across the table to me for very sympathy and gladness, because I was Charley's champion. Her little white, tender hand! I could have set my teeth through it that blessed instant with envy and rage.

"Can any one inform me of the exact time when the democratic principle began to germinate in Miss Helen's character?" inquired my father, with an unmistakable touch of irony in his voice.

There was no reply to this pleasantry, and after a moment's silence, he continued, speaking in a graver tone:

"Perhaps I was a little hard on the boy, and rather hasty—what do you say, puss? 'tisn't too late to have him back yet."

Puss was his favorite name for my cousin, and a stranger seeing the fond, half-playful smile with which he turned towards her as he spoke, would have thought her a favorite daughter, and me the dependent niece.

"Why, uncle—" she began, in her gentle, coaxing voice.

I knew it would never do to let her go on with what she had to say.

"La, papa!" I exclaimed, interrupting her—how the warm, resentful color flickered up to her brows at my rudeness!—"you needn't ask Ada. She can't be supposed to make an impartial judge, since she hates the very ground he treads on."

"Whew! It isn't like puss to hate anybody! What's the reason?"

"I don't know, I am sure, papa," I answered, laughing maliciously to see Ada drop her head, so that her curls would screen the vivid crimson of her cheeks, "unless she overheard what he said to me yesterday about her being vain and verdant. It was rather cruel of him, after flirting with her so steadily for the past three weeks. It's a wonder I haven't been jealous. I shouldn't have allowed it, only Ada, little goose, was so unsophisticated and received his attentions so seriously, and it was such rare sport for him, that I enjoyed the fun from nothing but sympathy."

Ada lifted her face and turned it full upon me with such a white, shocked look, that I saw instantly she put full faith in all I had said, and did not so much as mistrust the game I was playing. Her babyish mouth whitened and quivered for a moment, and she put her hand up suddenly to her forehead, as though a quick pain had flashed through it. Then I saw her eyes dilate and brighten, till they seemed fairly to emit sparks of fire. Her face flushed up hotly (I never knew her to have such a magnificent color before), and rising hastily from the table, she ran from the room, without a word.

"By Jupiter, if he has been trifling with that child, I'll break his neck!" exclaimed papa, excitedly, bringing his hand down upon the table violently, as the door closed after her. "The rascally, sneaking young—" And leaving the sentence unfinished, he also arose from his seat and left the room.

After that, I had a part to play, and I threw my whole soul into the effort of playing it well. I had staked everything on one desperate throw. If I won—well and good. If I lost!—but I dared not think of the depths of shame and self-humiliation into which I should sink in such a case.

For a time, I was successful. If Charley sent tender billet-doux to my cousin, they passed through the servant's hands into mine, but went no further. An old cast-off silk gown or two repaid Bridget for her share in the duplicity. If he sent her flowers, I wore them on my bosom and in my hair, as proudly as though they had not rightfully belonged to the woman I detested. If, once in a while, she came down pale and heavy-eyed of a morning, as though she had wept all night, I noticed it was invariably after I had boasted to her of his gallantry and devotion, and begged her in pretended terror not to betray me to my father. Evidently though she believed he held her in contempt, her womanly pride could not quite conquer her love, and it gave me a kind of fierce triumph to know it.

As for Mr. Hamilton, I shunned him at first, and that was no hard matter, as he never came to the house, and we seldom met in company. I dared not make my plot too intricate at the commencement, for although I had determined to win him at all hazards, I thought it wiser to work cautiously. When I had managed Ada—killed out by deception and intrigue the last particle of affection from her heart (in my spite, I was quite willing to have the task a lingering one), it would be time to work out the other half of my scheme!

But one morning—it was about six weeks after the conversation above recorded—there came a note of more than usual importance. It contained a passionate avowal of love—not a labored and wordy affair, but brief, manly, eloquent, and sweet enough to have won a different heart from hers. In conclusion, he said he could bear her silence and apparent indifference no longer. It was getting to be nothing short of torture. He loved her—he believed she loved him. If she was afraid of that old ogre of an uncle, just let him (Charley) know. He would turn the world upside down but he would win her, if she cared enough for him to let him make the attempt. Would she not grant him an interview? If she would only run down to the foot of the garden while the rest of the family were at dinner, he—

I stopped there, and thrust the note into my work-basket, for I heard Ada's step at the door. She came in, looking so downcast and meek that I hated her worse than ever. She had taken the baby from the nurse's arms in the hall, and was laughing at and caressing it as she entered the room. But when she saw the bouquet in my hand (it had come with the note), the smile faded from her lip and the sparkle from her eyes. She seated herself silently and bent her pale face down over the child, to conceal, as I thought, a gush of tears. I doubt if she had known the whole truth even then, whether she would have had sufficient spirit to forego her affected amiability long enough to resent it. As it was, she sighed heavily, while the baby, as if understanding her change of mood, put its little hands up against her cheeks in mute, infantile pity, and then crowed with all its might to attract her attention.

My plan was formed on the instant. When the dinner-hour arrived, I excused myself on the plea of a headache, and declaring that I needed a breath of sweet out-door air to freshen my spirits, put on my hat and ran into the garden. How redly the June roses blushed along my path! and with what shy grace the pansies—those untiring little milliners—held up their gold and purple hoods for the sun to criticise! But somehow flowers and sunshine, and even the gay birds twittering in the branches above my head, connected themselves, in spite of me, with my thoughts of Ada, and so displeased me.

Once out of sight of the house, I strolled on more leisurely, till I came in sight of a tall, waiting figure, standing in the shadow of the high shrubbery at the foot of the garden. It needed but one glance to assure me that Charley Hamilton was true to his appointment. That handsome, erect form and proudly carried head, could belong to no one else in the world.

He sprang forward eagerly when he heard my step, but I was not slow to notice the shade of disappointment that crossed his face as he discovered that it was I, and not my cousin, who approached him. I enjoyed his discomfiture for a moment, and then said softly, putting my finger on my lip with a playful signal of secrecy:

"Ada sent me, Mr. Hamilton!"

He was all gratitude in an instant, and then all anxiety, overwhelming me with questions. Was Ada ill? No, quite well. Was she afraid of displeasing her uncle? Not at all. He looked a little disconcerted and uneasy at that, as though thinking nothing short of some such motive could excuse her for sending a substitute, instead of coming herself. I liked to prolong his stay, and so gave him no information beyond what he asked.

"My note was received, I suppose?" he inquired at length, biting his full under-lip with ill-concealed impatience.

"O, yes!" I answered, readily. If he had only known by whom!

"And you are in her confidence, Miss Draper?"

I bowed acquiescence. If he had only imagined how!

"And you have a message for me?"

I bowed again. If he had but suspected what!

There was a short, embarrassed silence after that. I saw the proud color creep slowly up to his face, showing its unsteady stain even through the brown and silken beard; and the hands, which he had unconsciously clasped together in his eagerness, trembled visibly. I knew what hope and what fear it was that agitated him so, and the knowledge gave me a desperate and unscrupulous courage.

"What if I should tell you that my cousin Ada was as false and heartless, as she is beautiful and bewitching?"

The crimson wavered to white in his face, but that was the only effect my words produced.

"I should say you told an untruth!" he answered decisively, without so much as changing his position or removing his eyes from mine.

The cool hauteur of his manner, and his firm faith in Ada, baffled me. I hardly knew how to proceed.

"I see you are not prepared for what I came to communicate, Mr. Hamilton," I said, affecting a sadness I did not feel, and turning slowly away from him. "I will be merciful."

But as I was moving off, he sprang forward and caught my arm.

"Tell me all you came to tell, whatever it is," he said, in a hurried, agitated way.

"I cannot. I have not the courage."

"Tell me!" he persisted.

"You will not believe me if I do; you have said as much."

His hold of my arm tightened.

"Tell me!" he repeated, imperiously.

"You cannot bear it."

"Tell me!" He fairly shook me in his impatience. "I am not in a mood to be trifled with."

"Well, then, release my arm," I said.

He stepped back, loosening his hold of my wrist as he did so, and coloring at his own vehemence.

"But just let me assure you," I said, softly, drooping my eyelids before his earnest gaze, "that you have my sympathy and respect. If the rest of my family have a false pride that would keep them back from acknowledging you as an equal, I, at least, am capable of appreciating and admiring true worth and manliness, aside from pecuniary distinctions. Please remember that, Mr. Hamilton."

I reached out my hand to him as I spoke. He lifted it respectfully to his lips, and though I knew it was only a formal gallantry, the kiss thrilled through my blood electrically.

"And now let me tell you that it was at Ada's instigation that papa forbade you the house. She made your attentions the matter of common jest, and when a richer lover came along, took this method of ridding herself of them. You—"

"It is false! Do not believe her, Charley! As God hears me, it is false!"

I whirled suddenly about. Behind me, with an open note in her hand, stood Ada—waxen-white as though risen from the dead—her great, dilating blue eyes looking straight beyond me to her lover, with a wistful, adoring glance I shall never while I live forget. The next moment he opened his arms to her, and with a faint cry she sprang past me into them.

Even then I might have conquered, had I set my woman's wit to work. But to see her lying there, clinging to his heart, nestling her face to his shoulder; to see him hold her in that strong, close clasp, as though he defied death itself to wrest her from him, was more than I could bear. In my mad fury I sprang forward and struck her full in the face with my clenched hand. I would have repeated the blow, but Charles Hamilton snatched my hand with a gripe that made me wince, and held me off.

"It is well for you that you are a woman, Helen Draper!" he exclaimed, trying to control his voice, which, in spite of him, was husky with passion. "I advise you to go into the house."

And I did go, not because he advised me to, but for the reason that just then I could think of nothing better to do. O, how I hated them both!

The worst had not come even then. I have not been able to solve the mystery of my father's conduct to this day, but when Ada refused to be married without his sanction, and Charles went to him, he not only yielded a ready consent, but gave Ada a handsome dowry, and the next day announced his intention of taking Charles as a partner. What he meant by it, I am at a loss to know. I suppose it was some of that artful Ada's doings. And I was forced, out of consideration for our relationship, to go to the wedding!

NEVER ACT A FALSEHOOD.

Many respectable people, think lightly of the sin of deception, if no words of falsehood are uttered. But the Bible recognizes no moral distinction between lying acts and lying words, and a stern moral integrity will judge them equally blameworthy. The following anecdote illustrates the uprightness of the Duke of Wellington:

Being afflicted with deafness in his left ear, he applied to Mr. Stevenson, an aurist, whose operation not only failed, but placed his patient in imminent danger, from which he was saved by the timely aid of Dr. Hume. The grief and mortification of Mr. Stevenson, when he heard of the results of his practice, knew no bounds. He hastened to Apsley House, and being admitted to the duke's presence, expressed himself, as any right-minded person under the circumstances would have done. But he was instantly stopped, though in the kindest manner.

"Don't say a word about it; you acted for the best; it has been unfortunate, no doubt, for both of us, but you are not to blame."

Grateful for this reception, Mr. Stevenson went on to say, "But it will be the ruin of me. Nobody will employ me any more, when they hear that I have been the cause of such suffering and danger to your grace."

"Why should they hear anything about it?" replied the duke; "keep your own counsel, and depend upon it I won't say a word to any one."

"Then your grace will allow me to attend you as usual, which will show them that you have not withdrawn your confidence from me."

"No," replied the duke, still firmly; "I can't do that, for that would be a lie."

So strong, even in a case which made no common appeal to his generosity, was the duke's love of truth. He would not act a falsehood any more than he would speak one.—Life of Wellington.

INDUSTRY IN SWITZERLAND.

A correspondent thus writes from Geneva, Switzerland:—"The whole population appears to be prosperously engaged in some kind of industrial occupation, chiefly in jewelry and watch making. Women and children even are able to earn money by some particular branch of these manufactures. Children of ten years earn five or six francs a week, and after a little time as much as ten or more. Many girls support themselves by painting on enamel, or by engraving, and almost every member of a family contributes a portion towards the common stock. Upward of 100,000 watches are manufactured annually by the 6000 workmen engaged in the business. The town has besides 60 goldsmiths' shops. Trinkets and jewelry are nowhere so cheap as in Geneva. A good journeyman earns from 30 to 40 francs a week. Division of labor is carried to a great extent, since about 80 different machines unite their labor in the production of a watch. Perhaps there is no provincial town in Europe having a greater amount of wealth. I have seen an estimate made by one of the bankers, which gives eighty-one millionaires in a population of less than 60,000, the inhabitants of the Canton."—Eclectic.

TO MARTIE.

BY H. L. ATHERTON.

Come home to me!
 I've watched for thee,
 And my heart is weary with waiting long;
 The moonlight falls
 On our cottage walls,
 But I hear not, as erst, thy familiar song.

Have I watched in vain?
 Shall I never again
 Hear thy light, quick step on our cottage floor?
 Will thy soft, low voice
 Make our hearts rejoice,
 And thy presence cheer us, nevermore?

Will thy footsteps free
 Never stray with me,
 To gather bright flowers to wreath thy brow?
 Loop up thy hair,
 With its ringlets fair,
 For thou art a wife, and a mother, now!

Let thy baby rest,
 As now, on thy breast:
 Thou mayst look on her with a mother's pride;
 And thy fond eyes gaze
 On the noble face
 Of him who now walks by thy side.

He is good and true—
 O, joy to you!
 Though you have left us, our sister-band:
 We may never tell,
 For we loved thee well,
 How we miss at home thy busy hand.

Let the little bird,
 Who thy glad voice heard,
 And flew from heaven to cheer thy home;
 Let her leave a place,
 For each loved one's face,
 In thy heart, when the olden memories come.

Let no care-cloud now
 Hover over thy brow,
 For care makes wrinkles, people say;
 But sunshine shed
 Round Joshua's head,
 Thy smiles will brighten the darkest day.

THE CAPTAIN'S DAUGHTER.

BY JOHN H. UNDERWOOD.

On a fine morning in the month of October, the large clipper ship White Swan, commanded by Captain Edward Morton, and bound to Calcutta, was standing out of Boston harbor under topsails and courses. The active crew were busily at work, loosing topgallantsails, royals, jibs, and staysails, in obedience to the rapid commands of the pilot; and the deck presented the usual scene of direful confusion, inseparable from an outward bound vessel just leaving port.

The commander of the ship, a fine-looking man somewhat past the prime of life, stood beside the weather mizzen rigging engaged in conversation with a young gentleman who had taken passage in the ship, hoping that his health, which had been considerably impaired by dissipation and a free indulgence in fashionable vices, might be restored by a sea voyage. A lovely maiden, apparently about seventeen years of age, leaned upon the captain's arm and gazed with great interest upon the scene around her, and the busy operations of the crew on deck and aloft. She was the only daughter of Captain Morton, who was a widower, his wife having died when their daughter was but an infant. He had never married again, but had bestowed his individual affection upon Cora, whom he almost idolized. Until the present time, she had remained at various seminaries and academies during her father's absence at sea; but, feeling unable to be longer deprived of her presence, he had at length decided that she should accompany him upon his next East India voyage.

Foremost among the crew in springing aloft, or laying out upon the yards at the pilot's command, was a handsome, athletic youth, whose whole appearance indicated that he was infinitely superior, in every respect, to seamen in general; while his graceful and easy bearing was such as to warrant the belief that he had been accustomed to society far more refined than that of a ship's fore-castle—and yet his intelligence in comprehending the pilot's orders, and promptness and skill in obeying them, proved him to be "every inch a sailor."

He had already attracted the notice of Captain Morton, who had pointed him out to his passenger, Mr. Atherton, as a fine specimen of the young American sailor. Cora, also, had observed him, as she came aboard the ship and had scarcely lost sight of him during the passage down the harbor. But it was neither his handsome figure and classic features, nor his graceful and agile motions as he passed from one portion of the rigging to another, that caused her to regard him so constantly and with such evident interest; for as she gazed after him, as he ascended the rigging with a firm and confident tread, an expression of doubt and perplexity passed over her fair countenance, as if she had recognized in the young sailor a familiar acquaintance, and yet was at a loss to account for his appearance at that time and place.

Such was indeed the fact. The young man's features, even at a distance, seemed familiar to Cora, and only the sailor's dress which he wore, caused her to doubt his identity with the person whom he so closely resembled for a single moment; but when the order was given to loose away the mizzen-topgallantsail, and the young sailor bounded aft to obey it, passing close by the side of Cora, and her eyes met his for an instant in a quick glance of recognition, all doubt immediately vanished; for in him she recognized a former schoolmate for whom she had entertained a strong friendship, and a bright blush suffused her cheek at the thought of his probable motives in joining her father's ship in the capacity of a foremast hand.

At length the pilot left the ship, under full sail, and shortly afterward she had sunk the last point of the familiar coast astern, and was fairly at sea. Cora soon retired below to escape the bustle and confusion of the deck, and ere many hours, had begun to experience the prostrating effects of that terror of ocean voyagers—le malade du la mer. Several days passed before she was able to appear again on deck; but in the meantime she had received, through the steward, a note from the young sailor whose real name was Henry Bernard, but who had shipped under the alias of Frank Wilson, begging her to grant him an interview at the earliest possible opportunity, that he might explain to her his motives in becoming a sailor on board the White Swan, and informing her that such an interview might be secretly arranged by the assistance of the steward. He also requested her to keep his secret, and not by word or look betray to her father the fact that she had ever known him.

This note created a strange tumult in the young girl's bosom; but it did not, in the least, displease her. She had known Henry Bernard for two years, and had perfect confidence in his honor; and, although she could not fail to comprehend that he had joined her father's ship on her account, and that such a course looked very much like a tacit declaration of love, she answered his note and consented to grant him the desired interview at the earliest possible opportunity.

Henry Bernard had been a student at the same academy with Cora Morton for the past two years; but no one, either among the faculty or his fellow-students, knew anything of his antecedents. His manner was somewhat reserved, and he had never spoken, even to Cora, of his family connections. Many of his schoolmates attributed his reserve to pride, and disliked him accordingly; but between Cora and himself the warmest friendship had always existed. They had been drawn together by that mysterious instinct which enables one to recognize a congenial spirit upon the briefest acquaintance, and their friendship had daily strengthened, as their intercourse grew more and more familiar. But although they had become strongly attached to each other, Henry had never spoken to Cora of love; and perhaps neither had ever realized that their's was anything more than a common friendship.

As soon as Cora was able to come on deck, she found opportunity for a private interview with Henry Bernard, and eagerly listened to his explanation of the causes which had led him to leave his studies and become a common sailor. He informed her that he had never known the nature of his attachment to her until after their separation; that he had then discovered that he loved her with his whole heart and soul, and could never be happy without her. Previous to his acquaintanceship with her, he had made one sea-voyage—intending to follow the sea as a profession; but his father had desired him to first pursue his studies until he had fitted himself for entering college, promising that, when he had done this, he should be allowed to carry out his original intention if he still desired it.

He had nearly finished his preparatory course of study, when Cora departed from the school; and he immediately resolved to become a sailor on board her father's ship, under an assumed name, where he could enjoy the happiness of seeing his beloved Cora every day, and of being able to protect her in time of danger. He said much more than this, but we have neither time nor space for a detailed account of that stolen interview upon the lee side of the White Swan's quarter-deck, and will briefly state its results.

Before the maiden again retired to her stateroom, she had confessed her love to Henry Bernard; and, with the blue rolling waves of the Atlantic around them, and the star-spangled canopy of heaven above, the youthful lovers had exchanged vows of eternal devotion and constancy. It was resolved, however, that nothing of this should be known to Captain Morton, who, as Bernard well knew, would regard with scorn and indignation the presumptuous sailor who had dared aspire to the love of the daughter of his captain; and ere the lovers separated, a system of correspondence and frequent private interviews had been duly arranged.

The White Swan had been nearly two weeks at sea, and was fast approaching the vicinity of the stormy Bermudas, when a violent gale arose which lasted for several days. On the fourth day, however, the wind abated to a considerable extent; and during the afternoon, Cora, who had been confined below by the severity of the weather, ventured on deck. Mr. Atherton, the passenger of whom we have previously spoken, immediately seated himself by her side and exerted all his conversational powers—which were considerable—in the hope of making a favorable first impression upon the innocent and susceptible girl; for he had become deeply enamored of Cora at first sight, and had resolved, with all the intensity of his powerful will, to win her before the voyage was ended.

The ship had been scudding, for several days, under a close-reefed main topsail, foresail and spanker; but now the wind had fallen considerably, although the waves still rolled mountains high, and Captain Morton decided to set the fore and mizzen topsails with a close reef in each. An order to this effect was given, and several of the watch hastened aft to loose the mizzen topsail. Among them was Henry Bernard, and as he passed by the side of Cora, a meaning glance was exchanged between the lovers, which, although unobserved by the captain, was not lost upon Mr. Atherton, who instantly resolved to watch the young sailor, henceforth, with an eagle eye—hoping to make some discovery which would result in his own benefit.

Soon after this, Cora arose from her seat, and carefully holding by the life-lines stretched aft, crossed the deck to the head of the companion-way stairs, when she grasped a railing for support, and stood for several minutes gazing in admiration upon the wild scene around her.

Mr. Atherton followed her, and courteously offered her the support of his arm, which she politely declined—for she felt toward him already an instinctive aversion—whereupon he walked hastily forward and joined Captain Morton at the break of the poop, where the latter was engaged in giving orders in regard to setting the topsails.

Suddenly, through the carelessness of the helmsman, a huge wave, which had towered for a moment above the weather-quarter of the vessel, burst upon the deck, and swept athwart ship with resistless force. At that moment Cora had been looking in the opposite direction; and the roar of the billow, as it fell upon the deck, startled her so much that she let go her hold upon the railing of the companion-way, and the briny flood instantly swept her to leeward. In another moment she would have been dashed into the foaming sea, had not a strong arm encircled her waist, and drawn her quickly inboard. Henry Bernard had been descending the rigging at the moment when the wave came aboard, and had nearly reached the deck, when he beheld the fearful peril of his beloved Cora. With a single bound he was at her side, and, grasping the mizzen shrouds with one hand and embracing her slender waist with the other, was able to resist the force of the torrent until it had emptied itself again into the sea from the lee side, when he immediately conducted her to the companion-way.

Both Captain Morton and Mr. Atherton had observed Cora's danger just as Henry Bernard sprang to her rescue; but, being at a distance from her, neither of them could have rendered her the slightest assistance. As the young sailor, after receiving the whispered thanks of Cora and a warm pressure of her hand, was about to hasten forward, Captain Morton stopped him and expressed his gratitude for the inestimable service he had just rendered him in saving his daughter from a watery grave—promising him that he should be rewarded, at a future time, with something more substantial than words.

The young man modestly declared that he had done nothing more than his duty required, and that the consciousness of having saved Cora's life was, of itself, an ample reward. He soon left the quarter-deck, and, as he turned to depart, he caught the eye of Mr. Atherton fixed upon him with an unmistakable expression of hatred and malice, which evidently boded him no good. At first, he was at a loss to comprehend the cause of this enmity toward himself; but suddenly a suspicion of the truth flashed upon his mind, and he immediately decided that Atherton desired to win the affections of Cora Morton, and was angry because another had rendered her a service which must entitle him to her gratitude and esteem.

One hundred and ten days had elapsed since the White Swan sailed from America, when the welcome sight of the lowlands about the mouth of the Hoogly River gladdened the eyes of her passengers and crew. As she approached the Sangor light-ship, a pilot was taken aboard from one of the brigs which are constantly cruising in the vicinity of the Sand Heads, and, at his suggestion, the ship's ensign was immediately set at the starboard foreyard arm, as a signal for a steamer; for the wind was blowing directly down the river, and it would be difficult, as well as dangerous, to attempt to beat up to the city.

In a few hours more, the ship was ploughing the sacred waters of the Hoogly in the wake of a powerful iron steamboat; and on the afternoon of the third day after she had entered the river, she was lying, securely moored, in the swift running river, nearly opposite the dry-docks of the East India Company in the city of Calcutta.

Here she remained for nearly two months; and as seamen were in great demand at that time, and wages were unusually high, her entire crew, with the exception of Henry Bernard, and all her officers, except the chief mate, deserted the ship. Captain Morton did not immediately ship another crew, as he preferred waiting until the ship was ready for sea; and in the meantime a crew of Lascars, or native seamen, were set at work aboard, while Henry Bernard, who had proved himself well worthy of the post, was elevated to the rank of second mate. This was a most fortunate event, as, by making him an inmate of the cabin, it enabled him frequently to have intercourse with Cora upon terms of familiarity and equality. During the outward passage, the lovers had held frequent secret interviews; but, as yet, Captain Morton had not the slightest suspicion of the relations existing between them.

Mr. Atherton, however, had watched them with a jealous eye, and had at length discovered their secret. The knowledge that they were betrothed lovers, however, only encouraged him to pursue with the greater energy his designs upon Cora; for he knew that she wished to conceal her love for Henry Bernard from her father, and, by threats of exposure, he sought to gain unlimited power over the innocent and virtuous girl.

In this he was to some extent successful, for when Cora discovered that he knew of her frequent interviews with Henry Bernard, the fear of exposure compelled her to treat him less coldly than she had formerly done, while it increased the feelings of scorn and aversion which she had previously cherished against him.

Atherton was a self-willed, unprincipled man, and did not scruple to use his power to the fullest extent; but he had never yet dared to openly avow his passion to Cora, who hated as well as feared him.

One Sunday afternoon, while the ship remained at Calcutta, the captain and his mate went ashore, leaving the ship in charge of Henry Bernard. Cora chose to remain aboard, and, as soon as her father had left the ship, retired to the after-cabin to spend the afternoon in reading. Bernard, whose duty required him to remain on deck, had seated himself beneath the quarter-deck awning with a cigar; while the custom-house officer, who was compelled by the regulations of the port to remain constantly upon the ship, had thrown himself into a hammock in the fore-castle, for a comfortable siesta. No other person besides these three was aboard; for Mr. Atherton spent the greater part of his time in the city, being sometimes absent from the ship for many days at a time. On this occasion, however, he had met Captain Morton and his mate in Tank Square, and being somewhat intoxicated, had immediately resolved to pay a visit to Cora in her father's absence.

He reached the ship and entered the cabin, unobserved by the second mate, and was soon engaged in conversation with Cora, who at once perceived that he had been drinking, and wished to escape from his presence; but dared not arouse his anger by so doing, lest he should fulfil his threat of exposure.

But at length the tone of fulsome flattery in which he had at first addressed her, changed to one of gross insult, and with flashing eyes and crimsoned cheeks, she arose and was about to leave the cabin in virtuous indignation, when he suddenly grasped her arm, and placing his hand upon her mouth to stifle her cries, attempted to kiss her. Cora struggled violently in his grasp, but could not prevent his odious caresses; and she was upon the point of fainting from the combined effects of terror and indignation, when Henry Bernard suddenly entered the cabin. He stood for a moment paralyzed with astonishment, then as he comprehended the position of matters, he sprang upon Atherton, and with one well-directed blow, laid him prostrate and insensible upon the floor. Then, clasping the almost fainting form of Cora in his arms, he bore her to a sofa.

Atherton soon recovered from the effects of his fall, and as he rose to his feet, he exclaimed, with a fearful oath:

"You, Miss Cora, shall bitterly repent the events of this afternoon. Your father shall know of your disgraceful connection with one of his servants. As for you, sir, we shall meet again." And he hastily left the ship.

When Captain Morton returned from the city, he was informed by Cora, of the insult which Atherton had offered her, and the service which Henry Bernard, or Frank Wilson, which was the name by which he was still known to all save Cora, had again rendered her in protecting her from the assault of the villain.

Burning with rage, Captain Morton immediately returned to the city to demand the satisfaction due him from Atherton; but the libertine had proved himself a coward as well as a villain, for he had disappeared, leaving, however, a letter to Captain Morton, informing him of his daughter's attachment to his second mate. After vainly seeking the scoundrel at the various places to which he was accustomed to resort, the captain returned to the ship, and demanded of Cora, if the intelligence contained in Atherton's letter were true. With many blushes, she confessed that it was, and informed him of the manner in which she had become acquainted with Henry Bernard.

"You did wrong, Cora, to conceal this from me," replied her father. "However, I have no cause to consider the young man unworthy of you. I esteem him highly, and if he shall prove to be a son of respectable parents, and of good reputation himself, I shall offer no opposition to your union, at a future time. I have always wished that you might become the wife of a sea-captain, and when Bernard shall have attained to this position, which he will doubtless be able to do in a few years, he shall receive your hand in marriage."

This unexpected approval of Captain Morton, which was immediately communicated to Bernard, completed the happiness of the youthful lovers, and for a time the "course of true love" did, indeed, "run smooth."

Nothing was heard of Atherton, during the remainder of the White Swan's stay at Calcutta. Fearing the wrath of Captain Morton, he kept closely concealed, and at length, after being loaded with a valuable cargo of East India goods, and manned with an efficient crew, the ship set sail on her homeward passage.

She made a quick passage from the Sand Heads to the Cape of Good Hope, and Captain Morton hoped to hold the south-east trades as far as the equator in the Atlantic Ocean; but the ship had scarcely reached the cape, when she experienced a succession of northerly and north-westerly gales which drove her far out of her course.

In the meantime the mate had, by some means become suspicious of mutinous designs on the part of the crew, and having informed the captain of his suspicions, the latter took the precaution to have a stock of weapons prepared for use and placed in readiness for an emergency. The mate continued to watch the men closely, but, at length, observing no further indications of a spirit of insubordination, began to think that he must have been mistaken; when, suddenly, during the middle watch of a dark night, the entire crew rose in open mutiny, and rushing aft, had nearly succeeded in entering the cabin, for the purpose of murdering or securing the inmates.

They would have certainly accomplished their designs, had not Henry Bernard, who held the watch on deck, succeeded in reaching the cabin a little in advance of the mutineers, and securely barricading the doors. The captain and other mates and the steward were soon aroused, and armed for a vigorous defence. The mutineers labored under the disadvantage of having no fire-arms, having neglected to provide themselves with such, not anticipating the slightest difficulty in overpowering the few persons aft.

Captain Morton and his officers soon made sad havoc among the ranks of the mutineers with their fire-arms, and at length, desiring to bring the combat to a close with as little bloodshed as possible, threw open the cabin door and armed with heavy cutlasses, charged with irresistible force upon the mutineers. Taken completely by surprise, they were unable to defend themselves, and in a few minutes those who had thus far escaped without injury, threw down their arms in submission, and when Captain Morton requested all who were willing to return to their duty on condition of a free pardon, to step aft, every man who was able to walk responded to the call.

The men declared that they had been incited to mutiny by a man who had hired them to join the ship at Calcutta for the express purpose of murdering the captain and his officers. This man had been concealed in the fore-castle from the time the ship sailed, until the attack had been made upon the cabin, when he had led them on. He had been shot dead during the melee, however, and his body was now lying beside the mainmast.

A lantern was immediately brought, and as Captain Morton and Henry Bernard bent over the body of the dead ringleader, they recognized the form and features of Atherton, who had thus sought to be revenged upon them, but who had so speedily met a righteous doom!

The bodies of the dead were hastily thrown into the sea without form or ceremony, and this task had scarcely been accomplished when a violent squall caught the ship suddenly aback, carrying away the foremast by the board, as well as the fore and mizzen topmast, and laying the ship upon her beams ends!

Exertions were promptly made to clear away the wreck, and by relieving the ship of the pressure of the sails which still remained upon her, to cause her to right; but all to no avail. The waves were making a clean breach over her, and it was soon discovered that she had sprung leak, and was rapidly filling.

There was no alternative left but to get the boats overboard with all possible haste, and trust to them for escape from certain death. The late mutineers, awed and subdued by the presence of imminent danger, worked like brave men in obedience to the captain's orders, and the jolly-boat, launch and long boat were soon afloat, and supplied with provisions.

The ship was sinking rapidly, and there was no time to lose; but when Captain Morton requested Cora to leave the ship in the first boat, she firmly refused to do so, declaring that she should remain upon the ship until her father and her lover were ready to leave it. All entreaties were alike unavailing; and accordingly the long boat and launch filled with men, were sent off, while only Captain Morton, Cora, and Bernard, and one of the crew remained upon the ship, designing to leave it in the jolly-boat. A supply of provision and water was hastily placed in the boat, and when all was ready, Captain Morton leaped into the boat for the purpose of assisting Cora in her descent over the ship's side; while the foremast hand who had been left behind, took his seat in the stern sheets to fend the boat off from the ship.

At this moment the boat goes high above the ship's rail, upon a huge wave, then it descended swiftly into the trough of the sea, snapping the lines which held it to the ship, as if they had been packthread, and in another moment it was rapidly receding from the sinking vessel. With a cry of agony, Captain Morton sprang to the oars in the hope of being able to pull back to the ship; but, in spite of all his efforts, the jolly-boat was urged further and further in the opposite direction, and at length he threw down the oars, and fixed his despairing gaze upon the ill-fated ship, whose deck was now on a level with the surface of the water.

Cora and her lover stood at the weather gangway clasped in each other's embrace, and at the sight, the grief-stricken parent covered his face with his hands, and sunk down in the boat, almost bereft of reason. At length he cast his eyes once more in the direction of the doomed vessel, and beheld his daughter waving her hand to him in token of eternal farewell. At this moment the bows of the water-logged ship reared high in air; then she rolled heavily to windward, and, with one headlong plunge, disappeared forever in the depths of ocean.

The wheel of Time is ceaselessly revolving; and whether the passage of the years brings us joy or sorrow, they are ever speeding by, to disappear one after another in the abyss of the past. Eighteen months had elapsed since the loss of the White Swan off the Cape of Good Hope, and Captain Morton, who, after spending many weary days and nights in the open jolly-boat, had been picked up by a homeward bound American ship, and carried back to his native land, had partially recovered from the first violence of his grief at the sad fate of his beloved daughter; but the settled melancholy which had now become habitual to him, gave evidence that his sorrow was still deep and heartfelt.

Shortly after his return to America, he had been appointed to the command of another ship by his former owners, and had sailed for China. During his homeward passage, his ship sprang a leak; but not wishing to put into any port, he continued on his course, keeping his pumps going nearly half the time, and carrying but a short spread of canvass. The passage under such circumstances, was, of course, long and tedious; and ere the ship had reached the equator in the Atlantic Ocean, the provisions and water had become so nearly exhausted that Captain Morton had found it necessary to put the crew upon short allowance, which, added to the constant labor of pumping rendered their situation extremely unpleasant.

After this time a vigilant lookout was constantly kept by night and day, in hope that some outward bound ship might approach within sight of their signals, from which a supply of provisions and water might be obtained. At length the welcome cry of "Sail ho!" was given one morning from the mast head, and in answer to the captain's questions, the lookout man described her as a square-rigged vessel, standing directly towards them. In a few hours the hull of the stranger was visible from the deck, when a signal of distress was set upon Captain Morton's ship, and in answer to which the stranger kept off a point and bore down to his relief.

As the ship ranged up alongside, the mainyards of both were braced aback, and Captain Morton, springing into the mizzen chains with his speaking trumpet, thus hailed the stranger, which had proved to be a large clipper ship, bearing the American ensign at her spanker peak.

"Ship ahoy! What ship is that, pray?"

"The Golden Fleece—Captain Bernard—twenty days out from New York, and bound to Melbourne. What ship is that?"

"The Amazon—Captain Morton—homeward bound from Canton, in a leaking condition, and short of provision. Can you furnish us a supply?"

"Ay, ay, sir. Will you come aboard?"

"Ay, ay, sir." And turning to the mate, Captain Morton ordered him to have the gig manned and got ready for lowering.

As soon as the boat was in readiness, the captain stepped into it, and gave the order to lower away. In a few minutes he was alongside the Golden Fleece, whose commander stood at the gangway to receive him. In the excitement of the moment, Captain Morton had not heeded the name of the captain of the Golden Fleece; but as he ascended the gangway ladder, and met him face to face, he almost lost his hold upon the man ropes, and came near falling back into the boat paralyzed with astonishment.

"Frank Wilson!—Henry Bernard!—is it possible? Can the sea give up its dead?" he exclaimed.

"I am Henry Bernard, once your second mate, sir," replied the young man, as he grasped the captain's hand.

"And Cora? Is she too alive, or am I dreaming?" murmured Captain Morton, as he gazed in Bernard's face in perfect amazement.

"Please come with me into the cabin, sir," was the reply. And Captain Morton mechanically followed the commander of the Golden Fleece into the luxurious cabin.

At his entrance, a beautiful woman, who had been seated upon a sofa with a lovely babe in her arms, sprang up to meet him; and the next moment he had clasped his loved and long lost Cora to his bosom, and was weeping like a child.

We will not attempt to describe the happy reunion of the father and daughter; but will pass on to an explanation of the manner in which Cora and her lover had been preserved from death when the White Swan went down, and a brief account of their subsequent adventures.

When the ship sunk, they were carried down with it, locked in each other's embrace, but succeeded at length in rising to the surface, where Henry soon bound Cora and himself to a floating spar. Upon this fragile support, they were tossed by the stormy waves for nearly forty-eight hours; but, just as the last spark of hope had expired in their bosoms, were cast upon a low, sandy shore. With great difficulty they succeeded in drawing themselves upon the beach beyond the reach of the waves, and speedily recovered sufficient strength to enable them to examine the shore upon which they had been thrown.

To their great joy, they soon found at a little distance inland, a spring of water and an abundance of nourishing fruits. They knew not where they were, but Henry rightly concluded that they had been cast upon a point of the west coast of Africa.

No signs of inhabitants were to be seen, and after a vain search for the dwellings of human beings, they resigned themselves to their fate; and constructing a rude shelter, prepared for a Crusoe life, upon that desolate strand. They remained here for several months, subsisting upon the fruits and fish, which Henry provided by means of a rude net which he had constructed, and daily watching for the welcome sight of a sail upon the unbroken expanse of ocean, spread out before their dwelling.

At length a homeward bound English East Indiaman approached nearer than usual to the shore, and observing their signals, sent a boat to their rescue. The commander of the Indiaman kindly gave them a passage to England, and supplied their immediate wants upon their arrival. In the meantime Henry wrote home to his father, and promptly received an answer to his letter, containing a large remittance. Immediately upon the receipt of this he took passage for home with his wife—for he had married Cora directly after their arrival in England.

Up to this time they had, of course, heard nothing of Captain Morton and his crew, and had begun to fear that the frail boat in which he had embarked from the ill-fated White Swan had been overwhelmed in the waves; but upon their arrival in America, they learned that he had returned, and had sailed again for China. Letters were immediately despatched for Canton, informing him of the facts just related, but these did not reach their destination until he had sailed thence for home.

Soon after Bernard's return to America, his father—who was, by the way, a wealthy ship-owner—granted his earnest request for a ship, and placed him in command of the Golden Fleece, in which his wife accompanied him upon his first voyage. The cause of Bernard's concealment of his parentage and connection during his first acquaintance with Cora, and his subsequent conduct, was a romantic fancy which he had long cherished of winning a wife who could love him for himself alone. Hence his concealment of the fact that he was the son of a wealthy and influential man.

The Amazon was soon supplied with an abundance of provision and water from the Golden Fleece, and after a tender parting between the now happy father and his newly found children, the two vessels separated, and as each headed away upon her proper course, their ensigns were dipped thrice in token of amity, and a friendly farewell.

When the Amazon arrived at home, Mr. Bernard, the father of our hero, waited upon Captain Morton, and offered him a partnership with him upon equal terms, if he would relinquish the active duties of his profession. The captain was greatly surprised at this proposal, and frankly informed Mr. Bernard that such an arrangement would scarcely be a just one, as he himself had no capital whatever.

"Never mind that, captain," replied Mr. Bernard. "Your experience and knowledge of ships will fully offset the capital which I shall employ. Besides this, it will give me great pleasure to be associated in business with the father of my son's wife, whom I have already learned to love as a daughter."

At length it was decided that the proposed arrangement should be carried into effect, and the new firm was immediately established under the name of Bernard & Morton.

The Golden Fleece made a remarkably quick voyage, and when she returned to America, Mr. Bernard endeavored to persuade his son to give up the sea, and embark in business ashore, so that the entire family might constantly enjoy the pleasure of each other's society. This he was unwilling to do. He made many voyages in the Golden Fleece, often accompanied by his wife; but at length, having acquired a competency, and having the prospect of a large fortune at the death of his father, he resigned his command, and took up his residence in a beautiful suburban villa, which he had recently purchased, where he resolved to spend the remainder of his life in the enjoyment of his otium cum dignitate.

The firm of Bernard & Morton continued to prosper to an extraordinary degree, and shortly after Henry gave up the duties of his profession they too retired from business, and took up their abode with their dutiful children, the student-sailor and the CAPTAIN'S DAUGHTER.

FROLIC OF FOOTE.

This celebrated humorist, while educating at Worcester College, Oxford, found in the head of it, Dr. Gower, a highly suitable subject for one of his droll devices. Observing that the rope of the chapel bell was allowed to hang near the ground, in an open space where cows were sometimes kept for the night, he suspended a wisp of hay to it, and the consequence was that some one of the animals never failed to seize the hay before morning, and so produced a most unseasonable and mysterious ringing of the bell. A solemn consultation took place for the elucidation of the portentous circumstance; and Gower having undertaken, with the sexton, to sit up all night for the purpose of catching the delinquent, disclosed the nature of the jest by pouncing out upon the poor cow, and had the hearty laugh of all Oxford to reward him for his pains.—Examiner.

THE AMERICAN FLAG.

When Freedom from her mountain height
Unfurled her standard to the air,
She tore the azure robe of night,
And set the stars of glory there.—DRAKE.

HOW TO IMPROVE THE MEMORY.

What we wish to remember, we should attend to, so as to understand it perfectly, fixing our attention specially on its most important and distinctive features. We should disengage our minds for the moment from other things, that we may attend effectually to that which is before us. No man will read with much advantage, who cannot empty his mind at pleasure of other subjects, and does not bring to the author he reads an intellect neither troubled with care, nor agitated with pleasure. If the mind be filled with other matters, how can it receive new ideas? It is a good practice to improve the memory, and far better than making notes, or transcribing pages at the time, to read carefully, and after a lapse of some days, to write an abstract of what has been read. This will give us the habit of storing up for future use our immediate acquisitions in knowledge. Again, memory is assisted by an orderly arrangement of the thoughts. It is obvious that in recollecting a speech or discourse, that is more easily recalled in which the argument proceeds from one step to another by regular induction. So we ought to conduct our studies; otherwise, memory will be defective.—Letter of Baron Alderson.

PRODUCTIONS OF FLORIDA.

A Florida correspondent of the Charleston Courier maintains that it is practicable to cultivate in that State all the tropical fruits and staples by the side of those belonging to a northern climate. He says: "All who may be skeptical on this subject can readily be convinced by a visit to the southern portion of the peninsula, where they can see the cocoa-tree, the banana, the plantain, the pineapple, the orange, the lemon, the lime, the arrowroot, the guava, etc., growing as luxuriantly as they do in any of the West India Islands. There is certainly no portion of the United States—North, South, East or West—that can compare with East Florida in the variety and value of its agricultural productions. It produces as well all the root and grain crops of the Northern and all the great staples of the Southern States."

LOOK OUT FOR THE HENS.

See that the hens are constantly supplied with lime in the form of old mortar, or pounded oyster or clam-shells, gravel, bones and meat. Charcoal is also a valuable article to have about the coop. There is no place they like so well as among the hay and straw in the barn; and to pick up the hay and other seeds about the floor and around the cattle. Fowls dislike damp places, and the cellar though warmer than rooms above, is not so good as a loft would be, where the sun could come in through windows in the roof, and which might be warmed in the coldest weather from a stove below. They require steady attention and care, and when they receive it, will afford as much profit for the outlay as any item of the farm.—American Farmer.

The best books are those which are written by men of the world, who are yet no worldlings. They have gathered the fruits of all human experience, without having lost the blossom of their own humanity.—Simms.

TO H—.

BY EDWIN S. LISCOMB.

Had hearts the power of glorious sight
To mingle with their throbs of joy;
To gather from each seeming night
Pure gleams unmixed with pain's alloy;

Then would that bosom dear to me,
A way beyond the purple hills,
Within my breast a radiance see—
A faithful beam despite the ills;

Then would that mutual life be born,
Of purest sympathetic love;
Affection's sweet, unauilted dawn
Would shed its rays from heaven above.

No mystery unread could bind
In painful thralldom one fair gem;
No common thought of heart or mind
A prison-house would 'habit then.

O, for the power to read and feel
Each tender, suffering, joyous thrill!—
To soothe the woe and share the weal,
As kindred sight our hearts should fill!

THE CAR ACQUAINTANCE:

—OR,—

THE TWO BITS OF PAPER.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

SEVERAL years ago, I entered a car at one of the New York stations, and took my place on the back seat. I looked at my watch, and found that it lacked fifteen or twenty minutes of the time to start. No one else was in the car, and unfolding a daily paper which I had just purchased of a newsboy, I commenced running my eye over its columns. The first thing that fixed my attention was the following paragraph:

"We understand that yesterday a young man employed as a clerk by Kendon & Browne in their extensive dry goods establishment, while on his way from ——— Bank, where he had been to get a check for $2000 cashed, was knocked down and robbed of the whole amount. He was spoken to by a man when about midway of a dark alley, who inquired the way to Wall Street, and that is the last he remembers. The man was of middling size, rather muscular, of grave demeanor, and well but plainly clad. The police are on the alert, and will, without doubt, succeed in capturing him."

I had barely finished reading it, when a man entered the car and took a seat by an open window, directly forward of where I was sitting. He came in at the front part of the car, which gave me a good opportunity to observe him. At the moment of his entrance, I saw that he regarded me with a quick, furtive look, yet, at the same time, so keen and searching, that the thought flashed into my mind that he might belong to the detective police, and that the inquisitorial glance with which he honored me had something to do with the robbery, an account of which I had been reading.

He was rather small, and his features were of a type which is commonly called handsome. At times, however, there was a certain curve or rather twist of his upper lip, which to me was absolutely repulsive. He bowed, as he was about to take his seat, and bade me good morning in a voice which, though not exactly unpleasant, had something in it to be remembered.

"Any news?" said he, after a minute's silence, turning half way round in his seat, and glancing at the paper I held in my hand.

"I haven't had much chance to ascertain yet," I replied. "I have only had time to read an account of a daring robbery which took place yesterday."

I said this, so that if he was really one of the police on the look-out for the perpetrator of the crime, or his accomplices, he might see that I didn't shrink from the subject. It seemed to me that he gave a nervous start at the mention of the robbery, but the movement was very slight, and possibly might, as I thought, have been owing to some other cause.

"Was it in this section of the country?" he asked.

"Yes, in this city. Would you like to read the account?" And I handed him the paper.

"Thank you," said he, with a smile.

But it was not a genuine smile, and as he commenced reading the account, it gave place to a look of ill-concealed anxiety. This passed away, by the time he had got through.

"They are cunning rogues, some of these thieves and pickpockets," said he. "He undoubtedly thought that a plain dress and sanctimonious air would put the youngster off his guard."

As he spoke, he scanned my dark, kerseymere waistcoat and plain brown coat with an air of great deliberation. I did not quail under the examination, though I became more confirmed in the opinion that he was a detective.

"Should this species of cunning," said I, in answer to his remark, "become pretty generally diffused among the light-fingered gentry, it may become necessary to sport diamond rings and gold chains, as badges of honesty."

"Or, in default of these, a little bogus jewelry," he replied, laughing.

In the meantime, most of the seats had been taken up. Not a person had entered, I am certain, who had escaped the vigilance of my colloquist. He had returned the newspaper to me, after which, being probably, as I thought, one of that class who are ill at ease unless they have something to employ their fingers about, he had busied himself with tearing into small bits a sheet of note paper, on which were written a few lines.

By the time the sheet of paper was reduced to fragments more or less small, few of which could have measured more than an inch in any direction, and were, as I observed, carefully retained in his left hand, it lacked only about two minutes of the time the train was to start.

He now began to fidget, moving backwards and forwards on his seat uneasily, and watched with increased eagerness every one who entered the cars. A few seconds more, and the train would be off. He now leaned back in a manner which seemed to me to say as plainly as words could have said: "The person I have been expecting wont come. It is of no use to look any longer."

The last moment had arrived, when the door of the car was once more thrown open to give entrance to a woman. The listless attitude into which he had suffered himself to sink was instantly abandoned, while the eyes of her who had last entered, after quickly scanning the tier of seats at her right, rested on the man who was sitting in front of me. At the same moment she raised her hand and pressed her forefinger to her lips. I was aware that this telegraphic sign was answered by my neighbor, though my attention being drawn towards her, I could not tell the exact manner.

She took the first vacant seat that presented itself, which was near the front part of the car, and without appearing to do so, I watched her pretty closely. I never saw her look round, or betray in any manner whatever that he was not an utter stranger to her between whom and herself the little pantomime had passed at the time of her entrance.

Previous to her seating herself, I had noticed that she was tall, and that her figure was good. I now saw that she wore a gray travelling-dress, and, without pretending to be much of a judge in such matters, it appeared to me that her apparel throughout, not forgetting the more minute details, was in good taste. But the view I had obtained of her face, impressed me less favorably. Without a single ill-shaped feature, as a whole, it struck me as peculiarly disagreeable; and except that there was a quick sparkle of her eyes at the moment she pressed her finger to her lips, it was utterly impassive.

About a mile from the station whence we started, the railway crossed a sheet of water, and when we had arrived about midway, the man in front of me put his hand out of the window, and threw away the bits of paper he had so carefully held, which, with the exception of two pieces, were scattered to the wind. These, without his being sensible of it, were wafted back into the car and fell on the unoccupied seat by my side. They were narrow, in some places not more than half an inch wide, and what was a little singular, an end of each matched the other, so that when placed together, they made a strip which, as I could tell by the outer edges, reached across the sheet of paper from which they had been torn.

One whole line of the writing was easily enough deciphered, though the upper edge of the paper was so deeply notched that there was not a single word from which one or more of the letters was not missing. Two or three of the closing words of the preceding sentence were at the beginning of the line of which nothing could be made. What came next, was better. "Do not," it said, "fail to be at ——— station by the morning train." Then came the next line, which was very imperfect. Those of the words which remained so nearly entire as to be guessed at, were as follows, a dash filling the places of such as were torn off: "If all right—roll brown paper—red twine."

My curiosity was more excited than ever, since the telegraphic signs had passed between my neighbor and the woman whose appearance he had looked for with such ill-concealed anxiety. At the same time, the opinion I had entertained that he might belong to the detective police had undergone a change, and I found myself forming conjectures as to whether he was not in some way connected with the grave looking personage who had committed the recent robbery. I therefore slipped the scraps of paper into my waistcoat pocket, lest, by a sudden turn of his head, he might catch sight of them.

I then busied myself with thinking the matter over, and came to the determination to keep a sharp look-out, when we arrived at ——— station, for some one with a roll of brown paper tied with red twine, which, according as I had construed the broken sentence, was to be the means of conveying to my neighbor in the car the intelligence that, as far as he was concerned, all was right.

My thoughts had been so busy, that we arrived at the station referred to in what to me appeared to be a much shorter time than usual. Here we should be obliged to wait from twenty to thirty minutes for the arrival of another train.

The man in the seat before me rose, the instant the cars stopped, and had reached the place where the woman still remained seated unimpeded by the crowd, which, by the time I had taken my carpet-bag from the hook where I had hung it, filled the passage. I kept my eye on him, and saw that he lingered a little when arrived at the place in question, in expectation, as I concluded, of some further communication from the woman, who had now risen, either by word or sign. He then made what haste he could to leave the car, while she appeared to be in no hurry to do so, suffering several persons to pass her, myself among the rest. I pushed forward as fast as possible, for I was in danger of losing sight of him who had so excited my curiosity, and was in season to see him step upon the platform. There were a number of loungers, among whom one, whose air was peculiarly careless and negligent, carried in his hand a roll of brown paper tied with red twine.

"How are you, Harker?" said he, with the heedless air of one who addresses another he cares little for, as my late neighbor stepped from the car.

Harker responded in the same careless way, calling him by the name of Scrimmons, and passed on in the opposite direction.

Just at this time, the woman who had been referred to left the cars, and, without any appearance of noticing either Harker or Scrimmons, entered a hack which drove to a hotel at no great distance.

Notwithstanding the little interest the two men appeared to take in each other, I continued to watch the movements of each. After loitering round a few minutes, seemingly with no object in view, except to kill time, the two, as if by chance, approached each other.

"Going in the down train?" asked Scrimmons.

"Yes," replied Harker; "are you?"

"I've not yet decided. It will depend—"

Here he lowered his voice, and then walked away, so that I lost the remainder of the sentence. During this time, I had opportunity to observe the personal appearance of Scrimmons, which, in some respects, corresponded with the description given in the paper of him who had committed the robbery. But he was not plainly dressed, nor was his demeanor grave. On the contrary, his appearance was careless and gay.

I had come to the conclusion to make known my suspicions to some one worthy of confidence, when I saw a man making directly for the spot where I stood. He nodded, when he had arrived near me, and I answered the unceremonious salutation in the same manner.

"I believe," said he, "that I saw you in the cars?"

"Very likely," I replied.

"Do you know the man who sat directly in front of you?"

"I do not."

"So I thought. You have two bits of paper in your possession," he said, after a pause of a few moments, "which were blown back by the wind when, with a handful of others, he made an attempt to throw them from the window of the car?"

"Pardon me, sir," said I, "but it appears to me that I am entitled to know who the person is who questions me so closely, before going any further."

"It is nothing more than reasonable, I grant. Perhaps you think I'm a friend of him alluded to?"

"You may be," I replied, "for aught I know to the contrary."

He smiled.

"I knew that you were not his friend, although you appeared to be on such friendly terms. The truth is, I have reason to suspect that he had something to do with yesterday's robbery."

"Then you are—"

"One of the police," he said, anticipating what I was going to say.

"Exactly the person I most wish to see. Here are the bits of paper." And I put them into his hand.

"Ah, 'twas a right move, my coming to this station!" said he, when he had read what little they contained. I hoped it would prove so, from a few scraps of information I picked up last evening. Yet, after all, it might have been of no use, if you, sir—what shall I call your name?"

"Grafton."

"If you, Mr. Grafton," he resumed, "had not preserved what most persons would have considered two worthless pieces of paper. I saw you put them into your pocket, and it occurred to me at once that as you thought them worth saving, they might serve as a clue to ferret out the real perpetrator of the crime; for I was satisfied, from the description the young man gave of him who robbed him, that this one was only an accomplice."

I mentioned to him the woman who had aroused my suspicion, and found that the signs interchanged between her and Harker had not escaped his attention.

We now parted, and in an hour afterward, Harker, Scrimmons, and the woman, who proved to be the wife of the former, were safely lodged in the county jail. Scrimmons, notwithstanding the great change he had effected in his personal appearance, was proved, when brought to trial, to be the man who had committed the robbery. Harker, it was found, had been his aider and abettor, not only as regarded the crime for which they were arrested, but in a series of burglaries which had been committed within the last six months; while his wife had afforded invaluable assistance by the ingenuity and adroitness with which she had secreted the stolen goods. The two thousand dollars—the fruits of the street robbery—were, with the exception of one hundred, found concealed in different parts of her clothing.

As to the two bits of paper which were wafted to me on the wings of the wind, they proved to be Sibylline leaves, in which was concealed, though there was no oracle to declare their mysterious meaning, my future fortune and the greatest happiness of my life. To prove this, it is only necessary for me to say that they were the means of introducing me to the notice of Kendon & Browne, who not long afterward gave me a share of their thriving and lucrative business.

Thus, as was very natural, I became acquainted with Miss Oliva Kendon, the only daughter of the senior partner of the firm, who, in due time, consented to be my partner as long as we both should live.

BEST SIDE OUT.

Some people have a happy knack for putting in a pleasant way everything that concerns themselves. Mr. A.'s son gets a poor place as a bank clerk; his father goes about saying that the lad has found a fine opening in business. The young man is ordained, and gets a curacy on Salisbury Plain; his father rejoices that there, never seeing a human face, he has abundant leisure for study, and for improving his mind. Or, the curacy is in the most crowded part of Manchester or Bethnal Green; the father now rejoices that his son has opportunities of acquiring clerical experience, and of visiting the homes of the poor. Such a man's house is in a well-wooded country; the situation is delightfully sheltered. He removes to a bare district without a tree; ah, there he has beautiful pure air and extensive views! It is well for human beings, when they have the pleasant art of thus putting things, for many, we all know, have the art of putting things in just the opposite way.—Liverpool Guardian.

COURAGE.

The brave man is not he who feels no fear,
For that were stupid and irrational;
But he, whose noble soul its fear subdues,
And bravely dares the danger nature shrinks from.
As for your youth, whom blood and blows delight,
Away with them!—there is not in their crew
One valiant spirit. JOANNA BAILLIE.

REAL LIFE ROMANCE.

The citizens of Columbus and visitors at the Capitol will recollect a beautiful young girl, apparently "sweet sixteen," who daily carried about the legislative halls and State offices a handsomely wrought basket containing the plumpest and sweetest oranges. O, yes! everybody remembers Ettie, the beautiful orange girl, and have wondered in what nook she has hidden for the past two months; for no more her sweet face and girlish form is seen in the Capitol, and interesting clerks, with a great admiration for the rotunda, are obliged to forego glimpses of the neatest gaitered foot tripping up the marble stairs.

Everybody about the State House admired Ettie, but it was with a respectful admiration, and if a gruff legislator was tempted to jest with the girl, or make light remarks, he was restrained by the modest demeanor and pure soul-look appealing from her heaven-blue eyes.

Ettie always brought a full basket and went tripping home with an empty one, and her scarlet silk purse filled with silver coin. She was the sole dependence of a widowed, palsied mother, and her noble efforts to keep away want were known, and made the fruit from her basket ten times sweeter.

When the great Union meeting of the Tennessee, Kentucky and Ohio Legislatures was held in Ohio's capitol, the beautiful orange girl was tripping about disposing of her fruit to the "sons of the South," and receiving the homage of admiring glances from all. At the end of one of the halls, viewing the noble row of princely residences on Third Street, stood alone a youthful member of the Tennessee Legislature, when he was startled by a silvery voice asking:

"Buy an orange, sir?"

"How do you sell them?" said the stranger, looking into her eyes.

"Five cents each," said the maiden, holding a large one toward him.

"Cheap."

"Indeed they are."

This introduction opened the way for a prolonged and serious conversation, in which the girl artlessly revealed to the stranger the poverty of her home, and the necessity of her supporting her sick mother. He was so struck with the girl's manly and singular beauty, that he secretly resolved to visit her home and become more intimately acquainted. He did so, and after successive visits won the confidence and love of the maiden, and the mother's consent to their marriage; and when he went back to his Southern home, it was with a promise to return in a fortnight for his bride. He came, and now the manly Southerner and the beautiful orange girl are man and wife. He has taken her, the fairest of the fair, to his Southern home, to dwell with him and her aged mother in opulence.—Cincinnati Gazette.

LOST.

BY MRS. R. B. EDSON.

Has any one seen our darling?
 He has strayed from our fold away;
 He went out with the sweet June roses,
 One beautiful summer day.
 And our hearts grew weary with watching,
 And our eyes grew heavy with tears,
 As the days and the months went silently
 Gliding into years.

I have called him with anguished pleadings,
 By a mound on the grassy lee;
 But only in dreams and in memories
 Does he ever come back to me.
 But I know when the great All-Father
 Shall summon me, too, away,
 I shall meet him, my beautiful angel,
 To be parted no more for aye.

THE MOUCHARD.

BY H. H. DE HAVEN.

ONE rainy night in a country inn, in Virginia, I heard the following narrative from the lips of a traveller—a white-haired old gentleman from one of the Northern cities.

A short time before the breaking out of our last war with England, I had occasion to make a voyage from New York to Liverpool. I sailed in the good ship American Eagle, John Garnet, master, in the month of June. For the first eight or ten days our voyage was a pleasant one. After that we had mostly adverse winds and a good deal of stormy weather, with one or two pretty hard blows.

One morning I happened to wake an hour or two before day, and I soon observed that there was from some cause or other, more commotion on deck than usual. While I lay speculating about the cause of it, I heard the report of a cannon at a distance. This induced me to turn out, get on my clothes and hurry up the companion-way. I found all hands assembled on the fore-castle, gazing at a fire, for which we were steering. It must of course be a burning vessel, for there could be no other combustible in mid-ocean. Minute-guns were firing in the same direction, as signals of distress.

As we were heading directly for the light, it soon began to grow larger and more distinct, and eventually, just as day was breaking, presented the outline of a large ship (large for that day) wrapped in flames, almost from stem to stern. The excitement now became very great, the question being whether we could reach the burning vessel in time to be of any service. Though we were moving through the water with great rapidity, the flames were advancing still more rapidly. The race was an exciting one, and possessed, of course, a terrible interest for the anxious beings whom we were striving to succor.

On the windward side of the vessel, just abaft the mizzen-mast, was a small space still uninvaded by the fire, and there all on board were huddled together. They were already suffering from the heat, and it was evident that in a very few minutes they must all be either burnt to death, or driven into the raging billows. To add to the difficulties of the case, there was a very high sea running at the time, and the process of transferring the sufferers from their own vessel to ours, must necessarily be a very difficult and dangerous one. Having laid our ship as nearly alongside of the burning mass as prudence would permit, all our available boats were put in requisition, and a call made for volunteers to man them. Nearly all the crew came forward, and a number of the passengers. It was only by extreme care that we managed to launch safely all our boats save one, which was swamped, in spite of all our efforts to prevent it. The boat in which I was, happened to be foremost. It was in charge of the first officer of our ship, and contained one other passenger, who, like myself had volunteered for the expedition. He was a very quiet young man, and I had hardly been aware of his existence until that moment. His name was Arthur Ernschaw.

The burning vessel proved to be the Penguin of New York, bound for Liverpool. We reached her in the very nick of time. A few minutes later, and all on board must have miserably perished. As soon as our boat came alongside, we saw the seamen of the other ship making preparations to jump into her, in advance of all the passengers; so many of them that they would probably have sunk the boat. This did not suit us at all, particularly as we saw a number of women and children in the crowd. The mate and one of his men each seized an oar in order to shove off again, and at the same instant I felt a pistol thrust into my hand, while a voice said:

"Shoot them, if they attempt it!"

I looked around, and saw the young passenger already swinging above my head. He had seized a rope, which was lying over the side, and in a few seconds he was on board, standing in the gangway, with a loaded pistol in his hand.

"Fall back!" he shouted, "fall back! If any one attempts to leave the ship before the women and children, I'll blow his brains out, so help me God!"

His determined look, his close-knit brow and flashing eye, even more than his words, caused the startled sailors to retire. By that time, the mate and several others had clambered aboard, and arrangements were speedily made for transferring the more helpless ones to the boats. It was a work of great difficulty and considerable danger. It would have been an arduous undertaking, even if conducted with extreme deliberation; but with the fire in the rear, the water in front, and fear and horror all around, it was truly a terrible task. I almost fancied that I could hear death's dark angel flapping his wings in the murky air.

But a few minutes elapsed before I had occasion to make use of the pistols which had been handed to me. Several sailors had managed to swim to the boat. I allowed them to rest a hand upon the gunwale, but pressed the muzzle of my weapon against the forehead of every one who attempted to come any further, and found the experiment successful. While I was thus engaged, a shriek of bitterest agony rang out upon the waters, rising high above the din around us. At the same instant a sullen plunge told that something had fallen overboard. I looked up and saw a beautiful girl frantically struggling to free herself from a number of men who held her. She was striving to leap in after her father, whose gray hairs were already mingling with the sea-foam, from which they could with difficulty be distinguished. He had fallen in as they were about to transfer him from the ship to the boat, and the remorseless waves had already borne him almost out of sight.

The excitement and confusion were at the highest, when I saw a tall figure run rapidly along the deck, and with a tremendous bound leap far out into the sea. It was our young passenger. The deed seemed truly a desperate one; but the young man possessed great powers of endurance of an extraordinary character, and he resolved to stake his life upon them. Most, perhaps all, of the spectators gave him up for lost. The impulse of his spring, with a few vigorous strokes, carried him to the spot where we had just seen the old man disappear; and there the gallant youth too disappeared, as if swallowed up in a yawning abyss. The next moment, however, we saw him reappear, and with the gray hairs clutched in his powerful grasp; but he was now far away from the ship, and apparently beyond the reach of human assistance. But his quick eye had noted that which had escaped every other observer. The second boat from our vessel was approaching the spot, directly on a line with the struggling pair. Seeing what had happened, they rowed with all the vigor they were capable of, and were barely in time to rescue them. Their almost lifeless bodies were immediately transferred to our boat, which soon afterwards started to return to the ship laden to the very water's edge with those whom we had saved from the flames. Though the distance was small, it was a tedious as well as a most perilous passage, and nothing but the admirable manner in which the boat was handled saved it from destruction. At last, however, we reached the ship in safety, disembarked our passengers, and then returned to the fire again.

With the exception of one poor woman, who was drowned, all the passengers and crew of the Penguin were transferred in safety to the American Eagle, and disposed of as comfortably as circumstances would allow. The old gentleman who fell into the sea, had been taken up in a state of insensibility, and had remained so for a long time; but he was at last resuscitated, and eventually restored to his customary state of health. His preserver was much exhausted, but needed nothing but rest to make him as well and strong as ever. This brave fellow was on his way to England, on some business of his father's. He had relatives in the old country, and indeed had spent most of his childhood in Yorkshire. He was an American, however, to the backbone, and as fine a specimen of the breed as any one could desire to see. His father was a resident of the Valley of Virginia.

The old gentleman who had so narrowly escaped a watery grave, was also an American, and a very weakly one—a retired merchant. He was on his way home, after spending some time in Europe with his daughter Fanny, his only child. She was a remarkably pretty girl, and as good as she was pretty. I have known her well from that day to this; I have never known a more excellent woman than Fanny Raye. She was then about nineteen, and a lovelier creature the sun never shone upon. Whether the tender plant of love can grow up, like a mushroom, in a single night, I will not undertake to say; but that it does grow with astonishing rapidity in some soils, and under favorable circumstances, cannot be denied. Of this truth, Arthur Ershawe and Fanny Raye were a notable example. The young man's noble conduct was rewarded by the warmest gratitude on the part of both father and daughter; and it was but a very little time before these sentiments grew into something warmer still on the part of the latter. As for Arthur, he already loved the sweet girl with his whole soul, while the grateful parent approved with the whole of his, so that it seemed probable that for once, at least, the course of true love would run smooth.

We had made Cape Clear, and were entering the Chops of the Channel, with a fair wind, when we were overhauled by a heavily armed sloop-of-war under British colors. We displayed the American flag, but she paid no attention to it, and proceeded to make signals for us to lie to. Sorely against our will, we were forced to lay our topsails to the mast, and wait for a boat-full of men who were sent to board us. It was a large boat, and there could not have been less than thirty or forty men in it. In the course of the war which soon followed, I made a cruise on board one of our crack privateers, and I did it solely for the purpose of making an effort to apply the tit-for-tat principle to the insulting and arbitrary proceedings of the British officers on the deck of the American Eagle that day. The individual in command of the party, was a red-nosed lieutenant, who had every appearance of considering himself an unappreciated Nelson. After examining our papers, he ordered Captain Garnet to muster his men. He flatly refused, telling the Englishman he would obey no such imperious commands, and that if he did anything contrary to his own free will, it would only be by compulsion.

After a great deal of bickering and fierce altercation, the crew and passengers were forced to appear on deck, and were examined separately by the lieutenant. He questioned them minutely, listened attentively to their pronunciation, and managed to make the discovery that nine of them were British subjects in disguise; and, strange to say, the ablest and best men invariably turned out to be of that class; the refuse of the ship's company only, being adjudged to be real bona fide American citizens. More than once during this perquisition, I had noticed the red-nosed man casting sharp glances at Arthur Ernschawe. After he had picked out from among the seamen all the individuals he wanted, he turned to young Ernschawe, and said:

"Young man, you look very much like an Englishman."

"Then my looks lie," retorted Arthur.

"Where were you born?"

"I was born in the State of Virginia, in the United States of America—though I can't imagine what business it is of yours."

"Eh, dear! you can't deceive me. You never got that North of England burr among the Yankees. No, no, my lad, you are as much of a Virginian as York Minster is—just about."

"I have relatives in Yorkshire, and I lived with them when I was a boy. But I am an American by birth, and I have not been out of the United States for twelve years."

"Gammon!"

"Look you, sir!" roared Captain Garnet. "I know Mr. Ernschawe to be an American gentleman of the highest respectability, as was his father before him. But even if he were an Englishman, subject to your villanous press-gang abominations, you could not seize one like him, without making yourself liable to the severest punishment. You know it well."

"I'll run all risks. This is a case of emergency, and we can't stand upon trifles. Clear the gangway and let's be off!"

"By Heaven!" shouted the captain, "if the odds was anything less than two to one, every plank of this deck should swim in blood, before you should leave it with that young man in your clutches. O, for a dozen Yankee tars for ten minutes only! I would give every dollar I am worth for that much of their time!"

"A horse! a horse! My kingdom for a horse!" Ha, ha, ha, ha! Take it coolly, my Yankee game-cock, and don't spoil your beauty by that cut-throat frown of yours."

It would have been easier for a volcano to "take it coolly." But there was no help for it all. They had to submit, and the red-nosed lieutenant carried off his prize. It was of such material that the war of 1812 was made. Seeing that the evil was inevitable, Arthur wisely forbore to struggle against it, though the parting from Fanny made it doubly bitter. I stood by the poor girl's side, as the sloop-of-war stood out to sea, and when she had disappeared, I fed Fanny below and left her with her father. Fortunately for our crippled crew, we had fine weather till we arrived in the Mersey. We made no stay in Liverpool, but posted on to London immediately.

I had become so much interested in these young people that I was determined to make an effort, however feeble it might be, in Arthur's behalf. There was at that time a gentleman in a high official position under the British government, to whom I had once rendered a material service. I had never asked any favor at his hands, but I now called on him, stated the circumstances of Ernschawe's case, and begged him to use his influence in his behalf. He assured me that he would do so, and that he had no doubt of being able to secure his discharge, with an indemnity, as soon as the vessel—the Greyhound—should return from the very short cruise on which she was bound.

The very next day after this interview, the news arrived that his Britannic majesty's sloop-of-war Greyhound had been captured by a French frigate, off Cape Finisterre, and all on board had been sent to Verdun as prisoners of war. This was a sad blow to all of us, and a terrible one indeed to poor Fanny Raye. We had felt so sure of Arthur's speedy release; and now he was pining in a French prison of the very worst character, where he might lie for years. It was very hard to bear.

The impressments had been made with the design of "cutting out" a French vessel from one of the channel ports. The prisoners, of course, were all taken for Englishmen, and all treated alike. Poor Fanny's grief moved me to the bottom of my heart, and at last I resolved, by way of doing something, to go to Verdun, and see if anything could be done to ameliorate our prisoner's lot.

The next day after forming this resolution, I started. Having reached the place, I proceeded to seek an interview with Arthur, and with some difficulty succeeded in doing so. He derived from this, however, no benefit except such as might result from the messages I bore him, and the money with which I supplied him. The latter, at least, was decidedly useful.

Having no ostensible rank on board the Greyhound, he was classed with the common sailors in prison, and treated like them in every respect. This was the great hardship of his case, and I tried my best to impress the real facts of the case upon the bull-headed commander of the post—but all to no purpose. He was a veteran martinet, with no more feeling than a piece of machinery. With a heavy heart I returned to Paris. Arthur's case had already been laid before the American Minister at the imperial court, Honorable John Armstrong, and I now called upon him in order to urge an immediate application to the emperor. But everything seemed to conspire to vex and baffle us. I was informed that Napoleon was absent on the frontier, and that it was very uncertain when he would return.

Dispirited and dejected in the extreme, I left the rooms of the legation and strolled slowly back towards my lodgings, hardly bestowing a glance upon the wonders of the capital, which under other circumstances, would have been objects of the liveliest curiosity. My nearest way was through that splendid thoroughfare, the Garden of the Tuilleries. The evening was warm, and I had been walking for some distance; I therefore sat down to rest, and watch the gay throng in the principal avenues. The seat I had taken was in a shady spot in a quiet corner. Except a few passing by occasionally, there was no one near me except a single individual, who was sauntering about under the trees. He wore a rather shabby, half-military looking costume, and had, I thought, rather a disreputable appearance. Being curious to know whether the dress he wore was a distinctive uniform, I asked a half-grown lad, who was passing at the time, if he knew who that man was.

"He's a mouchard," replied the boy, in a whisper.

It was almost the same thing as if he had said a devil. A mouchard is a spy of the police, and far more to be dreaded in Paris (particularly at that time) than Satan himself. But my skirts were clear, my passport perfectly en règle, and all the mouchards in France were nothing to me, unless they could do something for the benefit of poor Arthur. After a while, I ceased to observe the man, and fell into a painful reverie. My thoughts being thus occupied, I did not notice for some time that some one had seated himself beside me, and I was a little startled when I looked round and saw that it was the mouchard. Apparently, however, he did not observe me, but seemed like myself a moment before, in a "brown study." If this was a piece of acting, as I thought at the time, it was very good acting certainly; for when a movement of his arm threw down my umbrella, which I had left leaning against the bench, he looked up, gazed at me a moment, said "pardon!" and picked up the umbrella in the most natural manner possible. I cannot say that he was very polite—for a Frenchman, that is. Rather the contrary, indeed. But there was nothing constrained or artificial in his manner. Having looked at me very earnestly for a minute or more, he said:

"You are not a Frenchman?"

"No," replied I.

"An Englishman, I suppose."

"No, I am not an Englishman."

"You are an American then."

"Yes, I am from the United States."

"Are you going to have a war with England?" he asked sharply.

I told him I thought we would, and proceeded to give my reasons for thinking so. He went on questioning me with a fifty Yankee power of inquisitiveness, and, almost before I was aware of it, in declaiming against Great Britain, I told him all about Arthur, and our trouble with the Greyhound. It seemed naturally connected with the subject of our difficulties with England, and I did not feel that there was any necessity for making a secret of the matter. Still, I felt rather sheepish at having let out my story to a mouchard.

He listened with great apparent interest while I spoke of Arthur's noble conduct at the burning of the Penguin, and seemed to feel the injustice of the English officer almost as much as I did.

"You do not seem to be very fond of the British," I said, as I remarked this.

"No, I am not fond of the British," he replied; and the words came hissing through his teeth with an emphasis that left no doubt upon my mind of his sincerity.

"Why didn't you apply to the emperor?" he asked, abruptly, a few minutes afterwards.

"Because he is not here," said I, "and I don't believe it would make any difference if he was, for he is up to the eyes in business—raising a million men they say, to take them to Russia to get—"

"To get what?"

"Well, in my country they call it getting licked. I have done a very silly thing in speaking so freely; but I am not used to keeping a gag in my mouth, and I began the sentence before I thought how awkward it would be to finish it."

The man looked intently in my face for a minute or two. I think the word "lick," and my slipshod French together, bothered him. He said nothing, however, but abruptly walked away, leaving me to the very pleasant reflection that I had made a fool of myself. It was now getting dark in the shady spot where we were, and I soon saw that he had moved away only to get to the light. When he got away from the trees, he pulled out a greasy-looking pocket-book, and began to write something on a bit of paper. Having scribbled away rapidly for a minute or two, he came back and handed me the paper.

"The commandant at Verdun," said he, "happens to be an old friend of mine. If you will return thither, and hand him that paper, privately, it will probably be of some service to your countryman."

With these words he bowed stiffly, and then strode rapidly away, leaving me, as the French say, "planté là," staring after him with eyes (and mouth too, probably) wide open—ebahi, as any one of the passers-by would have called it. That this somewhat shabby-looking individual could have any influence over the stiff-backed martinet of Verdun, seemed too preposterous for serious consideration. What could the fellow mean?

The clattering of drums roused me from my reflections. It was the signal for guard-mounting, and warned me that it was time to leave. As I passed out of the nearest gate, I spoke to a sentry who had just been relieved, and asked him if he knew the man who had just passed through. It was my friend the mouchard, but it seems the soldier did not notice him. Stopping at the first lamp I came to, I examined the paper which he had handed to me. The contents could hardly be called writing. It was merely a confused jumble of marks, not unlike those made by a child who has never learned to write. What could be the object of such a mystification? I crushed the paper in my hand, and thrust it into my pocket, with a most unamiable feeling towards mankind generally, the English and French nations specifically, and the shabby, semi-military mouchard individually.

The next day I started on my return to London, where I arrived in due time, and gave an account of my bootless expedition. Poor Fanny was grievously disappointed, and though she said nothing about it, I could see that she did not agree with me in relation to the paper I had received. By persevering inquiries, I at length drew from her the admission that she had some faith in the truth of the mouchard's statement. She had an idea that he and the commandant might both be members of some oath-bound association of Free Masons, Carbonari, Illuminati, or something of that sort, and that one might be under some mysterious obligation to obey the other in any circumstances and at all hazards.

As the poor girl evidently derived some comfort from this fanciful theory, I not only did not oppose it, but told her I would test its genuineness, by returning to Verdun, and taking the scrawl with me. This I eventually did, and Fanny and her father accompanied me. With great difficulty we succeeded in obtaining an interview with the veteran commandant. It was with anything but alacrity that I entered his presence. Having no faith whatever in the mysterious paper, I felt assured that he would consider the presentation of it a deliberate insult, and what the consequences might be I did not like to conjecture.

After keeping us waiting a long time, the old fellow appeared, and it was not without some trepidation that I noticed that his stiff back was still stiffer, and his dark brow still darker than before. I told my story, described the man who gave me the paper, and then presented the paper itself, taking care at the same time, that there should be no obstacles between me and the outside door.

The war-battered veteran's face was a sealed book on most occasions, but the moment his eye lit upon the mouchard's hieroglyphics, the whole man underwent an instantaneous change. That the mysterious scrawl was no mystery to him, was abundantly evident; and that he was greatly moved by reading it was equally manifest. My excitement was hardly inferior to his; but it was all astonishment, pure and unadulterated.

"Monsieur," said he, in a whisper, "have a fleet horse in waiting for your friend, at midnight, at the bridge over the Meuse, on the road to Varennes. He shall be furnished with all necessary papers and passports. Let him cross the frontier with all possible despatch, hasten to the coast, and cross over to England. But, on your lives, breathe not a syllable of this to any one till you are out of France—and even then, the less you say about the thing the better."

With these words, the old soldier bowed us out. He seemed to be in an agony, lest the very walls should hear him, and pressed his finger to his lips more than a dozen times, while we were leaving him.

"I do believe Fanny was right, after all," said I, as soon as we reached the street. "There certainly is some kind of hocus pocus at the bottom of this. Who would believe that old Pipe-Clay there could be thrown into such a fermentation by anything—unless, indeed, it were a rusty firelock on parade, or some such unpardonable sin on the part of a soldier? But it is not much to be wondered at. The emperor will surely skin him alive if he finds it out."

"He is not likely to find it out, I think," said Mr. Raye. "He is entirely absorbed in his Russian scheme, they say."

To our immense delight, we met Arthur at the bridge at the appointed hour. He had been smuggled out of the prison, and escorted to the immediate neighborhood of the spot by the commandant himself. He had a passport, minutely describing his person as that of John Brown, an English merchant, travelling by way of Brussels and Ghent, to Ostend, and thence to London. They have in that part of the world (or had before railroad times) a mode of posting on horseback, called travelling a franc etrier, which is more swift than pleasant, decidedly. It suited Arthur, however, and he had determined to adopt it. A hasty embrace, a rapid shaking of hands, and he was off. We returned to our lodgings, and the next day retraced our steps to Paris, meeting no difficulties by the way, except such as resulted from being occasionally taken for English travellers. We were several times annoyed from this cause, in our journeyings in France, but the trouble was merely temporary.

Remaining one day in the French metropolis to rest and recruit, we went to see a grand review in the Champ de Mars; rather to get a sight of the great Corsican, however, than to witness the military pageant. By going early, we secured a favorable location, but we had to wait a long time before the emperor made his appearance. At last, we observed a great commotion among the crowd; hats and caps were tossed into the air, and shouts of "Vive l'empereur!" burst from thousands of tongues.

As the commotion and the cries rolled on, in the direction of the spot which we occupied, we saw a splendid cavalcade of generals and marshals of France, in brilliant uniform, come prancing down the lines. The warriors whose names were then filling all Europe with amazement and alarm, were many of them there, bedecked with towering plumes, and blazing with stars, and crosses, and jewels, and gold—"the pomp and pride and circumstance of glorious war."

In the very centre of this glittering galaxy, conspicuous for the plainness of his attire, and the absence of everything like pretension in his equipment, was one who was the observed of all observers. A single glance assured me that it must be "the man of destiny" himself; and yet, it was, beyond a doubt, the mouchard of the Garden of the Tuileries!

Yes, it was even so. He was dressed a little better, but in the same style; and the man himself, nobody who had seen him once would ever mistake. The idea of their identity had never occurred before to any of us, so completely impressed was I with the idea that the emperor was not in Paris at the time of our interview. He had returned, as I afterwards ascertained, but an hour or two before I saw him, and had strolled into a retired part of the garden, with his travel-stained, dust-covered apparel, which was absolutely shabby, and in the last degree un-emperor-like. The urchin who told me he was a mouchard was probably quizzing me. He had evidently been much interested in Arthur's story, and for reasons best known to himself, had determined to adopt a secret and summary means of liberating him. To show, even to a few humble Americans, his superiority in a matter of good feeling to the hated British, was no doubt one of his motives. The mysterious paper I suppose contained writing in cypher, which he often made use of, and which could of course be read by certain officials, to whom the key had been communicated.

Arthur soon rejoined us in London, and we all hastened back to the United States, for war with Great Britain was now considered a fixed fact. In that war, Arthur Ernschaw afterwaras bore no inglorious part, and at its close he and Fanny were married. We have been fast friends ever since.

I'M SAD TO-NIGHT.

BY WILLIE WARR.

I'm sad, ay, sad to-night,
 Though all around are gay,
 And on no brow amid the crowd
 A shadow seems to play.
 Rich music falls upon mine ear,
 And forms flit to and fro;
 Feet keep time in merry dance—
 My heart is filled with wo.

I've left the giddy throng,
 The ball-room's glare of light,
 And wandered to this bower
 Upon this festive night.
 The stars look down from heaven
 With sadness on me now,
 The beams of silvery moonlight
 Fall on my heated brow.

My heart is almost breaking,
 The tears refuse to flow;
 My eyes are dull and lifeless,
 My cheeks have lost their glow.
 I pine for thee, dear Arle,
 Amid these scenes of glee;
 Ah, leave that far-off land,
 "Come back, come back to me!"

THE GIPSEY QUEEN.

BY MRS. C. ELLIS HOWE.

In the summer of 1484, the valleys of Bohemia were the scenes of fearful conflicts and ruthless slaughter, and the Boehmer-Wald, glooming darkly in the distance, had witnessed the terrible collision of maddened foes, and had seen the glory of the summer day darkened by the smoke of burning hamlets, from the first flush of spring to the ripening of the golden grain.

The autumn wind swept down the ravines, and the sounds of war were borne on its wings to the remotest fastnesses of the land. The peasant gathered his sheaves in terror, the youth of the villages forgot the harvest merry-makings, and in the moonlit eves of October there were no songs, or dances, or joyful trysts beneath the oaks—but instead, there were tearful partings and silent prayers, and sadness in castle and cottage. Upon one of these moonlit eves, the light shone down upon an encampment of gipsies, who had pitched their tents in the shelter of one of the oak forests that skirt the Bohemian plains. The sun had set in fiery pomp, and the dark masses of cloud gathered low in the west, indicated a storm close at hand. From behind the Boehmer-Wald, which like some giant sentinel guarded the east, the moon rose up broad and red, and looked over the land.

It lit up the weather-stained canvass of the gipsy tents, and streaming in long rays into the gloomy woodland, revealed the strange, dark figures hurrying hither and thither, in busy preparation for their evening meal. As the wind swept through the oaks with stronger gusts and died away in long sobs through the glens, their activity increased—the men put their hands to the work, and the children ran fleetly from tent to tent. But of them there was one—a woman—who stood apart with folded arms, or strode haughtily and leisurely to and fro. She was of queenly presence and great beauty—tall, her figure perfect in its proportions and mould, her complexion olive, her eyes large, black, lustrous, now keef as an eagle's glance, and now soft and gentle with all a woman's tenderness. There were trouble and anxiety brooding now in their depths, and from time to time a wild, longing look would flit over her face, a crimson glow flush her cheek, and she would compress her lips together until the rosy curve was deepened to a vivid scarlet.

"Mother of the Zingari!" she muttered, in a suppressed tone, "this is the day, this the hour; but he comes not. Can it fail? Yon star yet proclaims the truth of thy prophecy, and yet—and yet he comes not."

She clenched her small hands together and strode more rapidly to and fro. She waved away a lad who crossed her path, and the child flew to his mother in fright.

Two swarthy women paused in their work and looked at her. "It is the queen's black day," said one to the other, in low tones. "If she fulfils not to-night the prophecy of the Zingara, the curse will fall upon her—ay, the curse!" And she gloated over the words with terrible emphasis.

"Let it come—let it come!" muttered the other. "Shall she—"

"Hist! she comes this way." And the two evil-eyed crones bent low over their work again.

The gipsy queen approached. "Denko," she called, in a voice as clear and sweet as the sound of a silver trumpet.

A lad of a dozen years came running up.

"Come with me, Denko," said the queen. "I go to the edge of yonder forest." She added: "Ere the moon lights the tree-tops at the foot of the mountain, I will return."

The band listened mutely, and when she was gone turned again to their supper and their jests. The queen and the lad moved on in silence, threading the forest mazes, crushing the dry leaves beneath their feet, and at last came to the edge of the woodland, and looked out over the broad plain. The queen listened. At first, the sighing of the wind through the trees was the only audible sound, but presently, to her practised ear, an echo broke the silence of the lonely woods. The queen eagerly threw herself upon the ground and placed her ear to the turf for a moment. Then she rose and joyfully swept back the long black tresses wet with night dews.

"Zingarella," she said, exultingly, "thou hast not failed me—lo, he comes!"

The metallic ring of hoofs upon the flinty road now became sharply distinct, and in another moment two horsemen cantered up the hill, their forms darkly outlined in the moonlight. Bidding the lad to remain quiet, the queen wrapped her mantle closer about her, and descending the sloping bank, passed into the road. Drawing up her regal form to its full height, she proudly awaited the coming of the horsemen. The moon veiled herself in clouds and dusky shadows fell upon the landscape. The horsemen came nearer, and still the queen kept her position. The clouds swept by, a flood of light fell upon field and road, and at that instant a panting steed was reined in with a strong hand, and a clear voice rang out with the words:

"St. Agatha protect us! What's this?" And the speaker gazed at the form before him. The gipsy queen slowly let fall the mantle from her head and shoulders, and stood calmly and radiantly beautiful in the moonlight.

"Once—twice—from shame and from death. This is the day. The Zingara foretold it—the stars proclaim it."

"By Heaven, it is one of the Zingari!" exclaimed the other rider. "A rare specimen, too, upon my faith as a Castilian. 'Twas a lucky star that shone over our birth, Rudolpho! Here, in this Bohemian wild, we encounter as much grace and majesty as often sits upon a throne."

"Nay, Don Roderigo," said the other, most courteously, "it is not meet to pour too lavish praise into fair ears. What would you, maiden? Would you read my destiny?"

"If you will, Sir Knight." The words were spoken in the smoothest Castilian, and with a precision of accent and emphasis that made the knight start and exclaim hastily: "You have seen the orange-groves of Spain, maiden, I trow. Why do I find you here in these troublous times, too fierce for even a Zingari maiden to set foot on other than her native soil?"

"It matters not, my lord. Give me your hand."

He complied with her imperious command. While she bent low her head, essaying to read the fine lines by the broken moonlight, he scanned her face and person with admiring interest. The two horsemen were equal in stature and in personal beauty, but there was that about Rudolpho which marked him the superior in rank. One saw it in the proud glance of the eye, the carriage of the head, and in the chivalric, high-toned courtesy of his manner.

"Bane and blessing—light and darkness—in its waxing, in its waning!" muttered the gipsy maiden. "Turn back, my lord! The stars decree it—fate commands it."

"How? What do you mean?" demanded Rudolpho, in surprise.

"Ha! a pretty fortune, by the Alhambra!" laughed the other. "See if thou canst read me a like, maiden." And he extended his hand, with a piece of gold shining in its palm. With a proud gesture, the maiden swept it from her, and the gold clinked across the gravelly path. The knight swore in goodly Castilian fashion, but the maiden, fixing her eyes upon Rudolpho's face, repeated solemnly:

"Turn back, my lord; shame and death lie in your path."

"Come on, Rudolpho. Thou hast stood prating long enough, seeing it is but a Zingari maiden," exclaimed Don Roderigo, spurring his horse. Rudolpho's steed likewise sprang forward, but the gipsy queen, with a bold, quick movement, grasped him firmly by the bridle.

"Maiden, maiden, have a care!" cried Rudolpho, alarmed for her safety. But the girl held the foaming animal, and without stirring from the path, exclaimed:

"My lord, turn back, I implore you by all you love, by the sacredness of your cause. Hark! hear what the stars proclaim—captive—dishonored—reviled—condemned—death. In fair Castile thy mother will weep for thee, thy sisters touch the guitar in mourning songs, thy maiden go down to the grave sorrowing."

"A charming romance," said Don Roderigo, lightly. "Were not thy courage proved, Rudolpho, thou mightst be suspected of playing the craven."

Rudolpho's cheek paled, and he involuntarily put his hand to his sword.

"Don Roderigo, you forget that it is to Rudolpho Echeranza that you speak.—Maiden," he added, kindly, turning to the gipsy, "I thank you for your warning, but I must on. Ere to-morrow's sunset, I have sworn to accomplish a difficult task, but one which our cause demands. My knightly honor is pledged." He would have unclasped her hand from the horse's bridle, but the girl dropped the rein and throwing herself upon her knees in the path, exclaimed, with passionate earnestness :

"My lord, go not hence. Your errand is fruitless, your death certain!"

"Castilian soldiers do not fear death," he answered proudly. "I thank you, maiden, but I cannot listen. And now a benison rest upon thee. Stay, wilt thou take gold from me?" She sprang to her feet, and pressing close to his horse's side, took from his hand a glittering coin.

"My lord," she said, "I would have saved you; but see, here is a ring," and she drew from her finger a broad circlet of gold, bearing a massive stone of beryl. "Take it, and when the hour of trial comes, if thou canst send it to the gipsy queen Teresa, she will come to thee. Death alone shall stand between her and thee."

The knight took the ring, kissing the hand that gave it, and then repeating his thanks, the two sped away. The maiden watched them till the gray distance concealed their forms, and then slowly made her way back to the encampment.

"Once it is past. Now I wait for the last. Twelve days from this, at the waning of the star," she murmured. And as she went on, she crossed her two hands upon her breast, as if she would keep down the strong sobs that shook her frame.

The two horsemen galloped swiftly across the plain, and then diverging from the highway, struck into the forest.

"What think you, good Rudolpho?" said Don Roderigo, giving his tired animal a breathing space, and pushing back the damp locks from his forehead—"what think you the gipsy maiden meant by her strange tale? She spoke like one in good earnest, in sooth."

"I know not," returned the other. "Perchance some evil superstition haunts her. These wild folk think after another fashion from us."

"If any harm should befall you, Rudolpho, you have a talisman in the ring she gave you. She was more chary in her favors towards me. You were born under a propitious star, my lord."

"I wot the stars have little to do with men's destinies. With our own good strength we must carve out our fortunes, and he shapes the most beautiful form who is the most skilful artisan. But see, Don Roderigo, the moon wanes, yonder star hastens to its setting, and if we urge not our steeds to a quicker pace, dawn will overtake us loitering."

They rode on for another hour in silence, and then as they gained a slight eminence, a grim castle loomed upon them, forbidding in its seeming mighty strength. The massive gateway, the towers, the walls of solid masonry, the deep moat, indicated its impenetrability. It was the stronghold of one of the most powerful barons in the land, and from this gray fortress many armed bands were accustomed to go forth to pillage the defenceless people. In the present contest, the baron had espoused the cause of Spain, and his castle, commanding as it did the pass of the Boehmer-Wald, and serving as a retreat, not only for the predatory followers of the baron, but for a goodly number of the soldiers of the duke, presented the chief obstacle to the entrance of the Spanish army into the heart of Bohemia. Pausing on the brow of the hill, the cavaliers reined in their steeds and gazed for a moment at the gloomy fortress. It loomed dark and vast in the distance, indistinctly seen by the pale light of the moon.

"Here then, good Rudolpho, I must part from thee," said Don Roderigo, breaking the silence. Rudolpho slowly removed his casque, and turned to his companion :

"Thou knowest," he said, "that I have undertaken this task at the bidding of our prince, and that I have sworn to accomplish it, if mortal skill and daring can avail. But if I should fail, if the prophecy of the gipsy maiden should be fulfilled, and I should fall by the hand of yonder vile robber, do thou bear to my mother and sister my last remembrances. Tell them that for my country I died gladly, but that I never forgot them; and when they sit in the shade of the orange groves, I know they will sometimes think of me."

Don Roderigo made a feint of stroking his horse's mane to conceal his emotion, but his voice was a little less steady than usual, as he said : "On my honor as a Castilian, I promise to bear thy words back to thy friends, if the fortune of war spares me—but put away the thought of the gipsy's prophecy. It was an idle tale. If thou hadst crossed her other hand also with gold, she would have made thy fortune twice as black, I doubt not."

"Nay, Don Roderigo," said the other, with some hesitation, "hast thou ever heard a strange tale afloat concerning me—a tale told to my mother in my childhood by one of the Zingari? It has troubled my gentle mother much."

"Never," replied his companion.

"It was this—that on a certain day of a certain year, an evil chance should befall me, and that in twelve days thereafter a yet greater danger should menace me—but that if I thwarted the fates at these times they should afterward have no power over my destiny."

"An idle superstition, Rudolpho, trust me," said Roderigo, incredulously.

"I know not. The warning of the gipsy has recalled it to me. But, Roderigo, thou wilt bear me witness at the court of our king, that I did not shrink from my duty. And now let us arrange for our meeting. Thou wilt remain here in the shade of this wood, and to-morrow night if all goes well with me, I will rejoin thee. If not, do not wait for me longer than till sunset of the next day. If I do not return then, thou wilt ride at thy best speed to the camp and say to our captain that I fell in his service."

Don Roderigo promised compliance, and the two parted. He watched Rudolpho till his form became indistinct in the dimness, and then withdrew into the shade of the wood.

"He is a bold cavalier and a true," he muttered, as he spread his cloak upon the ground, "and if any one can find a way to enter that black den, he is the man for it, but I sorely doubt. But for thee, Roderigo, the best thing for thee to do is to sleep, for in the east yonder, the morning fires are already kindled. Thy slumber will not be long at the best." And throwing himself upon the ground, and folding his cloak about him, the tired soldier soon slept.

The castle of Schenau was yet many miles away, and Rudolpho proposed to ride but a short distance further, since in pursuance of his purpose, it would not be safe for him to approach the castle till after nightfall. So long had the lawless baron domineered over the neighboring country, that his extermination was almost a hopeless thing; but the castle stood in the direct path of the invading army—the leader of the Spanish forces had said that it must fall, and Rudolpho Echeranza, the son of a noble Spaniard, had volunteered for the perilous service upon which he had now entered—to visit the environs of the castle, examine the fortifications, and assure himself of the weakest point of attack.

Rudolpho had been trained in those chivalric times, when beneath iron armor a tender heart beat high and warm—and of all the Spanish knights, there were none braver or truer than he, yet the superstitious influences of the times had not failed to impress a mind naturally romantic, and as he rode on his solitary journey, the gipsy girl and her ominous declaration were the frequent theme of his thoughts. He rode forward until he judged the castle to be distant about three leagues, and then he withdrew into the densest part of the forest to seek concealment. Worn with the night's toils, he threw himself upon a couch of dry leaves and slept.

While the sun rose and shone bright and warm over the broad plains, the green woods and dark mountains of Bohemia, while the wind blew soft through the forest and rustled the leaves over the head of the sleeping Rudolpho, while the birds sang and insects hummed and waters rippled, the gipsy encampment was in motion. Fires were kindled under the iron vessels which contained their unsavory broth; the men lounged about on the green sward, and the children chased each other about the wood. The gipsy queen had not come out of her tent that morning, and putting aside the ragged canvass, and making our way through the rubbish that blocks up the entrance, we shall find her sitting in one corner, her head bowed upon her hands, and her whole attitude one of dejection.

"Shame and death!" she murmured. "So fair a face, so noble a cavalier—does the crimson tide flow—do they mock him, taunt him with bitter words? See, they crowd around—they are too many for him—mother of the Zingari, he falls faint and wounded. Now a black dungeon—chains—death! St. Hilda, do I sit here? Shall I let the black fate shroud him?"

She rose and bound up the long black hair which fell over her shoulders like a veil, and then drawing a crimson shawl around, and winding a scarf of the same color and material about her head, she went out of the tent. The gipseys made way for her with a respect which showed how complete was her sway over these rude minds, and she passed on till she came to an old crone, who sat weaving together long, narrow strips of osier, and muttering to herself all the time. The queen went close to her, but the old woman took no notice of her coming.

"Mother," she said, raising her voice and shaking her slightly, "I want some of the black wine with which you can work such strange spells."

"The black wine! Ay, death is black. The sun goes out—the wood is black—you cannot see. Blackness all around—but see, Zingari, the corpse is white, snow-white!" muttered the old woman.

"No matter for that. Give me the potion."

The old woman rose with difficulty and hobbled away to a tent near by—her grizzled hair, her bronzed, wrinkled face and her stooping gait, forming a strangely unpleasant contrast to the maiden's rich beauty and free, light movements.

"Here, daughter," said the old woman, returning. And she handed her a small flask containing a quantity of black liquid. The maiden turned away and walked towards the tents, and the aged gipsy stood watching her retreating figure and shaking her trembling hands, as if it were some malediction that she was muttering.

"You need not strike the tents. We do not go hence to day," said the queen, as the troop gathered around her.

"Eh!" "How?" "What says she?" exclaimed some. Others scowled and walked away defiantly clenching their hands, but the majority acquiesced in the decision of their mistress.

"Stay here till my return," she added, "be it soon or late."

She wrapped the crimson mantle closer around her, and turning her back upon the camp, took her way across the plains. This wild band possess incredible powers of endurance, performing the longest marches with ease. The maiden had been accustomed to these toilsome journeys from childhood, and she kept on her way until sunset without slackening her pace. When the sun was throwing his last red glory over the earth, she stood upon the brow of a hill overlooking a wide extent of country. Vast fields of waving grain swept away on either side, the mountains lifted their dark, bald forms far up into the sky, patches of forest chequered the plains, and away in the distance the silver Woldaw uncoiled its wavy length. Over against the horizon, opposite the hill against which she stood, a gray castle frowned grimly upon the valleys. Standing there in the light of the setting sun, the maiden unwound the crimson scarf from about her head and let the west wind play amid her shining hair.

"At last I am near him," she murmured, as the cool air fanned her heated brow. "Why is it that of all the cavaliers I have met, this one alone seems noble and knightly to me? And I can address him in his own sweet tongue, and he was surprised to hear. Why is it that I alone of all my tribe can speak this language of marvellous sweetness? Strange—strange! Sometimes a vision haunts me of those fragrant orange groves. I seem to see a little child playing there, and a dark-eyed, beautiful woman caresses her tenderly. What is it? Is it a dream? When I told it to Zingarella, she chid me and bade me be silent. What is it—and why is Teresa the gipsy queen the saddest of all her tribe?" She sank upon the ground and wept; but she did not long indulge her grief. Wrapping herself again in her crimson garments, she ate of the black bread with which she had provided herself, and resumed her journey. The rising moon saw her close under the walls of the castle.

It was nearly dark when Rudolpho awoke, and he sprang up and quickly made preparations for departure. The sagacious Arabian which he rode uttered a low neigh of satisfaction when he found himself again under the saddle. To measure the distance which yet intervened, was but the work of a brief space, but Rudolpho departed so far from the highway, and guided his steed slowly through so many forest paths, that three or four hours sped away, before he reached the fortress. When within half a mile he dismounted, led the horse into a close thicket of underbrush, and leaving him tethered there, went forward on foot.

The lights were yet more bright in the great banquetting hall, and the noisy mirth of the baron and his wassail crew floated forth on the evening air. He was forced to lie concealed another two hours before he dared to commence his investigations. Then, when the last torch had been extinguished, and the call of the sentry pacing the walk became the only sound, Rudolpho emerged from his hiding-place and sought some point where the moat might be passable—but it was broad and deep, and the sentry's walk commanded its whole length, so that to endeavor to cross it would be worse than useless. Looking about for some other means of approach, the possibility of descending to the ravine which flanked it on the north side, and scaling the precipice, so as to reach the surface of the ground in the rear, and close upon the fortress, presented itself—almost hopelessly at first—but Rudolpho was fertile in expedients as well as brave in action, and the longer he considered, the more feasible the project appeared. On this side, the castle abutted upon a deep ravine, whose side nearest it was almost perpendicular, and trusting to its natural defences in that direction, no other precautions had been taken. It was beyond the sight of the sentries, and out of the range of the windows.

After an hour of prodigious toil, clinging to the bare rocks which lay piled in the bottom of the gulf, Rudolpho, to his great joy, at last succeeded in reaching a jutting shelf which shot out from the bank. Another spring and he stood upon the solid ground. Here was a space some ten feet in length and nearly as broad in the centre, but narrowing at each extremity as the massive wall approached the edge of the gulf, where it was no more than wide enough for a man to stand. Rudolpho went to the right, but a solid wall opposed his progress; to the left, and here he found a depression in the surface, and looking carefully in its close vicinity, he found that the foundations were porous, and that the stone might be easily displaced from its bed. He conceived the plan of reducing the castle by means of a band of bold men who should approach it by the same way in which he had come, and undermining the wall, confront the foe within the yard, before he could suspect their proximity. Absorbed in his researches, Rudolpho incautiously placed his foot upon a loose stone, it slipped and rolled away into the ravine, clanking against the rocky sides as it went, and falling noisily on the bottom.

"Who goes there?" called the sentry, almost before the echo of the sound died away.

Rudolpho turned, and as quickly as possible retraced his steps, but he had not reached the corner around which he might be concealed from sight, when the call was repeated in louder, alarmed tones, and the sentry hastened across the bastion to a turret overlooking the whole yard. The glare of his torch fell full upon Rudolpho, who seeing his last hope of escape fail him, hastily made preparations for defence. The alarm call of the sentry, and the shrill tones of his trumpet rang out in the evening silence, and in a moment more the yard was thronged with armed men. Rudolpho posted himself at the corner of the wall thus commanding the narrow pass at the rear of the castle. In the presence of danger the courage of the bold cavalier rose to an enthusiastic daring, and shouting the war-cry of Spain and King Philip, he received the attack of his foremost foe. There was a clashing of steel, a fierce hand-to-hand conflict, and the Spaniard was victorious. The followers of the baron were forced to encounter their enemy singly, and the cavalier maintained his position at a disastrous sacrifice of life on the part of the foe. The baron raved in his impotent anger.

"A good sword to him who shall conquer the dog of a Spaniard!" he shouted madly.

An old Bohemian soldier sprang forward, a scarred veteran, the hero of a hundred battles, stimulated into a fiercer enthusiasm by the prospect of reward. Rudolpho wavered under his well-directed blows—it was all he could do to parry his skilful thrusts, and the resonant clang was incessant and loud. The Bohemian in his fury pressed forward too far; Rudolpho's sword served him in good stead; the troop of soldiers sent forth a long, piercing shriek as their bold comrade gave way—fell—and the steel armor clashed against the rocky walls of the chasm which yawned beneath.

But Rudolpho had himself received many wounds, and sick and faint from loss of blood, he staggered, lost the power to defend himself, and with a yell of cruel satisfaction, the Bohemians sprang upon their disabled prey.

"Bring the vile Spaniard to the hall," said the baron. "Let him tell what he is here for, and then he shall die the death of a felon. Bring him before me."

But Rudolpho, weak and trembling, was not yet shorn of his heroic strength of purpose, and remained doggedly silent. Menaces, promises, bribes, were too weak to wring from him any hint of his design. Pale, but resolute and brave, he confronted his merciless foe.

"I am a Castilian," was his sole, proud answer to all questions. Vain were the lures held out by the baron, vainer still his threats.

"Take him hence," he shouted at last, wild with exasperation at his defeat, "away with him to the Black Dungeon. Let us see if our will shall be thwarted by this Spanish stripling."

Rudolpho was forced away to a dark, loathsome dungeon, moist with the slime of a hundred years, and unwholesome with the accumulation of pestilential airs. Above his head a few rays of light came in through a small aperture in the massive walls, but the beams flickered faintly in, as if loth to enter so fearful a place. Overcome with fatigue and the exhaustion consequent from his wounds, Rudolpho sank upon the stone floor and slept. It may have been hours or minutes that he lay there; but when he awoke it was only the same dark solitude around. A single gleam of sunshine came in at the small window and shot across the vault, glistening upon the opposite wall. By this level ray Rudolpho guessed it was nightfall, and that the sun was just going down. O, how he longed to bathe in its blessed light once more! To feel the free winds blow about and the gentle dew of heaven fall upon his forehead! Solitude in this dreary prison-house was enough to sap his strength. It had a horror that death could not have. In the midst of the gloomy thoughts that now pressed heavily upon him, he heard a dull, hollow sound, then a metallic clink, and the iron door swung back.

Four stout men appeared at the entrance and proceeded to fasten yet more chains upon him. They were going to lead him forth to death, he thought, and his flagging spirits rose. Guarded upon all sides, he clambered painfully up the steep staircases till he reached the ground floor. But it was not to death they had led him. He was again confronted with the baron, again plied with questions, again assailed with menaces.

"I am a Castilian," he repeated, scornfully, crossing his arms proudly on his breast.

"Back with him to the dungeon," said the baron, his voice husky with passion. "When to-morrow's sun gilds the top of the Shuckenstein, let him die, base dog of a Spaniard that he is!"

Back down the stone stairs, out of the life-giving air, blowing fresh and cool from the mountains, Rudolpho went, knowing that when the slow hours had dragged by, and the red dawn lighted the east once again, he should be free, eternally free. He shrank not now from the noisome dungeon, the darkness had no terror for him, black though it was. Again the iron door shut him in, alone with himself and his fate.

And now that his doom was certain, he experienced a singular exaltation of spirits. Already, as if he were loosed from fleshly bonds, his mind expanded and gathered new powers, the latent forces of his nature unfolded, and Rudolpho was never so fit to live as now that death waited close at hand. He could not remain inactive, and he paced the dungeon, his steps light and elastic, and the pain of his wounds forgotten. All the old memories of his childhood came thronging back. The orange groves, where a child he had played, the courts, the gardens of his father's chateau, the broad sandy beach that fronted it, the swell of the waves of the blue sea, his sweet mother's voice, and her look and caress of love, the dark, soft beauty of the cousin who had been his childish playmate, all came before him now with a vividness which almost transcended the reality. The night wore on. He could not count the hours, but he knew that they were slipping away from him with resistless certainty. Through the small crevice in the wall, a single star shone down with steady splendor. Long he watched it, and at last it paled before the advancing dawn.

And still the hours wore on. How slow was their flight! He paced the dungeon restlessly, as if he could approach his fate. He faced the small window. It was dark and ill-defined against the dun sky.

He stopped, and while he stood motionless, something rattled against the wall, and fell at his feet. Thrilled with sudden surprise, and a more strange feeling still, he stooped and felt about the damp floor. A few bits of gravel lay scattered there.

Again the rattling sound, and some tiny fragments of stone showered his head. He sprang erect, all his blood bounding within him. Where now was the repose with which he had awaited death? A wild hope of escape trembled up from those deep places in his soul, where the love of life still lay hidden. What was it? Suddenly the prophecy of the Zingari maiden flashed through his mind. Instinctively he felt for the ring she had given him. It was still upon his finger.

"Nothing but death shall separate me from thee."

The words echoed through his brain, like the utterance of some voice. He seemed to divine her purpose. He was sure that it was she who waited to lend him aid. Could he but assure her of his presence within the walls! He looked about for some means of approach to the window. The walls were rough-hewn, and to the agile Spaniard, inspired with a new hope of life, were not inaccessible.

He climbed to the window, clinging to the jutting fragments of rock for support. He reached the aperture, it was scarcely a hand's breadth in size, but through it he placed his hand, held the ring in his fingers for one moment, and let it fall. He listened, but all was silent. The window was too far above the ground for him to hear the sound as it touched the rock. He watched to see if any more signals would be made, but no sound broke the stillness. He began to think that his unknown friend had departed, and his newly-kindled hope died out. Brighter and brighter grew the sky, and now every moment he expected to hear the clanking of the iron, and to see the soldiers enter who should bring him forth to his doom. Why did they not come? Was he not to die at sunrise?

Two hours before sunrise that morning, the attention of the sentry had been attracted by a tall, stately figure which approached the castle with a confidence that indicated the expectation of a welcome. In the dim twilight the soldier could not make out the shape.

"Who goes there?" he shouted.

A moment more and a wild song broke upon the air.

"Holy mother! it is one of the Zingari," exclaimed the soldier, crossing himself. The song ended as the gipsy approached.

"Down with the drawbridge, give me entrance!" she said, in her clear, trumpet-like tones.

The soldier hastened to obey. His orders were to admit all known friends, and this band had been of much service to the baron. Besides, no Bohemian cared to offend a gipsy. Their singularity of character and the supernatural power attributed to them, gave them an ascendancy over the minds of the common people. Carrying her stately figure as proudly as when she stood amid her tribe their queen, Teresa, the gipsy, entered the earth. She demanded to be shown to the baron.

"I bring news which it concerns him to hear," she said.

She was shown into his presence—a tall, swarthy man, with a savage expression of face, made still more hateful by the sinister smile which now crossed his features.

"Zingari, why comest thou?"

Teresa threw off her crimson shawl and unwound her turban.

"Thou'rt weary, beautiful maiden. Bring hither yon flask of wine and pour out for me and thyself," he said, his dark face glowing with admiration as she stood in her radiant beauty.

"First, my lord, let me do mine errand."

"Well, suit thyself, but for me, I speak none the worse for a good draught of Rhenish. What hast thou to say, maiden?"

"The whole Spanish army is distant but half a day's journey. They march to attack thee."

"Ha, what sayest thou?" The baron sprang to his feet.

"A portion of them march in advance. They might easily be cut off were a troop of thy brave soldiers sent to meet them."

"Thou speakest well. A Zingari for wisdom. I myself will head this band." And the baron sprang to his armor closet.

"The Spaniards approach gaily," said the gipsy, taking the flask of wine in her hand and drawing two glasses towards her. "They come with pennons streaming, and glistening in cloth of silver and of gold," she continued, filling the glasses. "Their armor gleams more brightly than thine. Thy rapier is rusty, it is a bad omen."

He stooped quickly to examine, and with marvellous quickness she drew a vial from her bosom and poured a quantity of black fluid from into one glass. She was just placing it to her lips when the baron looked.

"Now, girl, thou dost lie. The steel is as bright as thine own eyes."

"Ah, well, to some eyes blood shows like rust. A Zingari's eyes are true and cannot lie."

"Stop, cease your prating," said the baron, turning pale. "Give me the wine—stay, I'll change with thee," he added, suspiciously.

She drained her own, and watched him while he drank his off.

"In two hours the Spaniards will be at the pass yonder."

"That, then, is my time," said the baron, exultingly. "In an hour more the troop shall be on the march. But I need not rouse them yet. But yesterday they brought in rich spoil from the plains. Meantime, beautiful Teresa, thou shalt sing to me."

He threw himself upon a couch of skins, and the gipsy began to sing. As she did so, she watched him. His eyes drooped, his face relaxed.]

"Thy voice is as soft as a brooklet's murmur. It soothes one like an Eastern tale. 'Tis sweeter than the music of fountains," he said, languidly, the last words dying away into a murmur.

The subtle poison had taken quick effect. In a few moments more the baron slept heavily, a sleep which grew deeper and sounder, till the gipsy knew that no noise would awaken him. Then she rose, passed into an oaken chamber close by, and took from an iron chest a bunch of rude keys. She came out, and passing through the baron's apartment, went out at a door and down a stone staircase, through a passage, and down another descent. Yielding to her strength, the bolts flew back, the heavy bars were withdrawn, and the door of Rudolpho's dungeon swung open.

"At last it is time," thought Rudolpho, and he stepped forward to meet the soldiers. What vision was that dimly seen in the faint light?

"Come hither, follow me!" she said, softly.

"Is't thou?" he exclaimed.

"Hush! come forth."

Rudolpho came out of that fearful tomb, and ascended the stairs. He seemed to himself like one risen from the grave as he came once more into the open air. To his astonishment she led him straight into the baron's presence.

"Fear not," she said, answering his look.

"He cannot harm you. Here," and she threw back a latticed casement. It looked down upon the ravine up whose precipitous sides he had clambered. Rudolpho looked forth. "It is a small chance for life," she said, "will you take it? With this you can lower yourself to the ground." And she gave him her long, crimson scarf.

"And you—I cannot leave you here."

"I will go out as I came in. I will meet you at the foot of the ravine. See the sun lifts himself from the shade of the mountains. Hasten!"

Rudolpho hastily made the scarf fast to the lattice, and easily swung himself to the ground.

"Now, go, fly!" said Teresa.

Rudolpho looked up at the casement. "Give me the scarf." She hesitated a moment.

"Give it me."

"Thou dost not need it now," she said, softly; but she untied it, and let it fall down.

Rudolpho caught it, folded it gently, and with it in his hand commenced the descent. Teresa watched him, trembling between fear and hope. A few moments passed, there was no alarm, and she knew he must be safe. With a murmured prayer to the saints, she went out, fastening the door behind her, and passed unmolested from the castle.

"Ho, there! Guards, enter, force the door! The accursed Zingari has betrayed me!" fiercely shouted the baron, an hour later. Just then there was a loud sound of clashing sabres, and the mad cries of war.

"The Spaniards are upon us!" rang along the corridor and echoed from tower to tower.

That night the setting sun shone upon the banner of Spain floating in its pride above the conquered castle, and Rudolpho lay wounded in the very apartment which had been the baron's chamber of state. Near him was the Zingari maiden, ministering to every want, and cheering him with her beautiful presence. Those hours in the convalescent's room—how else could they be employed, but in making love? If we had listened there a month after, we should have heard Rudolpho say:

"Thou wilt not refuse, my sweet Teresa, to go with me to Spain, and then in the presence of the lords of the court, I will make thee my wife."

"I am but a gipsy maiden," murmured the girl, sadly.

"Thou art Teresa," said Rudolpho. "Not a lady of all the court can rival thee."

And, indeed, he spoke the truth. Her wild gipsy ways seemed forgotten; her manner had a mingled grace and stateliness which would not have misbecome the proudest Castilian maiden. Rudolpho wondered at the change, and if he had loved her first for her simple charms, how much more did he love her now! When the winter winds sifted the snow over the Bohemian plains, Rudolpho stood in a stately hall in his uncle's presence. Don Fernando Echeranga was a man of imposing figure and lordly bearing, and just then a redder hue suffused his swarthy cheek than was wont to be there.

"I tell thee, Rudolpho, thou shalt marry thy cousin, Inez. Thou, the heir of the Echerangas, wed with a base-born gipsy! The accursed thieves! I hate the impious race! Listen, Rudolpho. Twenty years ago a fair child lay sleeping on yonder couch. By the river there a band of these wretches were encamped. I gave them leave. How did they reward me? One of them entered here, and bore away the child—my child—to sell her for a slave to the Mussulman. Do I not rightly hate them? Rudolpho, say."

"But, Teresa," said Rudolpho, hesitating.

"Teresa!" repeated Don Fernando, starting.

The tapestry rustled. "Thine own Teresa," cried a sweet, flute-like voice. "It is thy daughter. Look up, my father. My heart told me I was thy daughter." And Teresa bounded forward and threw herself in her father's arms.

It was even so. The gipseys had kept the stolen child, and as she grew up, she had acquired such power over them that they had made her queen. And so it was his cousin Teresa who became Rudolpho's bride.

SONG.

BY LILIAN MORSE.

I dream of thee when the morning shakes
Her saffron plumes o'er the sky,
And velling in gold the azure lakes,
Where the snow-white lilies lie.
Then, love, am I dreaming of thee—
Dreaming, love, dreaming of thee!

I dream of thee in the noontide hour,
When the wild birds dip in the pool,
And golden nets light up the bower,
And the aisles are all whispering cool.
Then, love, am I dreaming of thee—
Dreaming, love, dreaming of thee!

But O, most of all, in the twilight still,
My love, am I dreaming of thee;
When the spirits slide over the glassy rill,
And dance by the oaken tree.
Yes, love, then I'm dreaming of thee—
Dreaming, love, dreaming of thee!

I dream of thee in the crimsoning eve,
When the showers of amber fall;
And the lonely birds o'er the waters grieve,
Murmuring, musical.
Then, love, am I dreaming of thee—
Dreaming, love, dreaming of thee!

When the round moon swims in the azure dome,
And stars set their crowns on the sea;
And wild birds swing in their leafy home,
O love, then I'm dreaming of thee.
Fondly I'm dreaming of thee—
Dreaming, love, dreaming of thee!

HEART-STRUGGLES.

BY HARRY HAREWOOD LEECH.

"PROMISE!"

"I do solemnly."

"Forever!" continued the broken, earnest voice.

"Forever!" echoed the weeping maiden by the bedside.

The wasted hands were raised over the heads of the kneeling ones, the pale lips of the dying woman parted, the tongue tried to utter a blessing, which was only ended by a painful gasp; the large, sunken eyes grew brighter, rounder, then all light, all brightness faded from them and they were closed in death.

Now the sobs from the younger girl became groans, and her grief and excitement caused her to swoon. But the arm of her companion supported her; it was her soft hands which laved her temples, her tender, low voice, which whispered consolation, and so gently soothed—yes, even while her own heart was bleeding.

Brave Constance Owen ! It was well that the dying mother trusted in thy strong love, clear judgment, ready wit, and womanly heart, to serve her child in this her hour of such bitter need. Thou who must now unite the tenderest sensibility of a woman with the prompt action and calm reason of a man. But let us explain this strange scene.

Constance Owen was early left an orphan ; at nine years of age her mother died and she was adopted by Mrs. Ormond, in whose heart she soon won a place scarcely second to that estimable lady's own daughter, the charming Edith Ormond, at that time scarcely three years of age, and day by day Constance developed such noble traits of character, open, self-reliant, self-sacrificing—that she soon won the love of all ; but as the children advanced in years, the difference in their characters, dispositions and appearance became more and more apparent. Edith was as beautiful as a poet's dream, her slight form was full of willowy grace, and was set off to advantage by her lovely face—her large, blue eyes beamed forth from a wealth of golden hair which fell in curls over cheeks and neck as pure and fair as Parian marble. Arch smiles were constantly hovering around her mouth, and seemed to play at hide and seek in the dimples in her cheeks, giving an expression so piquant and bewitching to her face, that the beholder would love the little fairy ere she spoke in her own charming, childish way, or laughed her own musical, innocent laugh.

Of course, the child-beauty grew up as fair as the most favored of earth's daughters ; she had all a woman's charms, and all a woman's weaknesses ; vain, capricious, often inconstant, save in her love for her adopted sister Constance, whom she doted upon with all the warmth of her nature, whom she leaned upon as upon a strong staff, in whose sympathy she found consolation for her fancied girlish woes, of whose advice and protection she was always sure. And it really seemed as though the doctrine, that directly opposite temperaments afford more continued congeniality, here in the deep love of these two differently organized beings found a wonderful proof, for that Constance Owen in soul and body was fashioned in a different mould from Edith none ever denied.

Though becomingly neat and tidy in her dress while a girl, Constance never delighted in the gay ribbons and fanciful aprons and bright colored gowns which used to charm Edith so much. She seemed to consider life, too, a more earnest, serious business, with graver, deeper purposes laid, than ever arrested the attention or worried the vain little head of Edith. But then Constance was—shall I have the courage to write the word which must condemn my heroine in the eyes of novel-reading, romantic misses ? Yes, she was—ugly. At least the world (who assumes itself an excellent judge) called her so ; for her eyes, though good sound optics, large and well-formed, and were capable too of expressing much emotion, were gray, and never did poets sing in rapture of those “melting orbs,” or declare in questionable doggerel verses their bewitching power, nor did any ever beautifully express that “ Her eyes, in heaven,

Would through the airy region stream so bright
That birds would sing, and think it were not night.”

She had besides a fashion of binding up the masses of her rich brown hair into a simple knot behind, and but seldom was she so coquettish as to allow the curls to “ Play on her neck, and wanton in the wind.”

But surely, if her skin was not so fair or her features as faultless as her beautiful sister's, she was more than compensated for these deficiencies by being possessed of a form which sculptors would delight to model. As a child, she was always remarkable for her matchless figure, but when that form was rounded in womanhood, it was perfection. Her attitudes were always full of unaffected grace, she was tall, yet not too tall, comely and well-developed, yet not fat ; her head resting upon her shoulders with an easy pliant firmness, her waist occupying its natural place visibly and delightfully undeformed, and when she moved the symmetrical limbs must betray their beauty by the modest grace of action. But coquetry, envy, vanity, or any childish passions, never had the power to separate the strong-feeling, reasoning Constance from the vain and giddy Edith, nor alienate one from the other ; so when Edith was seventeen and Constance twenty-three, the former looked up to the latter with all the tenderness of a sister, with all confidence in her advice, all reliance on her good sense and deep love.

It was about this time that the kind-hearted Mrs. Ormond died of that terrible disease consumption, and her last charge as we have seen at the commencement, was to the strong, faithful Constance, to protect, cherish and love the dependent Edith, and the dying woman's tones still sounded in the ears of Constance Owen, as she kissed the damp temples of Edith.

“ ‘Forever !’ Yes, ‘forever,’ dear Edith, will I be your good loving sister, forever ! for the love that dying woman—our mother, Edith—bore to the orphan—I do solemnly promise forever !”

And the darkness settled upon the earth, the house wherein reposed the dead was silent, as dark as was the night without; but deep into the watches of that night sat the two figures in the chamber of death, and the silence was broken by the sobs of the younger as her head lay upon the bosom of the elder, who twined the heavy curls of Edith around her fingers tightly, pressed the head closer to her bosom, but looking out into the blackness with her pale tearless face, could only murmur:

"Forever, yes, forever!"

Did you keep your promise, Constance Owen? We shall see.

Two years had passed since the death of Mrs. Ormond. Two years—a short cycle indeed, but with how many changes is it fraught to all? How many hopes have been consummated, how many joys have been dissipated, how many souls have been lost? How much of misery and happiness, what fears and trials and bitter sacrifices have been experienced by each mortal who reads these lines? Two years! A short space indeed, yet how much suffering or how much light out of the darkness!

Edith the beautiful, and Constance the brave (it is a fancy of mine, dear reader, to call them so), have experienced in their lives in that age—two years—many of the feelings which we have mentioned above. The small property of the deceased had been settled up by an honorable trustee, and the two sisters were living with Edith Ormond's guardian at "Bonnybrook," his country-seat, a few miles from the bustling city. The whole-souled woman Constance had as ever been the tender, constant, best of friends to the orphaned Edith, and it seemed now as though their trust and friendship were so complete and perfect, that it would be impossible to stir the calm surface of their joys and mutual respect and love. But before the two years a trial came to the one woman (the greatest of all to a woman), where at once the heart, soul, imagination, reason and all the feelings of selfishness, pride or passion are enlisted and attacked, requiring almost ultramundane assistance to resist the assault, and follow in the line of duty which reason seems to point out. Such a trial overtook Constance, and thus it was.

It is not to be wondered at that with the extreme beauty of Edith Ormond, and the knowledge of her comfortable little income, there should come many suitors to Bonnybrook. But the gay girl paid little heed to their insipid flatteries or tedious compliments; accepted their convenient attentions, and did not suffer her little heart to beat any faster at the approach of any of them. But at last there came upon the scene one who was, by birth, intellect and riches, far the superior of all these men.

"Doctor Paulding, Miss Ormond."

The beauty of Bonnybrook, and the young, accomplished, travelled Paulding had met. But his prestige had preceded him, and as the introduction was witnessed by Constance from her shielding, curtained alcove, she smiled to see the roses come and go so fast in the cheeks of her pet, as the doctor's dark eyes bent upon her, and his brilliant conversation made her forget some of her envious late companions who even now would condescend to join the plain Miss Owen. O, I am out of patience with these shallow fools of society, who constantly pass I may say roughshod over the mine filled with gold and all precious gems, simply because the surface may be rugged, and no soft mosses or gayly-colored flowers strewn around the edges. Charles Paulding had a noble heart and a mind richly stored with all useful knowledge; his was a large soul, and his nature was overflowing with generosity. Already was he invested with public honors outside of his profession which would make many an older man giddy. But his mind was too lofty, too engrossed with the great and noble things of this life, to stoop to the petty passions or vanities of small-minded men. And now he would seek for a partner to travel through life with him—one who could sympathize with his lofty spirit, his philanthropic aims, kindle afresh his flagging energies, and make him forget, in the pure, satisfying joys of home, his disappointments in the beating heart of the great world.

He was fascinated by Edith's beauty, and his high poetical nature seemed to receive an added refinement as he gazed upon her fresh, lovely form, heard her merry laughter, or listened to her naïve conversation; and his imagination at once invested her with all those rare qualifications of mind which we but seldom find enshrined in a beautiful body. He became a constant visitor at Bonnybrook, and one evening, a few months after his introduction to Edith, the fair girl sought her dear sister and faithful friend, and in a trembling, happy voice, said:

"Dear Constance, I am so happy now."

The round fair arms of Constance were folded tenderly around the beautiful fragile girl; she did not need to ask Edith "why?" the beating little heart was folded tightly to that most faithful of bosoms, and in the trembling twilight with its soothing, sacred stillness, Edith whispered, while tears of joy were dimming the brightness of her glorious eyes:

"He loves me! O, Constance, he loves me!" And her voice was as low and sweet and full of thrilling tenderness, as the sound of trembling music comes to us mellowed over the still waters.

And thus was her confession made, of his confession. But for all this mutual love and happiness still must interfere the ogre change; for alas! there is no constancy in earthly things, no life scarcely without the heavy load of misfortune, no soul but must bear the burden of suffering and its allotment of pain!

"But while the glitter charms our gazing eyes,
Its wings are folded, and the meteor dies."

Soon after the engagement of Dr. Paulding to Edith Ormond, the latter was suddenly called away to the city to visit an aged relative of her guardian, and as the old lady was quite ill she was detained for several weeks. Dr. Paulding was an almost daily visitor even then at Bonny-nook, being upon the most intimate terms with Edith's guardian, and it was at this time that an easy acquaintanceship began between himself and Constance Owen.

The doctor engrossed with his fiancé, had but small opportunity previously to cultivate the retiring Constance, who seemed to prefer, if I may so express it, the shady side of society, scarcely ever coming out into the strong light and glitter and vain display; and it was only during this absence of Edith, that the two had met upon a familiar, easy footing, and I will add a dangerous footing—for no woman of fine powers, capable of appreciating talent, eloquence, real goodness of heart, and the lofty spirit of a man seeking to rise far above his fellows by force of intellect and genius, can view uninterested his noble aims and the unusual indigenous goodness of his nature, any more than such a man can behold a woman possessed of large intellect, a heart susceptible to all the finer emotions, a mind full of rare poetical thoughts, rich even though undeveloped, with an earnest, clear view of life and its sacred requirements, and united with all these, a strong, brave will, which added to well balanced reasoning powers, would suffice to make her pursue and defend the right, even though it ended in her own wretchedness. No, such a man as we have described could not associate with such a woman without there arising and growing a subtle sympathy, perhaps not expressed in words, but thrilling in their souls. And Dr. Paulding was such a man, and Constance Owen was such a woman, and the man became aware of it. The woman's experience was not so ripe. God help them both.

And the strong brave woman did not question her heart as she might have done. She experienced a strange pleasure in these visits of the doctor, a fluttering excitement which was delicious; the emotions were new to her, she never thought of the cause; she had never, strangely enough, any girlish flirtations by which she could presage the birth of love now, hers had been a secluded, quiet life; she only felt in Charles Paulding's presence a new life, higher impulses, and strange peace, and looked for his arrival each time with an increased pleasure. How happy she would be with him as Edith's husband! Did a pang smite her heart, or a shadow flit over her face when she thought that? Perhaps! Then was the time she should have shook off the pleasant dream—and commenced to undeceive herself—perhaps she was confident of her own strength. Poor mortal! she soon learned how weak she was (and indeed we all are) when love attacks.

It was a quiet evening in July, Dr. Paulding had taken tea at Bonny-nook, and Constance had strolled down the little walk with him towards the gate—he was about leaving now at sunset to drive up the country to see a patient. His horse was already biting the rough old "hitching post" in front, and throwing up the clouds of dust with his fore feet, in his impatience to be moving. But his owner did not seem to walk any faster for these restive signs, but strolled as quietly by the side of Constance as though no longing patient or restive horse awaited him. The doctor was idly plucking some heliotropes on his passage down the walk, and mingling with them some variously colored flowers, asters, box and verbenas; when he arrived at the end of the walk he took the little bouquet and placed it in her hands.

"Read the emblems," he said softly. "You who are a priestess in Flora's beautiful temple."

She quickly looked over the flowers, and when she saw amongst them "Beauty in Retirement," "Constancy" and "I am not a Summer Friend," she colored, and then laughing lightly answered:

"You flatter with your flowers, Sir Gallant."

"Indeed I do not," he replied, tenderly glancing into her great gray eyes, which certainly now were brown or black or some other color, but they were very soft.

"My best friends will tell you, doctor, that Constance Owen is ugly. You see I have the courage to confess it. Come, do not let a woman beat you in that manly trait, but pray keep all your little nothings for Edith's ear."

And there was much earnest reproof mixed with her light badinage.

"I say you are beautiful, Constance Owen, I feel it. A soul of such purity and grace as yours, would make a hideous face handsome," he said, impetuously, and his utterance was rapid, his eyes flashed, and the rich color mounted to his forehead as he spoke what it seemed he could not repress.

But Constance—her face was a study—the color rising then receding, leaving it pale as marble, then quickly dyeing her cheeks again with a deep crimson, she, usually so strong and self-possessed, trembled, the hand which held the flowers dropped to her side, and the fingers opened slowly and each flower fluttered to the ground.

"I mean it, Constance Owen," continued Paulding, as though he would dare all now to speak. "I mean it—you are more beautiful to me than Edith—"

That name broke the spell—that one word restored Constance to her reason. Now her eyes flashed scorn as she turned upon him.

"You insult me now, Dr. Paulding." And she strode from him haughtily, leaving him trembling and pale at the gate-post. Her walk was calm and even to the house, but when she reached its grateful cover she flew to her room, and as she threw herself upon the lounge in an agony of tears, she heard the rattle of the wheels, the quick dash of the horse. He was gone.

Now for the bitter—sweet knowledge which his words conveyed—now for the awakening from the pleasant trance—now for a rapid, fearful questioning of her own heart—now for the dawning of the truth. She loved him—O, how madly, passionately, tenderly—how deeply, truly, only. As but such a woman as Constance Owen could love, prompted by her heart and guided by her reason, she loved him, and she was giving herself up to this delicious, dangerous sweetness, almost before she felt that she must crush it out. She thought of him, noble, passionate, loving, (and loving her), she thought of his late considerate tenderness that she had never properly construed before, the light of genius in his eyes, the gush of music in his voice, and how she was so sure that he could never now be happy (if he really did love her), with such negative qualities as Edith possessed. There was no vanity in this thought, only a perfect, clear realization of the new positions. And while in the midst of such thoughts which she dragged from their sanctuary in this bitter search, she all at once comprehended how hopeless was this passion on both sides. She recollected her promise to the dying woman, and should she now basely appropriate the heart which Edith believed to be all her own? No, she would die first!

And the gray eyes, though humid, were now radiant with the holiest light that shines from love and bravery; and her heart, laden with her late precious though bitter thoughts and tender sympathies, beat with resolution in every throb, to be faithful and true to that dying mother even by the sacrifice of her own happiness. Faugh! her happiness—was she not strong and brave enough to conquer this love?

She went to the window in the calm twilight, and stood almost hidden by the creeping vines which shaded the framework, looking down upon the walk where the flowers she had dropped laid, and she looked (with her dark face lighting up with her emotions) as though she belonged to some passionate poem which we remember to have read long ago. And the man who had gone had called up wild dreams to the woman which an hour ago she believed were not born. And she raised herself from lightly leaning on the window as thought chased thought, and stood erect, motionless, gazing out upon the calm landscape, while a sort of cold splendor seemed to settle over her face, and the pain which swept over her features as she could see the flowers like her hopes scattering in the wind and disappearing in the darkness was sad to behold. Her hands were clasped tightly, she would walk gently up and down the room, and then stop looking out upon the young moon which was rising, its tender, tranquil light streaming through the trees into her chamber.

She laid her face in that moonlight upon the window-sill and covered it with her hands. The soft winds rustled the trees as if they soothingly whispered to her. She heard them in her heart. Then came the passionate, profuse weeping—the spring freshet of a woman's soul. And she arose up painfully calm. The struggle was over. Duty, honor and reason had triumphed.

Who can ever know the quick, dreadful agony of that battle? Doctor Paulding came to Bonny-nook as frequently as usual, but Constance scarcely ever saw him now, for with a woman's ready tact she framed ingenious excuses for her absence, and she wrote to Edith to come home as soon as possible; each day she found that her resolutions involved many, many unpleasant duties and conflicts. It was nearly three weeks since the scene in the garden, and she felt that were she not soon relieved by the arrival of Edith, she might in very weakness disclose to Paulding how dear he was to her. But she was destined to have another worse trial before the return of Dr. Paulding's betrothed.

It was at the close of a warm day in August, and she had stolen to a charming little summerhouse amongst the trees with a book, expecting to enjoy the ushering in of evening while she read and thought; her fancies taking their soft coloring from the tranquil, soothing scene. The birds twittered merrily around, a faint breeze fanned her cheeks, and as it grew nearer dusk and the last sunset beams were gilding the shrubbery, she gave herself up entirely to the charming solitude, and sat listlessly enjoying the harmony of the beautiful hour and scene. And she really made a very pretty picture there, her delicate lawn falling back from her exquisite throat, her arms in all their roundness and whiteness disclosed, as the wide sleeves fell back from the shoulders. Her very negligence was grace as she toyed idly with the silken strings of her straw hat which lay upon her lap, and unconsciously put up her taper fingers to her shell-like ears delicate and petite, to push back a few stray curling rings which would escape from their bondage of straight-brushed hair.

While she sat thus in the growing darkness, she felt with instinctive knowledge (which we all at times experience), that she was not alone, that another being shared her solitude, yet so dim was this impression that she did not look around or even stir, but a soft voice spoke close to her, "Constance!"

She felt her heart flutter, and beat loudly in its prison, the blood rushed to her brain as though she would suffocate. She knew it was Paulding when he mentioned her name even before he appeared. She arose hastily, her face very pale.

"Constance!"

He had never called her so before, and the name seemed very sweet when he spoke it.

"Dr. Paulding."

"Constance, I have come to you here, that I may say what I must, for the first and last time"

"Say nothing Dr. Paulding," she interrupted, quickly, "that you will be ashamed of when you marry Edith."

And she was almost surprised at the calmness of her own voice, while her heart was so wildly beating and her temples were so painfully throbbing.

"Is it right that I should marry Edith," he replied, "when I love another woman better? When I realize that she has the capacity to minister to my soul's great wants? I was blind, Constance, I was fascinated by her beauty. But O, I never knew what it was to love, and appreciate its high refinements until I knew you—"

"Stop, Dr. Paulding, I cannot hear this."

But even as she spoke she felt how weak she was, with those eyes flashing upon her, that voice addressing her.

"No, no! you must hear me, dear Constance," and he seized her hand in his and passionately continued. "Consider what is at stake—do not discard me from any false sense of duty. It is far better that Edith should learn the truth now, than that two lives should be forever wasted. No, dearest Constance, I can read in your softening eyes some hope—"

It was the last struggle—should the brave heart be false to her honor and reason, or yield to love? She almost gasped out the words between her sobs, as she tore her hand from his grasp:

"Charles Paulding—I—do—not—love you."

And she fled from the spot to the house, leaving Paulding bewildered and miserable amongst the shadows. She had conquered her own weakness. She was stronger than the man, because selfishness was no element in her nature.

Dr. Paulding and Edith Ormond were married at Bonnybrook in the winter, and Constance Owen was her bridesmaid. Can it be imagined what she suffered? Then, notwithstanding the bride's entreaties that she should still share their home, she left the newly married pair, and made her home in a distant country with the wife of the rector of the village church, who had been one of her mother's friends.

In her new sphere, she commenced a new life, and her feelings had been so chastened by her late trials, her heart so purified by its own afflictions, that she soon learned to find comfort in "The Word of Life." The influences around her were calculated to develop all her religious feelings, her doubts were resolved, her inclinations for good much strengthened. But she could not forget even in her active charities, her untiring exertions to strengthen the weak or assist the poor, the love which was only born to die, the sweet experience turned to bitterness, before half its honey was extracted. But no more repinings, no more turning back, no more weakness.

She had not lived at the rector's over six months, when an offer of marriage was made her by a substantial farmer, a kind, good young man, who would be calculated to make any woman happy, who looked for nothing higher in a marriage than a comfortable home, who could forgive a lack of brains for a plethoric purse. But Constance Owen refused him firmly and kindly, and the poor fellow felt when he left her how superior she was to him, and wondered at his own effrontery in asking her. She told him she should never marry. And her smile was so kind and even and firm, that he knew it was no use to try and alter those words, so he consoled himself a year afterwards by taking to his home and heart a good-natured, large-patterned young woman, whose butter was the pride of the country, and whose cheeses took "the premium."

Constance had invariably refused to go to Bonnybrook to see her sister since her marriage, feeling that she could not live the continual lie which would be embraced in being in his presence, and hearing his voice continually with outward indifference. But at last a letter reached her which conquered all her scruples. It was from Edith, who spoke of her recent illness, of a disease which had been developed, which the doctor thought might be consumption, the fatal disease of which her mother died. It beseeched her as she loved her to come to Bonnybrook; it spoke of her husband's absence on important business, and concluded by begging her to come.

In another day after that letter was received, Constance was at Bonnybrook and her beloved Edith in her arms. Dr. Paulding was absent from home, but his wife had written to him that she expected the "best nurse, her dearest sister Constance." When they were first alone there followed all those confidences which are so dear to friends, but it was not long before Constance saw that there was a want of congeniality discovered in her husband by Edith; that he was most considerate, tender and devoted, she did not deny, but still there was a method and an evident desire to do more and more, lest he was not kind and good enough. All this the wife communicated by her words, although not suspecting herself that she was betraying the secret. And Edith was evidently failing, though still surpassingly beautiful, but her face was thinner, more angular, her complexion like wax, while the two burning spots were upon her cheeks—the hectic flush which gives indication of the fatal blooming of that fell disease consumption.

In disposition she had become more petulant and complaining, and Constance could only imagine how the spirit of Paulding must chafe, after surrounding her with every care to find her still dissatisfied and more exacting, but since the advent of Constance, she had been happier and better in every way. At last Edith informed her that "the doctor" would be home on the morrow. There was no flush of expectation in her face, no beaming smile at the thought of their meeting; only Constance trembled if the wife was calm.

The morning passed without the arrival of Edith's husband, the afternoon was growing late. The wife was fretful and peevish, not for fear of any accident to her husband, but that "Charles knew it excited her so much to be disappointed."

Constance was standing in a deep bay window at the side of the house, and looking vacantly down the N—— road, she saw in the distance a horse dashing furiously towards the house; it looked like a runaway, the clouds of dust flew from the horse's heels as he plunged forward on his mad career, sometimes the thick masses almost concealing the body of the vehicle from view. It came nearer. Heavens! it was the doctor's carriage—his two-wheeled buggy, in which he always made long journeys. And now his pale face was seen leaning over the dasher, as he tried to grasp a rein which had fallen, the horse still making ahead desperately; he made a short turn for the road which led by the cottage into the stables, the shafts were run against a heavy post which stood at the end of the road, and were snapped in two, violently throwing the body of the buggy upon the horse's heels, and its inmate out violently upon the ground, upon a heap of broken glass and stones, while the furious, frightened animal was demolishing the vehicle in his mad efforts to escape from it.

But Constance Owen had witnessed the whole accident, and saw the frightful peril of Paulding; for in another instant, perhaps, the wheel would come off the buggy, and the animal would dash towards the stables, over the stunned body of his master, who lay bleeding profusely from the head, and insensible, directly in his path. She threw open the casement, and regardless of all peril flew to the doctor, raised up his body from under the very hoofs of the excited horse, and carried, rather than dragged him into the house. She never felt how much she loved him till then, when he lay there bleeding and pale in her arms, his form as heavy as if in death. She paid no attention to the fainting wife, other than to order the servants to apply water to her temples and wrists, but gave her orders quickly to the men to ride for a doctor, and bring her assistance for Paulding. And when that assistance was brought, and the doctor at last opened his eyes, they rested upon Constance, and with a feeble sigh he closed them again, but a smile lingered around his mouth, despite his pain.

The shock of that evening, Edith Paulding never recovered from, and from that hour she faded rapidly; the insidious disease made fast progress, and before her husband's wounds were quite healed, she died, with her last breath blessing her husband, almost her last words addressed to her dear nurse Constance. Was not your promise to the dead fulfilled, Constance Owen? Were not your vows and their fulfilment recorded in the angel's book? Yes, she was the friend above all others, during the life of Edith; and when the grave closed over her remains, she quickly left the scene of so many heart-trials, and once more sought the revered solitude where she had first found spiritual comfort; and was received once more by the rector and his wife with joy, for they loved her, these good people, as if she was their own child.

She heard now once in awhile from Bonny-nook, of Dr. Paulding's grief for his wife, of his leaving for foreign parts, some said, never to return; then with a sigh which she scarcely understood herself, she would go about her regular duties more thoughtfully, more sadly.

But her face was placid and serene. She was looked upon, and talked about as an "old maid," though she was but twenty-eight. The young men about the country would take delight in talking to her, and being in her company, but they never committed the folly of making love to her; there was something very genial and kind in her bright smile, but still very, very cold. And then she was such a comfort and a friend to those who needed either; and the air of subdued happiness which was the habitual expression upon her face, was scarcely ever changed now. Reader, have you ever met with a Constance Owen? A woman whose face is not handsome, but with such a reigning expression of peace, whom you suppose is very happy, but who bewilders you sometimes in trying to read the meaning of a strange smile; whom you guess might have had some great heart-grief and struggle sometime, but of course, very long ago, but whom you feel is brave enough to conquer such a trouble! Who certainly seems very happy, yes, in her quiet way, happy; but yet, and yet—you get out of your depth now, amongst the deep waters, and will seek the shore. Yes, you have met perhaps with a Constance Owen, but you never knew the truth. She is a mystery almost to herself, for she feels so much and has lived so very long, even if she is but an "old maid" of twenty-eight. But while thus digressing, you want the sequel to this strange, but by no means unusual heart-struggle.

About two years after the death of Edith Ormond, Constance Owen received a letter addressed to her in a handwriting, with which she was not familiar, her hand shook a little too as she scanned it, and tried to guess who it was from; and although she opened all her other letters which had just arrived from the post-office before the good rector and his wife, she thought she would retire to her room before she read this one; and she left the apartment, the good old man's eyes curiously following her. She tremblingly broke the seal, and read the first letter she had ever received from Dr. Paulding. It was a frank, outspoken letter, and repeated to her in manly terms what he had avowed to her before his marriage. That he had travelled over half the earth since he last saw her, and came back to make this avowal to her with as much truth, as much earnestness as ever; that he could not believe that she could be insensible to this devotion, and he felt that the woman who had imperilled her life to save his, could not view him as coldly as a mere friend; and that he should soon come to N——, to learn if she would repeat the same cruel words which she addressed to him at Bonny-nook; and that if she did, he should forsake the busy walks of life, that his pursuits in science, his successes in public life would no longer be dear to him, and he would try to forget the sweetest dream of his manhood. But he implored her once more to become his wife, and with her noble sympathies to keep alive all that was good in his nature.

The clouds had lifted, and in another month, Dr. Paulding led Constance Owen to the altar. And though the bride was not so young as many giddy misses, who have accomplished in their wedding their sole aim in life, she loved her husband with the enthusiasm of a girl, with a love which was strengthened by time and purified by suffering. And loudly, merrily rang the bells of the old vine-covered parsonage of N—— when they were wedded. And let our readers be certain that the marriage was happier for the woman, that she had not followed the promptings of her own selfish inclinations, against the strong voice of reason and duty, for when she took upon herself the sacred name of "wife" at last, she felt certain that the blessing of the dying mother rested upon her, for the fulfilment of her vows to her beloved child.

And not all fiction is this "fayre love storye," for at this moment the popular governor of a certain southern State points to his noble wife, and calls her tenderly "Constance."

TIME TO COUNT A BILLION.

This is a million times a million, which no one is able to count, however easy it may be to write it. You can count 160 or 170 a minute; let us even suppose that you go so far as 200 in a minute, then an hour will produce 12,000; a day 288,000, and a year, or 365 days (for every four years you may rest a day from counting, during leap year), 105,120,000. Supposing that Adam at the beginning of his existence had begun to count, and continued to do so, and was counting still, he would not even now, according to the usually supposed age of our globe, have counted nearly enough. For, to count a billion, he would require 9512 years, 34 days 5 hours, and 20 minutes, according to the above rule.—Family Tutor.

The Florist.

From brightening fields of ether fair disclosed,
 Oh! of the sun, refulgent Summer comes,
 In pride of youth, and felt through Nature's depth.
 He comes attended by the sultry hours,
 And ever-fanning breezes, on his way;
 While, from his ardent look, the turning Spring
 Averts her blushing face, and earth and skies,
 All smiling, to his hot dominion leaves.—THOMSON.

Geraniums.

There are few plants more easily grown, or that better repay the care of the cultivator, than geraniums. All the half-shrubby kinds require a light rich soil, composed of well decayed manure, leaf-mould, sand, and a little loam, kept moderately moist. A cool greenhouse, where the sashes can be frequently thrown off, and a balcony or window, not too much exposed to the sun, are the best adapted for them; and in such situations they may be kept the whole year, only requiring, when in full flower, to be slightly shaded from the sun, to prolong the blossoming season. Immediately after the plants have done blooming, they should be cut down nearly to the soil, or they will present a blanched, unhealthy appearance, and flower with less vigor and beauty the next season. By thus cutting, abundance of fine young shoots will be produced, which should be thinned out, and those taken out used as cuttings. In this manner good bushy plants are insured.

Best Soil for Flower-Plants.

Azaleas, epacris, heaths, correas, eutaxias, diosmas, chorismas, and all other plants of similar character, with very fine ligneous roots, and hard, firm, but slight stems, require a soil of peat altogether while small, but with an addition of a fifth or sixth part of loam and a little sand when they get to be good-sized plants, and a very good drainage at the bottom of the pots, of broken potsherds, from one to two inches in depth, according to the size of the pot. It is seldom judicious to break the old ball of roots, if they are healthy, but just rub off the top edge of the ball, so that it may unite readily with the new compost. Leaf-mould and perfectly decayed rotten wood are the best substitutes for peat.

Wire Frames.

Wire frames for training plants upon are very desirable, being less cumbersome and more durable than wooden ones. These most people paint green, as the color most resembling nature; others again paint them white. To both of these colors we object—to green, because it never is of precisely the same shade as the leaves of the plant trained; and to white, because it is glaring. The most artificial color or colors is stone or wood.

Satyrium.

Terrestrial, orchidaceous plants from the Cape of Good Hope. The leaves are very curious from the flat manner in which they spread themselves on the surface of the pot; and the flowers, which are generally yellow, are very handsome. They should be grown in very sandy loam or peat, and they are generally kept in a greenhouse. They are very apt to damp off if over-watered.

Schisandra.

A climbing or trailing half-hardy shrub, with scarlet flowers, very pretty and showy when in full bloom; they require rich light soil.

Rose-Cuttings for Propagation.

The proper time to take rose-cuttings from the mother plant is when the sap is in full motion, in order that, in returning by the bark, it may form a callus, from whence the roots proceed. As this callus, or ring of spongy matter, is generally best formed in ripened wood, the cutting should be selected from such wood only as has ripened, and which always has the greatest tendency to make roots. This is the true principle for the choice of cuttings. They should be from two to four inches in length, having at least three eyes at the lower end, which should be cut smooth at the bottom, directly under an eye. Insert the cutting in a good bank sand or loam, finely sifted, from one to two inches deep, pressing the sand or loam gently around the same with the hand. Place in a shady situation, and give gentle sprinklings of water, protecting them from heavy winds. In three or four weeks they will have rooted, when they may be removed to pots, again shaded and watered gently till they have taken fresh root, when they may be re-potted or planted out.

Adaptation of Soil to Flowers and Trees.

The best indication by which to judge of the kind of soil or compost suitable for any particular tree or plant, in the absence of all knowledge of that in which it is found to grow in its original location, is that afforded by an inspection of the root of the plant, and the nature of its stem and leaves. And even when the soil of its native habitat is known, these afford valuable data by which to assist the judgment; for it does not always follow that the various kinds of plants flourish best in the soil in which they are originally found. Evergreen plants, with very fine hairlike roots of a hard, close texture, and which have very thin bark or external coat (such, for instance, as heaths), are the species which do best in decayed vegetable matter. Evergreens that have fleshy leaves, and whose roots are moderately thick and comparatively soft in texture, flourish in a rich sandy loam, with but little manure of a stimulating nature. Of this class are camelias, laurastimus and most broad-leaved evergreens.

Ornamental Shrubs.

Shrubs, deciduous and evergreen, are perhaps the most useful and attractive objects that can be employed to add to the beauty of the garden. Such is the variety also now to be had, that by a judicious selection a succession of choice flowering shrubs may be secured at a very trifling expense; and when these yield to the inclemency of the season, many graceful and attractive evergreens may compensate for their temporary decline. What is there, for instance, richer or more refreshing than the lilac, syringa or hawthorn? A new claimant for attention has made its appearance within the last few years. It is generally known as the golden-bell. It forms a very attractive and showy object, its strong shoots being clothed with its golden yellow flowers before the foliage begins to expand fully; it will doubtless become in time as common as the lilac. The spina prunifolia, or double plum leaved spirea, is very beautiful, and desirable for its profusion of brilliant white blossoms.

Topiary.

The art of cutting yews and other trees into curious shapes, by putting wire frame-works over them, and then clipping the trees in the desired form. This art was practiced to such an extent in ancient Rome, that the word topiariet was used as synonymous with that for gardener.

Curious Matters.

A Locomotive Freak.

A locomotive recently ran away on the West Cornwall line, in England. The throttle-valve having been inadvertently left open, and a fire kindled in the furnace, the attendant went away for a few moments; on his return it had left town, and only ran out of breath at a station some sixteen miles distant, having rushed down some steep inclines, and over sharp curves, at the rate of sixty miles an hour. It tore up and smashed through a large number of gates, but with this exception did no damage whatever, and was quietly led back to its stall, without having been made permanently vicious by its tricks, in which particular it manifested another decided improvement of steam over horse.

"There were Giants in those Days."

The theory that humanity of the antediluvian period existed in forms which would now be considered colossal, has found many adherents among scientific men. A fossil skeleton of enormous size, recently discovered near Abbeville, France, was regarded as a proof of this theory. A Dr. Fullrat, of Berlin, has more recently found other remains of some antediluvian giant in the village of Guilen, near the junction of the Rhine and Duissel. The discovery has created quite a flutter among the wise men of Germany, and a commission has been formed for digging in divers places of the same geological formation as that wherein the giant skeleton was found.

A "Higley Copper."

One of the "Higley coppers" of 1787, struck by Higley, of Granby (a blacksmith), out of copper from the old Simsby mine (Newgate prison), one hundred and twenty-three years ago, has been sold in Hartford for $50. These coppers were the first coins ever struck in North America, and are now rare—only three of them, it is said, being in existence. The coin is of pure copper, and the die is very good and clear. On the obverse face appears the inscription, "Connecticut, 1787," in a circle around the representation of three blacksmith's hammers, or sledge-hammers; the reverse bears the words, "The value of three pence."

Ancient Epitaph.

'Upon a tombstone in Cranston, Rhode Island, is the following epitaph:

"Here lies the body of Joseph Williams, son of Roger Williams (who was the first white man that came to Providence). Aet. 81.

"In King Philip's war he courageously went through, And the native Indians he bravely did subdue; And now he's gone down into the grave, and he will be no more, Until it please Almighty God his body to restore Into some proper shape, as he thinks fit, to be Perhaps like a grain of wheat, as Paul set forth, you see."

Utilising Sawdust.

The ingenuity of Parisian cabinet-makers has found a use for common sawdust, which raises the value of that commodity far above the worth of solid timber. By a new process, combining the hydraulic press with intense heat, the wooden particles are made to form themselves into a solid mass, capable of being moulded into any shape, and presenting a brilliant surface, with a durability and beauty of appearance not to be found in ebony, rose-wood or mahogany.

A curious Fish.

The Utica (N. Y.) Herald has been shown a most curious specimen of the finny tribe, caught in the Mohawk River, recently, by some boys who were fishing with "hook and line." Its tail resembles that of an eel, its head that of the bull-head, while on the under side it bears a similarity to the lizard. It is furnished with four legs, upon which it walks about like a young crocodile. Around its neck is a kind of purple fringe, through which it apparently breathes.

Singular Premonition.

Mrs. Fenwick and four children left Melbourne for England in the Royal Charter, and all were lost. Mr. Fenwick, the husband and father, remained in Melbourne, and about five days before the wreck wrote to a friend in Hobart Town, saying he had seen his wife and children, in a dream, battling with the waves and calling to him for help. The dream so preyed on his mind, that he committed suicide by cutting his throat, and that on the very night of the wreck.

Singular Case.

A person in Halifax, N. S., was so cautious about fire in his workshop, that he went over his premises the other night, according to his usual custom, for the purpose of inspecting and seeing that all was safe, when he stumbled over a wheelbarrow, and the fluid lamp which he held in his hand was broken, and the fluid spilled over some shavings, which speedily ignited from coming in contact with the blaze. In a few minutes more the whole building was in flames, and rapidly destroyed.

An Arithmetical Puzzle.

How are the numbers forty-five to be divided into four such parts, that if, to the first part you add two, from the second part you subtract two, the third part you multiply by two, and the fourth part you divide by two, so that the sum of the addition, the remainder of the subtraction, the product of the multiplication, and the quotient of the division, shall be equal?

The Word Book.

Long, long before these wondrous days of ours, when a bundle of rags, introduced at one end of a machine, issues from the other in the shape of snow-white paper, our Teutonic fathers were content to write their letters, calendars and accounts upon wood. Being close-grained, and besides plentiful in the north, the birch, or beech, was the tree generally employed for this purpose, and hence came our word book.

A precious Relic.

At an auction in Lyons, a book-collector lately bought a prayer-book containing a letter written by Queen Marie Antoinette at the time of her imprisonment in the Temple. In it she begs the Convention, for the second time, to let her have a mattress for the bedstead she slept on. How forcibly this enables us to realise her fall from luxury and splendor!

A convenient Steamboat.

We see it stated that some of the propellers used in carrying coal to London are so built that the stern part (with boilers, engines and propeller,) disconnects and flies to another vessel; so that they arrive with a full cargo, change to an empty hull, and leave port again in an hour.

The Housewife.

To wash Lace or Blonde.

Valuable lace, or French blonde, may be washed with care, to look as well as new. Thread lace should be carefully taken off from any article to which it has been sewed; but blonde may be left attached to the quilting net. The lace must be wound round a smooth roller, or a common wine-bottle filled with water, and covered with clean linen. This bottle should be placed upright, in a strong, cold lather of white soap and water, where it must remain on a warm hearth for a day or two, till all the dirt is drawn out of the lace, renewing the lather every day. When quite clean, it must be partly dried in the sun upon the bottle, then taken off, and planed out carefully upon a pillow, using a separate pin for every point or scallop. Let it remain till perfectly dry, when it may be unplanned and put away. It must not be starched or ironed.

To stew a Knuckle of Veal.

Break the bone in two or three places; put to it five pints of water, eight shalots, a bunch of sweet herbs, some whole black pepper, a little salt and mace; boil it together till half the water is consumed, then take out the meat, herbs and spice, thicken with two spoonfuls of flour, and boil it till the flour is sufficiently done; then put back the best of the meat, add two glasses of Madeira wine, lemon-juice and Cayenne. Two calf's feet improve it much. It should be stewed over a slow fire.

A Fricandeau of Beef.

Take a nice piece of lean beef; lard it with bacon seasoned with pepper, salt, cloves, mace and allspice; put it into a stewpan with a pint of broth, a glass of white wine, a bundle of parsley, all sorts of sweet herbs, a clove of garlic, a shalot or two, four cloves, pepper and salt; when the meat has become tender, cover it close; skim the sauce well, and strain it; set it on the fire, and let it boil till it is reduced to a glaze; glaze the larded side with this, and serve the meat on sorrel sauce.

To stew an Ox-Tongue.

Salt a tongue with saltpetre and common salt for a week, turning it every day; boil it tender enough to peel; when done, stew it in a moderately strong gravy; season with soy, mushroom catsup, Cayenne, pounded cloves, and salt, if necessary. Serve with truffles, morels, or mushrooms. In this receipt, the roots must be taken off the tongues before salting, but some fat left.

For chapped Hands and Face.

Put three to six drops of glycerine into the water before washing the hands and face; or if only washing the hands, drop one drop into the palm of the hand after washing off the soap and dirt, rub all over the hands and wrists, and then dry thoroughly. It protects the skin from the strongest frost.

Scotch Colllops (Brown.)

Take a leg of veal, and cut some thin colllops; fry them, and season with salt and nutmeg; boil some gravy, and when they are done pour it into the pan, with catsup, walnut-pickle and port wine, to the taste.

A good Paste for Tarts.

One pound and a half of flour, half a pound of butter, half a pound of lard, one teaspoonful of soda, and sufficient water to form a stiff dough.

Hair Wash.

Take a small quantity of rosemary, strip the leaves from the stalks, and put them into a jar, with nearly half a pint of cold water. Place the jar near the fire, and let the contents simmer gently for an hour or two, without setting or burning. When the water is somewhat reduced, the infusion will be sufficiently strong. Then add half a pint of rum, and simmer the whole for a while longer. When cold, strain the liquid from the leaves, and keep it in a bottle to be ready for use. Apply it to the roots of the hair with a small sponge or piece of flannel.

To clean Carpets.

Take them up, and let them be well beaten with long, smooth sticks; then lay them down, and brush on both sides with a hand-brush; turn the right side upwards, and scour with ox-gall and soap and water, rub with linen cloths to soak up as much of the wet as possible; then lay them on the grass, or hang them across a line, till thoroughly dry. Lay them down in their proper place, and brush the way of the nap, or pile, if there be any, with a stiff hair brush.

Ginger Sponge-Cake.

One cup of molasses, one cup of butter, two cups of sugar, four eggs, three cups of flour, one cup of milk, soda and ginger.

Another, and very nice.—Two coffee-cups of molasses, one cup of butter, half a cup of milk, four cups of flour, four eggs, soda and ginger.

Texas Jumbles.

One pound and a half of flour, one pound of sugar, three-quarters of a pound of butter, three eggs; dissolve one teaspoonful of soda in one-half cup of milk; add this, also one nutmeg, and roll out the dough, and cut into small cakes of any shape, and bake them in a quick oven.

Molasses Pie.

Four eggs—beat the whites separate—one teaspoonful of brown sugar, half a nutmeg, two tablespoonsful of butter; beat them well together; stir in one teaspoonful and a half of molasses, and then add the white of eggs. Bake on pastry.

Crab Soup.

Fry three onions brown in butter, slice a dozen large tomatoes, and cook together; season with red pepper, salt and nutmeg to your taste; pick out a dozen crabs, add two quarts of water and simmer until thick.

Corn Bread.

Six large spoonfuls of corn flour, three spoonfuls of wheat flour (the flour to be wet several hours before using with milk), two spoonfuls of molasses; add, when ready to bake, one egg, salt and a teaspoonful of soda.

Clove Cake.

One pound of sugar, one pound of flour, half a pound of butter, four eggs, a teaspoonful of saleratus, a cup of milk, a teaspoonful of powdered mace, same of cinnamon, same of cloves; fruit, if you choose.

Portugal Cake.

One pound of flour, half a pound of butter, eight eggs, two spoonfuls of lemon-juice, one pound of stoned raisins, citron or almonds, as you choose, one nutmeg. It is good plain.

Corn Muffins.

One gill of milk, half a pint of soft boiled hominy or mush, a spoonful of butter, two eggs, three large spoonfuls of corn flour, and salt. Bake in rings.

Editor's Table.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

THE GROWTH OF LONDON.

We are apt to imagine here in the United States that the growth of our towns and cities greatly surpasses in rapidity and extent those of any part of the Old World. Some facts about London seem to contradict this notion. It is stated, for instance, in a recent report to the government, that "in little more than 12 years, 1200 new streets have been added to London, which is at the rate of 100 streets a year." These 1200 new streets "contain 48,000 houses, most of them built on a large and commodious scale, and in a style of superior comfort." With all this wonderful increase, it is said "that the demand for houses, instead of diminishing, continues to increase, the number of occupied houses is augmenting; scarcely is a new street in London finished, before almost every house in it is occupied." One great reason assigned for the rapid growth of London, is the extraordinary facility, economy and despatch with which people are now transported over railroads terminating there. Owing to this cause it is estimated that the daily influx of individuals is five times greater than it was fifteen years ago. London is now about forty miles in circumference, and numbers more than two millions and a half of inhabitants!

SOUND DECISION.—The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has decided that a telegraph company must send the message given to them, and allow no conjectural amendments on the part of any of their officers. In the language of Judge Woodward, they must obey the printer's golden rule, and "follow copy."

ADULTERATING LIQUOR.—The Legislature of Tennessee has passed a very stringent law against the adulteration of liquors. Using poisonous ingredients is declared a felony.

NEW ENTERPRISE.—The first number of a weekly English paper, the first ever published in Havana, made its appearance on the 10th ult.

A TRAVELLING PRINCE.—Prince Napoleon, at the last accounts, was taking a tour through Italy, accompanied by Emile Girardin.

CRINOLINE.

The farthingale of the time of Elizabeth answers to the hooped petticoat of the days of Queen Anne and the crinoline of Queen Victoria. Against the farthingales the great master, Philip Stubbes, inveighed with thundering eloquence. "When they have all their goodly robes upon them," says he, "women seem to be the smallest part of themselves, not natural women, but artificial women; not women of flesh and blood, but rather puppets, mawmets, consisting of rags and clouts compact together!" The queen herself condemned the fashion, and passed laws to put down such extravagance. The wits assailed it—and what was the result? The farthingale expanded, and under James I. became as remarkable for ugliness as for discomfort. Hooped petticoats came into fashion again in the time of Queen Anne; and Addison's keen satire was directed against them. In the Spectator, No. 272, appears an advertisement, dated from the parish vestry, Jan. 9th, 1711-'12: "All ladies who come to church in the new-fashioned hoops are desired to be there before divine service begins, lest they divert the attention of the congregation." Gay took up the subject, and handled it very roughly. More polite wits averred that these women only kept the men at a proper distance; the caricaturists represented a fashionably-attired lady as a donkey carrying two panniers; and Hogarth pictured the inconvenience of a full-dressed belle entering a sedan chair.

RATHER ODD.—A newspaper published at New Rochelle, Westchester county, N. Y., contains the advertisement of "Reverend John Taylor," who solicits "white-washing and wall-coloring jobs." Mr. Taylor is a man of color; hence his readiness to apply color.

HUMBUC.—A correspondent of the Ohio Cultivator asserts that the only way to make sure of a crop of peaches, every year, is by grafting upon the wild plum stock.

WANTED—A WIFE.—The editor of the Nantucket Inquirer wants a wife; but whether for himself or somebody else he does not state.

COLLECTING DEBTS.

The Wisconsin Legislature have formally considered a proposition to abolish all laws for the collection of debts. The mover of the bill, Mr. Elmore, is a great wag, as is evidenced by the following extract from his speech upon that subject:

The speaker proceeded to review the present system of collecting debts. It was all a humbug and a cheat, a matter of technicalities and legal shuffling. Lawyers gave advice in order to obtain a fee and encourage litigation. Judges make blunders and mistakes. He had had little experience in the law, and that was rich. (Laughter.) He would give a history of it. The speaker then related how he had purchased a yoke of oxen about fifteen years ago—paid fifty dollars for them—a few days after, the son of the man of whom he bought the oxen came to him and said the oxen were his. He insisted on having pay over again, and commenced a suit before a justice. The jury didn't agree. Finally, through the blunders of the Bushwood justice of the peace, the case went against him. He appealed it to the Circuit Court in Milwaukee. There he lost again, and he said to his lawyer: "I will give you ten dollars to quote Pennsylvania law to Judge Miller and have a new trial ordered." (Great laughter.) He took the ten dollars and performed the duty. A new trial was then granted, and venue changed to Walworth county. Judge Irwin was then the judge. Any man who wanted to gain a cause in his court had either to go hunting with him and let the judge claim all the game that was shot, or else pat his dog. Well, said the speaker, I patted the dog. (Laughter.) I fed that dog with crackers. (Renewed laughter.) The case was decided in my favor. When I heard the decision, I thought to myself the dog had followed me about long enough; I turned round and gave him a kick. (Laughter.) The yelp of the dog had hardly subsided ere I heard the judge say, "Mr. Clerk, this judgment is set aside, and a new trial granted." (Great laughter.) Mr. Speaker, that kick cost me two hundred dollars! (Convulsive laughter.) You have no doubt seen a suit in a justice's court in the country. There is time spent by jurors and hangers-on, besides other costs, at least fifty dollars, besides the ill feelings and dissensions caused by it. It is all a cheat. The litigants had better set down and play a game of old sledge to decide the case.

MECHANICAL POWER.—Two men, working a windlass at right angles to each other, can raise 70 pounds easier than one man can 30 pounds.

DETERMINED REVENGE.

An eccentric old gentleman, a millionaire, recently deceased, in Paris, has left a last evidence of oddity in his will. Five or six years ago, the old man had occasion to visit a country town, built upon the banks of the Saone. Early one morning he sallied forth from the inn at which he had taken lodgings, for a walk. He attempted to cross a bridge, separating the two quarters of the town, but was stopped, midway, by a tollkeeper, who demanded one sou, for the privilege of crossing. The millionaire searched his pockets, but having inadvertently left his purse in his room, found himself literally without a sou. He explained to the tollman, who chanced to be a stubborn, intractable fellow, and would take no excuse. The rich man barely escaped arrest for an attempt to defraud the proprietor of the bridge, and would probably have been subjected to some annoyance, had not a passer-by lent him the necessary sum. He went away, vowing that the tollkeeper should lose his place. Unable to accomplish his purpose in any other manner, the vindictive old fellow orders, in his will, that the bridge shall be bought and thrown open to the public, free of charge. By this means the obnoxious functionary loses his office; but as he was, after all, only performing his duty, he will not find it difficult to obtain other employment.

COOL, RATHER.—A gentleman in Cincinnati, a day or two since, was sitting in a barber's shop, undergoing some tonsorial operation, when his partner in business stepped in and quietly remarked, "Brown, our place is on fire." "Well, let it burn, it's insured." "Yes, I know, but it will make a pretty warm fire, and I thought I'd just drop in and tell you about it; I didn't know but you'd want to see the old place burn." "Well, wait a minute or two, till my other whisker's trimmed, and I'll go with you."

CHOICE OF WIVES.—The man of mediocre education and position is, generally, the most particular about the education and accomplishments of his wife. A man of literary habits often seeks little more than sense and affection.

A GOOD REASON.—A telegraphic despatch was received in Lynn, recently, but was refused by the person to whom it was sent, on the ground that he didn't recognize the handwriting as belonging to the one who was said to have sent it.

PRICES OF PICTURES.—At a recent sale of pictures abroad, a work of Faed's brought $6500; one by MacIise was sold for $4500, and one of Edwin Landseer's for $4000.

A WORD ABOUT PROVERBS.

Every language has its proverbs, grave or gay, broad or refined, according to the characteristics of the people; even dialects that have never been hammered out into dictionaries or pruned into grammars preserve in set phrases the results of reflection and experience, and condense their observations into proverbs. The first book that was ever written, as far as we know, contain examples of them, and the last novel lying uncared on our library tables is almost sure to be garnished with them. A portion of Scripture lore is devoted to them altogether. And they have, on the other hand, been instruments of evil, presenting, in a specious and convincing form, arguments most opposed to truth and morality. Still, to give them their due, we believe that by far the larger portion of them contain lessons of wisdom and good sense, and that the few which have been coined in the cause of folly and falsehood are decidedly exceptional. It is curious to observe how greatly the proverbs of a nation are modified and toned by its prevailing characteristics. Thus, great numbers of the Spanish proverbs breathe a kind of luxurious laziness—such, for instance, as "Después de comer ni un sobrescrito leer" (After eating, don't read even a superscription), a saying which seeks to dissuade our curiosity from roading even the address of a letter, should it be presented after dinner; and there are more Spanish saws on this one subject than on any other; carefully guarding the rights and privileges of indolence, they fence in the sacredness of the siesta with an array of time-honored phrases. A recent writer on Spain and its inhabitants calculates that for one of these familiar sayings which urges to exertion and activity, twenty-two may be found pleading the cause of laziness and rest. To us the proverbs of France are much more familiar, and surely from these alone a good idea of the language and its speakers might be gleaned; flashes of wit, gleams of humor and gaiety, easiness of principle and readiness of speech, characterise a large proportion of these. Even in the divisions of Great Britain it is not difficult to trace a connection between the familiar sayings of the people and their ordinary standard of morality and prevailing tone of thought; a certain hard, shrewd worldliness marks Yorkshire and north country sayings, and the more objectionable and unprincipled proverbs are most in vogue in great towns and cities.

TRUE.—The grace which makes every other grace amiable, is humility, with which true bravery is ever coupled.

VERY TRUE.

A French writer says: "In a woman's life, everything leads to a new dress; everything ends with a new dress; every circumstance is marked by a new dress; and the dress is always the most important point. A girl is going to be married—a dress. For a moment her heart is filled with love, thoughts of an entirely new existence, and of a long separation from her parents. Everything disappears before the all-absorbing question of the wedding dress. A relation dies. The grief of the ladies is violent; but it is soon checked, for the mourning has to be thought of. What are people wearing? What is the most fashionable mode of testifying one's sorrow? It is necessary to go to the linen-draper's, to the dress-maker's, to the milliner's, and in a little while they are so thoroughly occupied, that there is quite an end to lamentation, unless, however, the dress do not happen to fit, or the bonnet be too much or too little off the head. But if the dress is made of some new material, if the bonnet is becoming, then they experience an involuntary glow; they are triumphant, they are very happy."

A FAMILY RESTORATIVE.—Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry is the most thoroughly tested, and long tried domestic remedy for coughs, colds, bronchitis, asthma, and all lung complaints, that is known to the American public. Originated by a celebrated physician in regular standing, and after years of large experience, it is all that is claimed for it. The house of Seth W. Fowle & Co., of this city, by whom the Balsam is manufactured, is too well known in this community to require endorsement, but suffice it to say that every bottle of the preparation is put up under the immediate supervision of the firm itself. An immense array of certificates from our best citizens has been accumulated by the proprietors, particularizing its wonderful cures, and it is indeed a "household word" throughout the country.

A HINT.—If you have anything to give your minister, give it to him in money, and it will be worth to him at least double its value in anything else, in three cases out of four.

SYMPATHY WITH ITALY.—Lady Byron sent $200 to the Sicilian committee, a few days before her death, as her donation to the Garibaldi fund.

MINIATURE MACHINERY.

Much skill and perseverance have been displayed by the ingenious in all ages in the construction of miniature objects—the purposes to be gained being minuteness of proportion with delicacy of finish. Veritable watches have been set in finger-rings; a dinner-set, with all its appurtenances, placed in a hazel-nut; and a coach and four enclosed in a cherry-stone. Beyond the mere training of the hand and eye to the accomplishment of delicate work, there can be nothing gained by such exhibitions of ingenuity; and were it not for this acquirement, we might safely pronounce all these tiny inventions as the offspring of ingenious trifling.

Cicero, according to Pliny's report, saw the whole Iliad of Homer written in, so fine a character that it could be contained in a nut-shell; and Ælian speaks of one Myrmecides, a Milesian, and of Callicrates, a Lacedæmonian, the first of whom made an ivory chariot, so small and so delicately framed that a fly with its wing could at the same time cover it and a little ivory ship of the same dimensions; the second formed ants and other little animals out of ivory, which were so extremely small that their component parts were scarcely to be distinguished with the naked eye. He states also, in the same place, that one of those artists wrote a distich, in golden letters, which he enclosed in the rind of a grain of corn.

Arnold, the London watchmaker, constructed a watch for George III., which was set in a finger-ring; but this was nothing uncommon, for the Emperor Charles V. as well as James I. of England, had similar ornaments in the jewels of their rings; and this species of mechanism is sometimes witnessed, on a larger scale, in the bracelets of ladies. In Kirby's Museum, notice is taken of an exhibition at the house of one Boverick, a watchmaker in the Strand, (1745,) at which were shown, among other things, the following curiosities: 1st, The furniture of a dining-room, with two persons seated at dinner, and a footman in waiting—the whole, capable of being enclosed in a cherry-stone; 2d, a landau in ivory, with four persons inside, two postillions, a driver, and six horses—the whole fully mounted and drawn by a flea; 3d, a four-wheel open chaise, equally perfect, and weighing only one grain. Another London exhibitor, about the same time, constructed of ivory a tea-table, fully equipped, with urn, tea-pot, cups, saucers, etc.—the whole being contained in a Barcelona filbert shell.

In 1828, a mechanic of Plymouth completed a miniature cannon and carriage, the whole of which only weighed the twenty-ninth part of a grain. The cannon had bore and touch-hole complete; the gun was of steel, the carriage of gold, and the wheels of silver. The workmanship was said to be beautiful, but could only be seen to advantage through a powerful magnifying-glass.

CHINESE WOOD-ENGRAVING.

Wood-engraving is said to have had its origin in China, the birthplace of many other valuable inventions, and to have been due to the peculiar structure of the Chinese language, in the writing of which a separate symbol is used for each idea, and words are not made up, as with us, by a combination of letters. The number of these symbols or characters is therefore so vast, that it would be almost impossible to print their books with movable types. Their method of printing is therefore as follows: The work to be printed is carefully transcribed upon transparent paper, only one side of which is written on. The sheets are then glued down upon wooden tablets, and all the wood is cut away except that covered by the lines of the writing. From these raised wooden lines impressions are taken. This practice is of ancient date in China, and some of those who have bestowed research on the matter are inclined to fix it about A. D. 930.

REASONABLE.—A gentleman not overburdened with scientific knowledge conducted two ladies to the Cambridge Observatory to see an eclipse of the moon. They were too late; the eclipse was over, and the ladies were disappointed. "O," exclaimed our hero, "don't fret! I know the astronomer very well; he is a very polite man, and I am sure will begin again."

INGRATITUDE.—The worst form of ingratitude is, to refuse to accept a favor from the hands of a person to whom you have had the pleasure of rendering one.

RAPID GROWTH.—It is claimed that Chicago has nearly 150,000 inhabitants.

THE BATTLE-FIELD.

In one of the great battles on the continent during the Napoleonic era, a young ensign paused to contemplate the body of a drummer who had just been killed by a cannon-ball which smashed his skull and scattered his brains. The colonel of the regiment accosted him sternly, and said, "I hope you are not afraid, sir?" "Afraid!" replied the ensign, coolly, "O, no, colonel; but I was thinking what a wonder it was that any man with brains like this poor fellow, could be found here." The reply was a bitter satire on the folly of war. But we lose sight of the absurdity of fighting in its horrors. Even Napoleon could not ride over a field of battle, after the excitement had passed away, without shedding tears of distress. What a picture was that given by the London Morning Herald of the field of Inkerman immediately after the combat! "Many faces still seemed to smile; others had a threatening look; some bodies had a funeral pose, as though laid out by friendly hands; others still knelt upon the ground, convulsively grasping their weapon, and biting their cartridges. Many had their arms raised as if endeavoring to ward off a blow, or as if desiring to offer a last prayer. All their faces were pale, and the fierce blowing wind seemed to animate their dead bodies; one would have said that these long lines of the dead were about to rise to recommence the struggle." M. Boudin writes the same thing of the appearance of many of the Russians after the battle of the Alma: "Some seemed still writhing in the agonies of despair and death, but the most wore a look of calm and pious resignation. Some appeared to have words floating on their lips, and a smile as in a sort of high beatitude. One was particularly observed, his knees bent, his hands raised and joined, his head thrown back, murmuring his supreme prayer." At Magenta, again, many dead bodies, as we are informed by surgeon Major Armand, of the army of Italy, maintained the attitude they had when struck, passing instantaneously from life to death, without agony or convulsion. A Zouave, struck point blank in the chest, still held his bayonet in the position of the charge, with the menacing aspect of a dead lion. His majesty the emperor is said to have remarked a similar case at Palestro. Near to the Zouave was an Austrian, dead from hemorrhage. His face and eyes were turned to heaven, his hands joined, and fingers interlaced, evidently in the attitude of prayer.

POISON.—Cases of murder by poisoning are becoming fearfully numerous all about us.

HEIGHT AND WEIGHT OF MAN.

The average height of Europeans at birth is nineteen inches, female children being of less size in the proportion of 480 to 460. In each of the twelve years after birth, one twelfth is added to the stature each year. Between the ages of twelve and twenty, the growth of the body proceeds much more slowly—and between the ages of twenty and twenty-five, when the height of the body usually attains its maximum, it is still further diminished. This point being reached, it is found that the increase is about three and one-quarter times greater than at the period of birth. In old age, the height of the body decreases on the average about three inches. In general, the height varies less in women of different countries than men. There is a difference in the weight of the sexes, both at birth and infancy. The average weight of a male child is about seven pounds, and of a female child only about six and a half pounds. The weight of a new-born infant decreases for the first three or four days after birth, and it does not sensibly commence to gain weight until it is a week old. At the end of the first year the child is nearly three times as heavy as when it was born. At the age of seven years, it is twice as heavy as at the end of the first year, and at forty-four years old its weight is quadrupled. The average weight of each sex is nearly the same at the age of twelve, but after that period, taking individuals of the same age, the females will be found to weigh less than males.

When the weight of the body has reached its average maximum, it is about sixteen times heavier than at the time of birth. The average weight of men is about 139 pounds, and of women, about 112 pounds; of adults, without distinction of sex, about 130 pounds. In cases of individuals of both sexes, who are under the height of four feet four inches, females are somewhat heavier than men; but if above this height, men weigh more than women. Men attain their maximum weight about the age of forty, and women at, or near the age of fifty. At the age of sixty, both the one and the other usually commence losing their weight, and the average weight of old persons of either sex, is nearly the same as at nineteen years of age.

A QUESTION.—Did the man who ploughed the sea, and afterwards planted his foot on his native soil, ever harvest the crops?

TERRIBLE.—An exchange has a paragraph headed "Duel under the Rocky Mountains." That must have been a crusher.

PERSEVERANCE AND SUCCESS.

Those who regard success as a duty must be satisfied that perseverance is the only means of attaining it. It is that quality which essentially characterizes the Anglo-Saxon race, which raised a little European island to the rank of a first-rate power and the arbiter, in more than one historical crisis, of the world's destiny, and which, transplanted to these shores, took a remarkable development, and accomplished results which are the world's wonder. All Americans possess more or less of this quality, but in some it is marvellously developed, and what it can accomplish we propose to illustrate in an individual case, which ought to have figured in Smiles's "Self-Help."

The case we refer to is that of Mr. Simeon L. Wilson, of Methuen, Mass. At the age of thirteen he lost the use of a limb by attack of white swelling in the knee. After suffering for years from lameness, and just as he was beginning to dispense with the use of a cane, a paralytic stroke made him a cripple for life. This occurred in 1831, and in 1849 he had not been able to walk one step. In this condition he began the business of closing shoes, and by hard work and economy, succeeded in getting together enough money to purchase an acre and sixty rods of land near Methuen village, on which he had a house built in 1836. His land was very unpromising, "A gravelly hill, yellow loam, black loam, or clay soil, rather moist, and a swamp, very wet, with muck eighteen inches deep on an average, with a dry and sandy bottom—the swamp was covered with a thick growth of alders. The upland appeared to be almost filled, or paved, with small stones. The whole lot," Mr. Wilson says, in his statement to the Essex County Agricultural Society, "was a very bad-looking piece of land."

He resolutely went to work, however, to reclaim this ill-conditioned tract, and by slow degrees it was brought under cultivation. He subscribed to an agricultural paper, took a lively interest in fruit-growing, and began to set out trees. In 1843 he transplanted into rows some apple-trees that had sprung up spontaneously, and in 1845 grafted them; in 1849 he gathered fruit from them. In 1846 he commenced a small nursery of fruit trees.

"Although I can do but little in the nursery myself," he says, "I usually go into it every day (upon the wheelbarrow), and see what is in the most need of being done. Sometimes I work there myself, by getting upon my hands and knees between two rows of trees, and trim or weed them as I creep along. Sometimes I bud a few trees myself, but it being rather inconvenient for me to do this work, I consider it better to work in the shop and hire the budding done. It requires nearly all the work of one man now to attend to the nursery. The number of trees on the place at the present time (1849) is as follows: apple, 6787; plum, 388; cherry, 814; pear, 2947; peaches, apricots and nectarines, 640; quince, 377; whole number, including all varieties and sizes, 11,954. Together with a great variety of grape vines, strawberry plants, gooseberry and currant bushes. The whole quantity of land cultivated is about one acre, there being about one third of an acre used for yard, buildings, etc. I raise between the rows of trees, the various kinds of vegetables needful for family use."

"Although," Mr. Wilson says, in conclusion, "I have been many years in doing what capital could have done in much less time, yet I have the satisfaction of building up my little place by my own industry; laboring under very unfavorable circumstances, without capital, and without the use of my legs. But now I am in a forest of fruit trees planted by my own direction; and the soil drawn upon the roots by my own hands, as I sat upon the barrow or box. I can now view the works of the Almighty in the growth of these trees, and the production of their fruit."

We should spoil this little narrative by comment; its charm is in its simplicity; and if we are not mistaken it inculcates a lesson which will not be lost on men who possess the use of head, hands and legs, and yet suffer inertia and discouragement to creep over them. What toil was here voluntarily encountered—what golden fruits are the recompense! When we read of such heroic enterprise and then think of great hulking fellows shabbily loafing from one year's end to another, when there is abundance of rough land to be reclaimed and to be had almost for the asking, we feel our cheeks tingle with indignation. Such successful efforts as that recorded above prove the truth of the axiom spoken by the French mechanic who swam off at Marseilles to the ship which contained Kosuth, to greet the Hungarian patriot, "Nothing is impossible to him who wills." With faith and perseverance we may indeed work miracles; without them, the best gifts are thrown away.

A LOUD BELL.—The new bell which has recently been placed in the belfry of the Unitarian church at Quincy, Mass., can be distinctly heard a distance of seven miles. It weighs 3012 pounds.

SUMMER RESORTS.

In the present article, we propose to speak of some of the most charming features of New England scenery, confining ourselves to those places which are easily accessible by car or steamboat, the favorite resorts of summer tourists. We have called in the aid of artist and engraving to sketch what words fail accurately to delineate. Our first group of pictures relate to Lake Winnipiseogee, New Hampshire. In the whole range of New England there is no sheet of water comparable in beauty and picturesque scenery to Lake Winnipiseogee, the largest lake in New Hampshire. Other lakes of New England have exquisitely beautiful features; some of them wear the grace of historic association or romantic legend; but this lake is of itself a romance of nature, varied, enchanting, perfect. The line of shore is wonderfully varied, with the most capricious curving, doubling, receding and protruding; and forming, as it is drawn on paper, the most curious arabesque. This produces a constant succession of surprises to the voyager who skirts its wooded margin. And it is noticeable that in its whole circumference there is no spot inconsistent with the beauty of the design—no range of low, dreary marsh, no reedy sandbanks breaking the surface of the mirror, but everywhere a gentle or bold acclivity from the edge of the water. And, to protect this magnificent sheet of water from the suspicion even of monotony, Nature has gemmed it with a vast number of islands and islets, some of considerable extent, others so small that, seen from a distance, and viewed in connection with the vast expanse of water, they seem like baskets of leaf and rock-work. The leading characteristic of the lake is beauty, and its surroundings are entirely consonant with this feature and expression; for it will be remembered that it lies in the hill country and not in the mountain region. The lake-region is the vestibule to the mountain palaces beyond; the fairy-land that precedes the cloud-land; the gentle prelude to a grand oratorio. The frame-work in which it sets is just bold enough to enhance its beauty—no more. The Gunstock and Ossipee ranges are lofty and commanding, but they stop short of grandeur. Sometimes, of a clear, bright morning, as you glide along the north-eastern shore of the lake towards Centre Harbor, you behold the summit of Mount Washington gleaming in faint, pearly light on the horizon, and then you feel that you are among the hills, and that the mountains are yet far, far away. The traveller, when he first catches a glimpse of the lake, cannot fail to recognize the felicity of the Indian name it preserves—the “Smile of the Great Spirit.” It is the poetical title of a charming poem. It is indeed a smile of Omnipotence gladdening the earth. To appreciate it fully, one must view it from the summit of Mount Belknap or from Red Hill, at various hours of the day, as well as traverse it from end to end, and linger among its beautiful islands and along its winding shores. Not to have seen Lake Winnipiseogee, is to be ignorant of one of the most enchanting places. It is not a solitary landscape here that woos the eye, but an endless variety of landscapes changing with every change of the point of view, as a turn of the hand produces the magical transformations of the kaleidoscope. There are two routes by which the lake may be reached; one by the Boston, Concord and Montreal Railroad, which has a station at Wiers’, on the south-western shore of the lake, 33 miles from Concord, N. H., where the fine steamer "Lady of the Lake" awaits passengers; and the other by the Boston and Maine Railroad, as far as Dover, N. H., 68 miles; thence, by the Dover and Cochecho Railroad, to Alton Bay at the southeast extremity of Lake Winnepiseogee, 28 miles, where the steamer "Dover" takes passengers across the lake to Wolfboro' and Centre Harbor. Both these routes are pleasant, and we should counsel those making the excursion to go by the one and return by the other. The cars and boats on both lines offer the best accommodations. The Boston and Maine, Dover and Cochecho line is preferable in going, for the first view of the lake at Alton Bay is most striking, and the opening of the sea as you emerge from the deep bay, seven miles long, is charming. By either line, if you take the first morning train, you reach Centre Harbor or Wolfboro' in time for an early dinner.

Our artist has supplied us with a pretty sketch of the "Lady of the Lake" leaving Wiers'. She is a fine boat, commanded by Captain William Walker, a fine specimen of New England manhood, with a geniality that makes every one at home in his company. Captain Walker is as well known as any man in New Hampshire, having been connected with the travelling public for many years—in the good old stagecoach days on the Concord and Nashua line, and of late as commander of the "Lady." He is a very enterprising man, and is engaged in an extensive business in Concord. The first stopping-place of the boat on the lake is Centre Harbor, a very pretty town, a point of departure for the White Mountains, 32 miles from Conway. Here there are excellent accommodations at the Senter House, kept by Messrs. Gilman and Huntress, represented in one of our engravings. It has all the comforts and elegances of a city hotel, spacious and airy rooms, good beds, a good table, excellent saddle and harness horses, carriages, boats, fishing apparatus; in short, all the appliances to make a sojourn agreeable. It is 116 miles from Boston. Mr. Charlton, in "New Hampshire as it is," says: "Measley Pond and Squam Lake are partly in this town. In the latter, we found considerable quantities of fine trout. This is a beautiful sheet of water, six miles in length, and studded with islands, some of which are mere dots upon the waves, while others contain an acre or more, and in summer they are bright with verdure, or later in the season are smiling with the gifts of Ceres. From Red Hill the view of the lake is enchanting, and awakens in the mind of the beholder thoughts of some fairy land which mortals may sometimes catch a glimpse of, but never approach. The soil in this town is mostly a rich loam. The town is pleasantly situated, and its location probably gave rise to its present name. The first settlement was made in 1765 by Ebenezer Chamberlain. Centre Harbor is widely known as one of the most pleasant summer resorts in the country. Far from the noise of the crowded city and the petty annoyances of village gossip, the man of leisure or the man of business may find an asylum adapted to his wants."

After touching at Centre Harbor, we continue our voyage across the lake, a fine view of which is presented in one of our engravings, with a background of mist-wreathed hills. The boat finally reaches Wolfboro', a very pretty town, which Mr. Waud has delineated as seen from the lake. The large building seen over the stern of the "Dover" is the Pavilion, is an excellent hotel, kept by Mr. A. H. Danton, formerly of the Flume House. The Pavilion commands a fine view of the lake and of the Gunstock Mountains, and is within a stone's throw of the water. Mr. Charlton says of Wolfboro': "Situated on Lake Winnepiseogee, which touches its south-western border, while the lofty mountains of Ossipee and the rugged hills of Tuftonboro' rise up in the rear like the impregnable walls of a gigantic fortress, its whole scene presents a view at once picturesque and sublime. The trip across the lake, from Centre Harbor to Wolfboro' bridge, especially in a pleasant summer evening, is truly delightful. At sunset, when the evening shadows begin to fall upon the distant mountain tops, presenting their rugged outlines in bold relief, and the stars, gliding into the firmament, kindle up their brilliant fires in the depths of the clear blue waters, the excursion seems like a journey to the Elysian Fields. At this hour of the day the breezes of the lake are highly invigorating."

Our other views represent Meredith, Laconia and Lake Village, all in Meredith township, which covers an area of about 13 square miles. Meredith is a flourishing place. Lake Village, situated at the foot of Long Bay, which at Wiers' forms the outlet of Winnepiseogee Lake, is a thriving manufacturing place. Laconia is south of it, a flourishing manufacturing village, and the seat of considerable business. Our engraving represents the principal street. It is a well built village, and exhibits every evidence of thrift and prosperity. The neatness and beauty of these lake villages harmonize with the delightful scenery in which they are placed. The waters of Lake Winnepiseogee are remarkably pure, being fed from its own springs. Its height is about 472 feet above the sea level. It has been said to contain about 365 islands, but we believe the number really falls short of 300. Some of these islands comprise farms of five hundred acres. Besides being a "thing of beauty" and a "joy forever," Winnepiseogee is an immense source of material wealth, being a great reservoir of power for the immense manufacturing establishments of Manchester, Lowell and other places, which are situated on the Merrimac River.

The Rev. T. Starr King, in his beautiful illustrated work, "The White Hills; their Legends, Landscape and Poetry," published by Crosby, Nichols & Co.—a work which every lover of New England scenery should possess—devotes a considerable space to this magnificent sheet of water. We cannot do better than to quote some eloquent passages from this work. Speaking of the name of the lake, he asks—"Does this word mean 'the Smile of the Great Spirit,' or 'Pleasant Water in a High Place?' There has been a dispute, we believe, among the learned in Indian lore, as to the true rendering. Whatever the word means, the lake itself signifies both. Topographically, under the surveyor's eye, and mill-owner's estimates, it is pleasant water in a high place; about thirty miles long, and varying from one to seven miles in breadth; with railroad stations on its shores at Alton Bay and Weirs'; and a little more than a hundred miles distant from Boston." * * * "It is easy to give a grand description of the character of the shores of Winnipiseogee, to count its islands, and to enumerate the mountain ranges and peaks, with their names and height, that surround it. But it is not so easy to convey any impression, by words, of the peculiar loveliness which invests it, and which lifts it above the rank of a prosaic reservoir in Belknap and Carroll counties in New Hampshire, about five hundred feet above the sea, into an expression of the Divine art renewed every summer by the Creator. There is very little cultivation around the borders of Lake Winnipiseogee. The surroundings are scarcely less wild than they were when, in 1652, Captains Edward Johnson and Simon Willard carved their initials, which are still visible, on the 'Endicott Rock,' near its outlet. The straggling parties of Indians who pass by it now, on their not of wild, but of cheerful and symmetrical beauty.

"Artists generally, we believe, find better studies on Lake George. It may be there is more of manageable picturesqueness in the combination of its coves and cliffs; but we think that for larger proportioned landscape—to be enjoyed by the eye, if it cannot be easily handled by the pencil or brush—Winnipiseogee is immeasurably superior. We cannot imagine a person tramping through a whole summer, of its artistic and infinite variety, while it could hardly be that the eye, in the daily and familiar acquaintances of a whole season with Lake George, would not feel the need of wide reaches in the mountain views, richer combinations of the forest wilderness with retreating slopes and lines bathed in 'the tenderest purple of the distance,' and with glimpses, now and then, such as the New Hampshire lake furnishes, of sovereign summits that heave upon the horizon their vague, firm films. Mr. Everett said a few years since, in a speech, that Switzerland has no lovelier view for the tourist than the way to trade with visitors at the Flume House in Franconia, see it but little more civilized in expression than their forefathers did, whose wigmans, before Massachusetts felt the white man's foot, spotted the meadows of the Merrimac below.

"When the old smoked in silence their pipes, and the young
To the pike and the white perch their baited lines flung;
Where the boy shaped his arrows, and where the shy maid
Wove her many-hued baskets and bright wampum braid."

"And yet it is not a sense of seclusion amid the forests, of being shut in by untamed hills amid the heart of the wilderness, that Winnipiseogee inspires. Indeed, the lake is not shut in by any abrupt mountain walls. Its islands and shores fringe the water with winding lines and long, narrow capes of green. But the mountains retreat gradually back from them, with large spaces of cheerful light, or vistas of more gently sloping land between. The whole impression is lake we are speaking of affords. And Rev. Mr. Bartol, of Boston, in his charming volume, 'Pictures of Europe,' tells us: 'There may be lakes in Tyrol and Switzerland which, in particular respects, exceed the charms of any in the Western world. But in that wedding of the land with the water, in which one is perpetually approaching and retreating from the other, and each transforms itself into a thousand figures for an endless dance of grace and beauty, till a countless multitude of shapes are arranged into perfect ease and freedom, of almost musical motion, nothing can be beheld to surpass, if not to match, our Winnipiseogee!' It is, of course, in moving over the lake, on a steamer or in a boat, that this 'musical motion' of the shores is caught. We will abide the judgment of any tourist as to the extravagance of this quotation, if he has an eye competent to look through the land to landscape, and becomes acquainted with the lake from the deck of a steamer on an auspicious summer day. The sky is clear; there are just clouds enough to relieve the soft blue, and fleck the sentinel hills with shadows, and over the wide panorama of distant mountains, a warm, dreamy haze settles, tinging them, as Emerson says the south wind, in May-days,

"Tints the human countenance
With a color of romance."

"Perhaps there is at first a faint breeze, just enough to fret the water, and roughen and mesotint the reflections of the shore. But as we shoot out into the breadth of the lake, and take in the wide scene, there is no ripple on its bosom. The little islands float over liquid silver, and glide by each other silently, as in the movements of a dance, while our boat changes her heading. And all around the mountains, swelling softly, or cutting the sky with jagged lines of steady blue, vie with the molten mirrors at our feet for the privilege of holding the eye. The "sun-sparks" blaze thick as stars upon the glassy wrinkles of the water. Leaning over the side of the steamer gazing on the exquisite curves of the water just outside the foamy splash of the wheels, watching the countless threads of silver that stream out from the shadow of the wheel-house, seeing the steady iris float with us to adorn our flying spray, and then looking up to the broken sides of the Ossiipee mountains that are rooted in the lake, over which huge shadows loiter; or back to the twin Belknap hills, that appeal to softer sensibilities, with their verdured symmetry; or, further down, upon the charming succession of mounds that hem the shores near Wolfboro'; northward, where distant Chocorua lifts his bleached head, so tenderly touched now with gray and gold, to defy the hottest sunlight, as he has defied for ages the lightning and storm; does it not seem as though the passage of the Psalms is fulfilled before our eyes, 'Out of the perfection of beauty God hath shined?'

"The lines of the Sandwich mountains, on the northwest, of which the lonely Chocorua, who seems to have pushed his fellows away from him, is the most northerly summit, are the most striking features of the borders of the lake. An American artist who had lived many years in Italy, on a recent visit to this country, went to Winnipiscogee with the writer of these pages. He was greatly impressed and charmed with the outlines of this range, which is seen at once from the boat as she leaves Weir's landing. He had not supposed that any water view in New England was bordered with such a mountain frame. And before the steamer had shot out from the bay on the bosom of the lake, he had transferred to his sketch-book its long continuation of domes and heavy scrolls and solid walls, all leading to a pyramid that supports a peak desolate and sheer.

"The most striking picture, perhaps, to be seen on the lake, is a view which is given of the Sandwich range in going from Weir's to Centre Harbor, as the steamer shoots across a little bay, after passing Bear Island, about four miles from the latter village. The whole chain is seen several miles away, as you look up the bay, between Red Hill on the left, and the Ossiipee mountains on the right. If there is no wind, and if there are shadows enough from clouds to spot the range, the beauty will seem weird and unsubstantial, as though it might fade away the next minute. The weight seems to be taken out of the mountains. We might almost say

'They are but sailing foam-bells
Along Thought's caressing stream,
And take their shape and sun-color
From him that sends the dream.'

Only they do not sail, they repose. The quiet of the water and the sleep of the hills seem to have the quality of still ecstasy. It is only inland water that can suggest and inspire such rest. The sea itself, though it can be clear, is the sense that a mountain lake can be calm. The sea only seems to pause; the mountain lake to sleep and to dream.

"But there is one view which, though far less lovely, is more exciting to one who has been a frequent visitor of the mountains. It is where Mt. Washington is visible from a portion of the steamer's track, for some fifteen or twenty minutes. Passing by the westerly declivity of the Ossiipee ridge, looking across a low slope of the Sandwich range, and far back of them, a dazzling white spot perhaps—if it is very early in the summer—gleams on the northern horizon. Gradually it mounts and mounts, and then runs down again as suddenly, making us wonder, possibly, what it can be. A minute or two more, and the unmistakable majesty of Washington is revealed. There he rises, forty miles away, towering from a plateau built for his throne, dim green in the distance, except the dome that is crowned with winter, and the strange figures that are scrawled around his waist in snow.

"Why should all the nearer splendors affect an old visitor of the hills less than that spectacle? Why should Whiteface, which seems, at a careless glance, much higher by its nearness, or the haughty Chocorua, make less joyous emotion than that tinted etching on the northern sky? Why will not a cloud thrice as lofty and distinct in its outline, suggest such power and awaken such enthusiasm? Is there a physical cause for it? Is it that the volcanic power expended in upheaving one of the supreme summits,

'When with inward fire and pain
It rose a bubble from the plain,'

is permanently funded there, and is suggested to the mind whenever we see even the outlines in the distant air, thus making it represent more vitality and force than any pile of thunderous vapor can? Or is it explained by the law of association—because we know, in looking at these faint forms, that their crests have no rivals in our northern latitude this side of the Rocky Mountains—that the pencilled shadows of their foreground are the deepest gorges which land-slides have channelled and torrents have worn in New England, and that from their crown a wider area is measured by the eye than can be seen on this side of the Mississippi?

"How admirably and tenderly Mr. Ruskin has touched this point in a passage which our readers will thank us that we quote for them from the third volume of the 'Modern Painters': 'Examine the nature of your own emotion (if you feel it) at the sight of an Alp, and you find all the brightness of that emotion hanging, like dew on goosamer, on a curious web of subtle fancy and imperfect knowledge. First, you have a vague idea of its size, coupled with wonder at the work of the Great Builder of its walls and foundations; then an apprehension of its eternity, a pathetic sense of its perpetuallness, and your own transientness, as of the grass upon its sides; then, and in this very sadness, a sense of strange companionship with past generations in seeing what they saw. They did not see the clouds that are floating over your head; nor the cottage wall on the other side of the field; nor the road by which you are travelling. But they saw that. The wall of granite in the heavens was the same to them as to you. They have ceased to look upon it; you will soon cease to look also, and the granite wall will be for others. Then, mingled with these more solemn imaginations, come the understanding of the gifts and glories of the Alps, the fancying forth of all the fountains that well from its rocky walls, and strong rivers that are born out of its ice, and of all the pleasant valleys that wind between its cliffs, and all the chalets that gleam among its clouds, and happy farmsteads couched upon its pastures; while together with the thoughts of these rise strange sympathies with the unknown of human life and happiness, and death, signified by that narrow white flame of the everlasting snow, seen so far in the morning sky. These images, and far more than these, lie at the root of the emotion which you feel at the sight of the Alp. You may not trace them in your heart, for there is a great deal more in your heart of evil and good, than you ever can trace; but they stir you and quicken you for all that. Assuredly, so far as you feel more at beholding the snowy mountain than any other object of the same sweet silvery gray, these are the kind of images which cause you to do so;

LAKE WINNIPISCOGUE.

LACONIA, NEW HAMPSHIRE.

and, observe, these are nothing more than a greater apprehension of the facts of the thing. We call the power 'Imagination,' because it imagines or conceives; but it is only noble imagination if it imagines or conceives the truth."

We have made a long extract from the "White Hills," but we shall be satisfied if it induce our readers to purchase that fascinating book, and with that in hand, for a guide, to explore the scenery it so vividly describes. To Mr. King's eloquent prose, let us add the poem by Whittier which he prefixes to that division of his book devoted to Lake Winnepiseogee.

SUMMER BY THE LAKE-SIDE.

NOON.

White clouds, whose shadows haunt the deep:
Light mists, whose soft embraces keep
The sunshine on the hills asleep!

O, isles of calm!—O, dark, still wood!
And stiller skies, that overbrood
Your rest with deeper quietude!

O, shapes and hues, dim beckoning through Yon mountain gape, my longing view
Beyond the purple and the blue,

To stiller sea and greener land,
And softer lights and air more bland,
And skies—the hollow of God's hand!

Transfused through you, O mountain friends!
With mine your solemn spirit blends,
And life no more hath separate ends.

I read each misty sign,
I know the voice of wave and pine,
And I am yours, and ye are mine.

Life's burdens fall—its discords cease;
I lapse into the glad release
Of nature's own exceeding peace.

O, welcome calm of heart and mind!
As falls yon fir-tree's loosened rind,
To leave a tenderer growth behind,

So fall the weary years away;
A child again, my head I lay
Upon the lap of this sweet day.

This western wind hath Lethæan powers;
Yon noonday cloud Nepenthe showers;
The lake is white with lotus-flowers!

But the traveller, enchanted, must not linger too long by the shores of this magic lake, lulled to inactivity by the syren song of its tiny waves. Let him look upon this lovely lake and hill region as the charming vestibule to the grand theatre of sublime beauty that lies beyond. When satiated with that majestic scenery he may return to Lake Winnepiseogee for calmer emotion in his reactionary state.

After having passed as many days as you like at Wolfboro', or Centre Harbor, embark on the steamer for Weir's Landing, and take the cars for Plymouth. There stages will be in readiness to take you to the Flume House in the Franconia Notch. Secure a seat on the driver's box on the roof of the coach. The mere ride, after a long experience of railroad cars, is in itself exhilarating and refreshing. It brings back old times, to look down from your airy eminence on the four spirited horses, that are pawing, snorting, and champing their bits, eager to dash forward on the road. That road runs parallel to the Pemi-gewasset, which, clear as crystal, pours along over its rocky bed, now flowing smooth and swift, now brawling and foaming where its channel has a deep inclination. As you advance, the bold mountain background rises higher and higher, always crowning the distance with a splendid amphitheatre of hills. You pass through pleasant settlements, through cultivated farms, past luxuriant groves of sugar maples and charming patches of forest, the scenery gradually changing from the pastoral to the romantic and stern. Halt for the rest of the day and night at the Flume House, an admirable hotel. In its vicinity are the Pool, a sheet of water filling a huge rocky bowl, with a cataract descending into a most romantic glen, and the Flume, where the water roars down through a rocky gorge, and under a huge boulder which has been wedged into the rocky gateway above the descending torrent, and high above the foot-path which leads under. The next day continue on to the Profile House. The famous Old Man of the Mountain, and the Profile Lake, and the stern Eagle Cliff, are most romantic objects. The stage ride from the Profile House, through the Franconia Notch, making a wide curve round to the Crawford House, presents a most exciting variety of mountain views. From the Crawford House you will of course ride down the Crawford Notch and see the Willey house, which escaped destruction in the landslide that overwhelmed the unfortunate Willey family, as they fled to what they deemed a surer place of refuge, and the charming Silver Cascade. The next day you will start fresh on the ascent to the summit of Mount Washington, either on horseback or on foot. Either way it is toilsome; but were it twice as fatiguing, the glorious views obtained from every point of the ascent amply compensate the adventurer, and wean his thoughts from bodily care. And if the day be propitious, how grand, how glorious the spectacle from the bald, storm-beaten, lightning-seared crest of the monarch of New England mountains! The eye sweeps a circle of six hundred miles, and a semi-diameter of eighty. Mountains, lakes, forests, villages, whichever way you turn your gaze. Perhaps a thunder-cloud sails by far below your feet, its voice sounding like the rumble of distant artillery, its lightnings blazing harmlessly to you, its showers drenching valleys twenty miles distant. If the day be perfectly clear, you may see, what few indeed ever behold from that awful height, the Atlantic Ocean gleaming in the far, far distance. The whole scene, once beheld, is never forgotten.

But we must not linger by mountain and lake. If we love the mountain, we have no less affection for the sea, and we advise our friends to divide their leisure days of relaxation between the two. For those who are tied by business or economy to the city during the "heated term," it is fortunate that the means of access to various points of beauty along the coast are easy and cheap. In July and August there is a universal craving for the sea side; we must, at least for the space of a few hours, lave our wearied limbs in the tide, or sit gazing forth upon the illimitable expanse, with its undying motion, its fitful changes, and its solemn mystery. One never wearies of the ocean; perhaps because one can never claim to possess it. On other works of nature man can make his impress. He can carve his initials on the face of the precipice; he can plant his flag upon the rocky pinnacle his foot has scaled. But the ocean knows no master; admits no human seal or badge of servitude. Navies plough it with their victorious keels, but the furrows are filled up even before the gleam of their white sails and the gloom of their dark batteries have faded into distance. We win, here and there, a little strip of land or rock from the ocean, but elsewhere it storms our lines and sweeps away our battlements, and chants its unceasing song of victory as its surges boil over its conquest. And for one life rescued from the deep, a thousand skeletons are bleaching in those hollow caverns that plummet-line never sounded.

Perhaps Jones, Brown and Robinson never think of these things as they "go down to the sea," not "in ships," but in yachts. They go to have a good time—to sail, to fish, to dance, to flirt, to enjoy music and chowder and cigars, and to chant a "wet sheet and a flowing sea," and J.,

SENER HOUSE, AT CENTRE HARBOR, N. H.

B. and R. are in the right. Old Neptune can be a jolly good fellow when he likes, and in certain moods sympathizes with human merriment. Even Fashion sometimes comes not amiss when its rainbow hues are tinted with water-colors. The diving-bells of Newport do not appear out of keeping. Civilization may perch by the sea side and not seem out of place. Glittering equipages may roll along the Newport and Nahant beaches, and jar not on the sense of fitness. We have paced the piazza of the Nahant Hotel on a moonlight night, when the fresh land breeze wandered out to sea and broke its surface into a million brilliant dimples, when the light of the gay saloon streamed forth to meet the lights of the sky, and the music of the orchestra and the laughter of light hearts blended with the waves on the rocks and sands, and all the features and all the sounds of the scene mingled in harmony and sympathy.

But for our own part we need no adventitious appliances to enhance the fascination of the sea. We feel that "there is a rapture on the lonely shore." We can pass a long summer day in a nook of the rocks, without either book or fishing-rod, or other companionship save that of the blue, mysterious deep. The phenomena of a day at the sea side are varied and interesting. The cold gray dawn—the kindling of the horizon at the approach of sunrise, the glorious flush of the first beam of the daystar, the blazing birth of light, are, each time they are renewed before us, so many visions of enchantment. Then that mysterious ebb and flow of the tide is ever a marvel. We love, too, to gaze on the white sails that go forth upon their adventurous career, and to please our fancy with picturing the crews and the passengers they carry, and speculating on their hopes and fears, their joys and sorrows. Other treasures than those acknowledged in the bills of lading go forth in these brave barks—the treasures of peerless manhood and of woman's priceless love. And then the white-winged merchantmen standing in homeward bound—what strange lands have they not visited! Securely, through storm and calm, they have borne to our shores the spices of Araby, the breath of Persian roses, the silks of India, the gold and ivory of Africa, the furs of the frozen north, the glowing fruits of the tropics. Haply there sweeps across our horizon a man-of-war, with her trim masts and snowy canvass and stern armament, bearing the constellated flag, the proudest ensign that ever floated over the mists of ocean and the smoke of battle. A thousand memories of glorious deeds rise as the stately frigate moves on her liquid pathway.

As the day strides on, and the noontide heat increases, our imagination wanders far away to the tropics. We are strolling beneath arches of fluttering palms, or plunging, with the children of nature, in the bright waves of the Pacific, or once more we are gliding over the waters of the Gulf as the stern defences of the "Pearl of the Antilles" rise upon our vision.

But the daylight wanes; the sun has sunk; the sea is a dark purple, verging on black, like an imperial pall, embroidered with phosphorescent stars, awhile on high, the lamps of heaven are lit to guide the mariner upon his way. Or, if the weather be threatening, and clouds obscure the heavens, then the threatening sea seems to whisper hoarsely a confession of the dark deed it has witnessed or performed. Then come thronging and surging on the memory dismal tales of the ocean—the tragedies of the mighty deep—visions of redhanded murders perpetrated under the shadow of the black flag; of wrecks, announced long afterwards by such slight tokens as a shattered boat, a floating spar, a piece of gilded scroll-work. We think of the argosies and galleons that have gone down with stores of gold and silks and wine; of the bones that lie bleaching on that pavement of the sea no human eye has ever looked upon; of the misshapen monsters science has never described that haunt the lower deeps, waging fierce battles with each other, and making that submarine world hideous and appalling to the imagination.

It is high time to leave the pageant; the play is played out; the curtain is fallen, and the night air grows chill. But we cannot call the day misspent. We have gained health and strength during our long commune with nature; we have experienced vivid sensations; we have quaffed in draughts of poetry and romance, the effect of which will endure through many a long monotonous day of common life. Born beside the sea, we love it as the mountaineer loves his rugged home, and whether it breaks in music ripples at our feet, or dashes on the rocks before us, like a wild berseker, we ever greet it as a friend.

Our artist has helped along our gossip about the seaside by three spirited sketches of Hull—the magnetic telegraph station, Telegraph Hill, the Oregon House, and the Mansion House. The town of Hull is quite celebrated—small as it is, it has made its record; and “as Hull goes so goes the State,” is often an amusing quotation in political circles. It is a great resort in summer for our citizens, who flock thither to enjoy the fine scenery, the delicious ocean breezes, the boating, fishing and other amusements incidental to a watering place. It is only eleven miles from Boston, and has steamboat communication with the city. The Mansion House is finely situated a few rods east of the landing, and near the water's edge, which makes it very convenient for bathers. The shore is covered with boats and promenaders, and really the frail craft that are hauled up on the shore look quite inviting. They revive in our minds memories of many a pleasant pull in the bay, and many a grand haul of codfish, afterwards converted into an appetizing chowder. Nothing is more invigorating than a good pull at the oar, and if our fashionable visitors at watering places would make up their minds to do a little work instead of abandoning themselves to dissipation, they would return to the city in a far better condition than when they left it, which is not always the case. The Oregon House has a fine, pleasant situation, with extensive grounds. From Telegraph Hill, the visitor will obtain an extensive panoramic view of Boston, Charlestown, the harbor, etc. Boston looks finely from this point, which is just far enough distant to lend enchantment to the view. Boston harbor opens to the sea between two points nearly four miles distant from each other—Point Alderton on Nantasket, and Point Shirley in Chelsea. It is sheltered from the ocean by the peninsulas of which these two points are the extremities, and a large number of islands, between which there are three entrances. The main passage, which is about three miles southeast of the navy-yard, and so narrow as scarcely to permit two vessels to pass abreast, lies between Castle and Governor's Islands, and is defended by Fort Independence and Fort Warren. A passage north of Governor's Island is also protected by Fort Warren. A new fortress of great size and strength on George's Island, will guard the entrance to the outer or lower harbor. The entire surface included within Point Alderton and Point Shirley, is estimated at seventy-five square miles, about half of which affords anchorage ground for vessels of the largest class. It is easy of access, free from sand-bars, and seldom obstructed by ice. The town of Hull was a mart of commerce, and the residence of eminent men, six years before Boston bore its present name, and five years before Salem became a town. Standing on the Telegraph Hill, Boston will present a far different appearance from that it presented in 1633, when Wood wrote his description of it, though some of the natural features remain unchanged. It is curious as we gaze over the blue waters on the crowded city, rising from the sea, belted with its forest of masts, to recall what was then written of it. "Boston," says Wood, "is two miles northeast of Roxbury. Its situation is very pleasant, being a peninsula, hemmed in on the south side by the bay of Roxbury, and on the north side with Charles River, the marshes on the back being not half of a quarter of a mile over; so that a little fencing will secure their cattle from the wolves. It being a neck, and bare of wood, they are not troubled with these great annoyances—wolves, rattlesnakes and mosquitoes. Those that live here upon their cattle must be constrained to take farms in the country, or else they cannot subsist, the place being too small to contain many, and fittest for such as can trade with England for such commodities as the country wants, being the chief place for shipping and merchandize. This neck of land is not above four miles in compass, in form almost square, having on the south side at one corner, a great broad hill, whereon is located a fort, which can command any ship as she sails into the harbor within the still bay. On the north side is another hill, equal in bigness, whereon stands a windmill. To the northwest is a high mountain, with three little rising hills on the top of it, wherefore it is called the Trimount. From the top of this mountain a man may overlook all the islands which lie within the bay, and discover such ships as are on the sea-coast. This town, though it be neither the greatest nor the richest, yet is the most noted and frequented, being the centre of the plantation, where the monthly courts are kept. Here, likewise, dwells the governor. This place has very good land, affording rich corn-fields and fruitful gardens, having likewise sweet and pleasant springs. The inhabitants of this place, for their enlargement, have taken to themselves farm-houses in a place called Muddy River (Brookline), two miles from the town, where there is good grass, large timber, store of marsh land and meadow. In this place they keep their swine and other cattle in the summer, whilst the corn is in the granary at Boston, and bring them to town in winter." Yes—times have indeed changed, and we have changed with them. Land enough for a small farm within the city of Boston costs rather too much to render the raising of Indian corn profitable now. But still, as then, the environs of the city are charming. Still the broad bay offers a thousand picturesque features, and a thousand pure delights; for we must never lose sight of the fact, that Boston is a watering-place. Though thousands of her citizens are ignorant of the charms of the bay, and refuse to partake of them, yet there are other thousands who fully appreciate and enjoy them, the yacht-men, boating-men, fishermen and artists.

THE HAIR AND ITS COLOR.

A young lady friend of mine was recommended by a coiffeur to use sage water. She was obliged to discontinue its daily use, as it made her hair too thick. Pour boiling water on the sage leaves, and let them remain some time in an oven or near a stove, then strain and apply to the roots of the hair daily. If any pomade is needed, an equal mixture of cocoa-nut and olive oils, with a little perfume, is very efficacious.—London Field.

SNAKES IN INDIA.

If there is anything in the world of which I entertain a deep-rooted hatred and an uncontrollable dread, that object undoubtedly is a snake, and next to a snake, anything in the shape of a lizard, scorpion, toad, or other reptile; nevertheless, it seems to have been decreed that from my earliest infancy upwards, I should be doomed to be exposed to perpetual encounters and adventures with these loathsome creepers upon the earth. The first clear, tangible object that fixed itself upon my memory—I could have been very little more than two years old at the time of the occurrence—was a hideous cobra coiling itself under the pillow of my Indian nurse, who slept on a mat on the floor; and the first word I could distinctly articulate was "Pambo" (tamul-snake), with which cry, and pointing with my finger, I drew attention to the unwelcome intruder, and forthwith got him despatched. Then a long blank intervenes, reaching over nearly three years; after which, my adventures may be termed legion. The next incident relating to reptiles which I can recall to mind is connected with my brother Bill—who was older than myself—and a small white scorpion. Bill had been trying to unlock a large padlock on the fowl-house; and being unsuccessful, poked his little finger into the keyhole, and immediately, to my immense astonishment and amusement, performed a most extraordinary dance round the yard, accompanying the same by the most hideous howls, contortions, and grimaces. But I had no idea at the moment, of course, that he had been stung by a venomous reptile.

One very heavy monsoon at Madras, when the rain had swollen the river to such an extent that it flooded the country for miles around, I was standing in the billiard-room surveying the dreary aspect out of the windows, when my attention was suddenly arrested by the moribund groans of a frog, and turning round, I saw a huge snake under the billiard-table in the very act of engorging it. Sliding in at the opposite door was Mrs. Cobra and her young family, driving before them some wretched little frogs, which were vainly endeavoring to escape from their relentless pursuers. One bound on to the billiard-table, and another off it, and into the verandah, cleared me of my disagreeable neighbors; but, before nightfall that day, twenty-seven snakes of all descriptions and sizes were killed in that billiard-room by the servants. The waters rose so high that every house in Madras suffered from a perfect visitation of reptiles, and not only reptiles, but jackals and birds sought an asylum in the homes of men, with bandicoots, rats, scorpions—in short, sufficient reptile material to fit a very decent museum of natural history.

I was sitting in a traveller's bungalow once at a place called Otagerri, between Madras and the Malabar coast, and my friend was sitting near the door, so as to catch as much daylight as possible, reading some work from the little library with which government and voluntary contributions furnish those bungalows. Suddenly, I perceived that a large snake had coiled itself round the back of his chair, and was poking its head between his arm and his body, as though seeking for some other hold. For a moment, I was paralyzed, and the next the snake had shifted its search, and was rapidly coiling round the young officer's neck. At the same instant, a servant made his appearance opposite the door, and got so frightened, that he fell to the ground in a fainting fit. My friend was luckily a man of immense nerve and great presence of mind; he saw at a glance that his only chance was to remain as still as a statue; the slightest move would have alarmed the snake, and then nothing could have saved him. I, on my part, sat motionless, with my heart frozen through and through. In a very few seconds, fortunately, the servant and palkee-bearers returned from the tope, where they had been having their curry and rice, and the noise of their approach alarmed the snake (then coiled round and round the body of S—) so much, that it unwrapped itself rapidly, and slid as rapidly away to its hole. S— fainted instantly when he found himself safe; and my anxiety had been so intense, that I felt ill for many days afterwards. On relating this adventure to Major W—, whom we met at the very next station, he told us one of his own serpent experiences.

"I commanded," said the major, "the detachment of foot-artillery stationed in the fort at Masulipatam—a horrid place as you know, gentlemen, for any Christian to be quartered. Mrs. W— was just recovering from a severe illness, and, for the first time for many a day, was able to join me at the tiffin-table. Most fortunately, I was on a garrison court-martial that day, and had my sword hanging by its belt to the chair back. Our bungalow was a tiled one, with no intervening platform or other roof; and suddenly there dropped upon the table between us an immense cobra, who had been most likely hunting for squirrels' nests amongst the conical tiles. Raising its hooded head, and hissing horribly, the reptile threatened alternately to dart at one or the other of us, its venomous fangs protruding a full inch. As for Mrs. W—, she had fallen back in her chair perfectly unconscious; and never for a second removing my eye from the snake's, I gradually unsheathed my sword, and suddenly bounding aside at the same instant, severed its head from its body. It was a hairbreadth escape, I can assure you, for both of us."

Some time afterwards, I was residing at Chittoor, in North Arcot, and there was a little detached storehouse or godown, as they are called, where I kept my supply of beer and other European luxuries. I always kept the key of this place myself, and one morning, as was my wont, went in to get out some articles for the day. The door was the only place of ingress or egress, and the godown, which was thatched with palm-leaves, could not boast of a single window, darkness being a requisite in those hot countries for that kind of storehouse. What I required took me to the very further extremity of the room from the door, and I was just stooping down to select what I wanted, when I heard a tremendous flop behind me, and then a scuffle. Turning round, I saw a cobra and a rat having a regular pitched battle. The cobra had been after the rat's young ones, and the infuriated mother was thirsting for revenge. Though much alarmed for my own safety—for I had no means of escape without passing the cobra—I soon became intensely interested in the combat. At first, the rat fought with the greatest caution, hopping from side to side with remarkable agility, and avoiding the poisoned fangs of the cobra; at last, however, the snake—which in the interval had received many severe bites—stung his adversary, and then the rat, apparently aware that its case was now hopeless, grew reckless, and closed in with its opponent. In less than two minutes, it succeeded in killing the snake, and then crawling aside upon some straw, the victor died, apparently in the greatest agonies.

I had another illustration of the enmity existing between rats and snakes, many years afterwards, in Syria. I had sat up late reading a file of the Times newspaper; the servants had all been in bed for hours, and when I withdrew to my own, it wanted only a few hours to daylight. As I closed my bedroom door, I was startled by a tussling under the chest of drawers close by, and the next instant a rat darted out, followed by a huge black snake, and these two set to work fighting right against the door. In my alarm, I upset the chair on which I had placed the candle, and found myself at once in utter darkness, locked in with a snake and a ferocious rat. To jump upon my bed was the work of an instant, and loudly did I bellow for assistance out of the window. I might as well have called to the winds to aid me. I had neither match nor weapon of defence save a bolster, and the room was so dark that I could not distinguish my own hand though held close before my nose. When the scuffle ceased, I expected every instant to feel the horrid clammy snake twisting itself round my legs, and in that unenviable anticipation I remained three long hours, till broad daylight relieved me of my fears, and I found both combatants dead before the door.

I have never, in all my experience, found snakes to be the aggressors, unless you get them into a cul de sac, or during their period of breeding. Then the cobra is indeed terrible, and I was chased by one at Tellicherry for nearly half an hour, escaping the brute only by doubling quickly round until I stumbled over a stout bamboo, armed with which weapon I soon despatched it. At the best of times, it is nervous work coming to close quarters with the cobra—one false aim, and you are a dead man. People have a notion that the green snake of India—which is certainly a pretty specimen, if anything in the shape of a snake can be pretty—is harmless; I can prove to the contrary. One day I saw a beautiful mango bird dangling from a bamboo-bush; the glare was intense, and I wore blue spectacles, for which reason, perhaps, I could not well distinguish the cause of the phenomenon, and supposing it to have been trapped by some wile, I seized the bird as a great prize, for I was making a collection to bring home with me. In a second afterwards, the glass of my right-eye spectacle was shattered to pieces, and I hardly recovered from my amazement, when the snake, disappointed of his aim, wriggled off into the thickest of the bush. The glasses saved my eye and my life, for the poor mango-bird was riddled through and through the head, from one eye to the other, and every atom of brain had been abstracted. They are dainty gentlemen some of these snakes, and I was well acquainted with one that preferred turkey's eggs for his breakfast to any other. I used to watch my turkeys as they strayed about the grounds, and mark their nests, leaving them undisturbed until they began to sit. One hen had fixed upon a myrtle-bush, round which she used to flutter and scream every day, poking her stupid-looking head out in so strange a fashion, that I was once induced to watch her. No sooner had she deposited her egg, than a cobra made his appearance, and with the greatest dexterity sucked the egg. With greater wisdom than the fabled destroyer looks as if it was afflicted with leprosy, and which has the astonishing faculty of throwing itself ten yards across from one upright wall to another. If he carry his inclination for study still further, he can investigate the mysteries of a Siamese stew, and find alligator the chief ingredient. He will find ample opportunity of collecting out of his soup-plate, tea-cup, wine-glass, or the hair of his head, or from off the back of his hand, specimens of the mosquito-fly, ant, greenbug, grasshopper bug, vulgus, earwig, flea, of the goose and the golden eggs, the cobra spared the turkey to supply his dainty breakfast.

But if the reader wishes to study the natural history of reptiles to perfection, I recommend him to live a month or two at Bang-kok, in Siam. He will have the satisfaction, when he wakes of a morning, to see a snake peeping out of a hole in each corner of the room, and two or three little ones amusing themselves at hide-and-seek on the floor. If he looks up at the ceiling, he will perceive a specimen of the lizard tribe, called the Toquay—from its peculiar cry—a lizard that in all the diversified branches of each genus. Nor when the fatigues of day are over, and he dons his slippers for ease and comfort, need he be surprised to find a scorpion in one, and a centipede in the other, while a colony of white ants are investigating the merits of literature in his bookcase.—Journal of a British Officer in India.

A TRADE, A FORTUNE.

If parents would consider the welfare and happiness of their children, they would choose the virtuous mechanic, farmer or honest trader, as companions and helpmates instead of the rich, who, aside from their income, have no means of subsistence. How often does this question arise, and from religious parents, too, in choosing companions and suitors for their daughters: "Is he rich?" If the daughter answers, "Yes, he is rich, he is a gentleman, neat in his dress, and can live without work," the parents are pleased.

Not many years ago, a Polish lady, of plebeian birth, but of exceeding beauty and accomplishment, won the affections of a young nobleman, who, having her consent, solicited her from her father in marriage, and was refused. We may easily imagine the astonishment of the nobleman.

"Am I not," said he, "of sufficient rank to aspire to your daughter's hand?"

"You are undoubtedly the best blood of Poland."

"And my fortune and reputation, are they not—"

"Your estate is magnificent, and your conduct irreproachable."

"Then, having your daughter's consent, should I expect a refusal?"

"This, sir," the father replied, "is my only child, and her happiness is the chief concern of my life. All the possessions of fortune are precarious; what fortune gives, at her caprices she takes away. I see no security of independence and comfortable living of a wife but one; in a word, I am resolved that no one shall be the husband of my daughter who is not at the same time master of a trade."

The nobleman bowed and retired silently. A year or two afterward, the father was sitting at the door, and saw, approaching the house, wagons laden with baskets, and at the head of the cavalcade a person in the dress of a basket-maker. And who do you suppose it was? The former suitor of his daughter; the nobleman had turned basket-maker. He was now master of a trade, and brought the wares made by his hands for inspection, and a certificate from his employer in testimony of his skill. The condition being fulfilled, no further obstacle was opposed to the marriage. But the story is not yet done. The revolution came; fortunes were plundered, and lords were scattered as chaff before the four winds of heaven. Kings became beggars, some of them teachers; and the noble Pole supported his wife and her father in the infirmities of age, by his basket-making industry.—Journal of Education.

TYROLESE GLEE SINGERS.

We heard beautiful singing as we approached the inn. I had understood that the Tyrolean minstrels, who lately delighted so many English audiences, only gave a specimen of the singing daily heard amid these mountains. I found this true. The men we had left in the garden were taking their different parts in the harmony. We sat down and listened. And now they filled their empty jugs, and standing up, knocked them together, and chanted such a stave of wild, sweet notes as I think I never heard before; the tenor giving out the last word of their drinking song with such a shout, so melodious, so careless, so free, he made the very hills ring again, and my heart is echoing it still. In return we sang "Home, Sweet Home." They seemed greatly interested in the simple English song, and at its close raised their hats and bowed with the grace of well-bred gentlemen. They gave us some of their peculiar mountain cries, commencing with a loud scream, and quickly dropping down at musical intervals. Most strange and mysterious, the first note sounded like the unearthly screech of some sprite away in those mighty forests, which having first startled us poor mortals, then broke into a mocking laugh, that grew fainter as it sped away to some more distant summit. Before leaving these fine mountaineers, we sang "God Save the Queen." As we concluded they rose, and to our delight, sang it in exquisite harmony, to German words. The compliment was lost upon us, and the glorious notes of our national anthem were wondrously sweet amid the Tyrolean valleys, a thousand miles from home. Our coachman was impatient, and we reluctantly drove away from Siegsdorf. Our minstrel friends gave us three hearty cheers at parting. After we had gone a little distance, the landlord rushed out from the door, and, waving his hat over head, gave us a farewell mountain cry that filled the whole valley with music. It was a most inspiring outburst that left an impression on our minds which was not for a long time obliterated, nor even now is it forgotten.—Through the Tyrol to Venice.

FANNIE'S HAIR.

BY WILLIE WARE.

I'm gazing on a token now,
A treasure pure and fit,
Which memory loves and values much—
This curl of Fannie's hair.

I gaze, and sad tears slowly steal:
Nothing my grief can share,
Save this fair golden treasure bright—
This curl of Fannie's hair.

When fortune frowns upon my path,
And I'm bowed down with care,
Solace I find by gazing on
This little lock of hair.

Ah, loved memento!—alike tree!
Precious beyond compare!
Blest be the day she gave to me
A ringlet of her hair!

I gaze, and recollections come,
And gently lead me where Lies the sweet head which once upbore
This fairy tress of hair.

Earth may take from me all I have,
But nought shall ever tear
From my bereaved and lonely heart
This curl of Fannie's hair.

I'll hide it in my bosom now,
And ever shield it there
From cold, unsympathizing eyes,
This curl of Fannie's hair.

THE WAIF:

—OR,—

HARRY'S YOUNG PROTEGE.

BY H. N. O'BRIEN.

It was about sunset of a summer's day. The weather had been hot and sultry, and to people whose business or employment was out of doors, it had been extremely unpleasant. In the glowing west there seemed banners of crimson fluted with gold flung athwart the sky; and piles of blue clouds, whose edges were tipped with silver, floated on either side. The sky seemed radiant with the amber rays struggling through, with pencil-like fringes reaching up as if to the gray beyond.

Harry Winthrop looked with a true artist's eye on the glowing scene. The color deepened in his pale student's face, and lighted up his dark thoughtful eye. He loved the beautiful—almost worshipped at its shrine. He loved to see the white "Star of Bethlehem" peering meekly up among its long, green leaves, with the single white thread running through. He loved the March violet, the spring daisies; he loved, too, all that is majestic and grand in nature. He had stood and thrilled at the mighty voice that ever goes up from Niagara, and fascinated, tried to pierce the misty veil that hides its depths from mortal gaze. He was an orphan and alone in the world. Impulsive, impetuous, warm-hearted, he possessed true principles and a strong sense of the right. He was a college student, enjoying a summer vacation in his own peculiar manner. He was making a tour of the State of Connecticut, accompanied only by his good horse Selim, on whose back he now sat watching the clouds.

Looking earnestly he fell into a reverie, and heeded not the pawing of his impatient steed. But suddenly the reverie was broken, and he looked up hastily and glanced around, on hearing a succession of childish screams. A little house of wood-color, which he had been too absorbed to notice, stood on the right-hand side of the road. The screams, which came louder and faster, impelled him to spring from his horse, hastily slip the reins around a gate-post, and enter.

The front portion, as in most farm-houses, was closed tightly with green paper curtains, closely drawn. He took the foot-path, and with a few quick steps, found himself at the kitchen-door. The sight that met his eyes made the indignant blood boil in his veins. A woman (could she be a woman?) with a coarse, red face, flushed with angry passions, held in her uplifted hand a large hickory stick, and close grasped in her other hand was a mass of tangled curls, belonging to a trembling, cowering child of perhaps eleven years.

On seeing the stranger, the woman's hand relaxed, and with a quick bound the child sprang to his side and clasped his knee, looking up imploringly in the face bent towards her.

"Go out and finish picking chips now, you miserable child! I'll finish settling with you to-night," exclaimed the woman, angrily giving her frowny hair a backward push.

Evidently rejoiced to defer the punishment a few hours, the child went sobbing into the yard.

"Is she your daughter?" inquired Harry, somewhat embarrassed.

"I should hope not—such a lazy, shiftless thing! Here I set her to picking up chips, and the first thing I knew, she came up the lane with her arms full of medder weeds. No, thank for—tune, she's none o' mine." And the woman gave an impatient twitch to her sleeve, which was rolled above her brawny elbow.

"Who then is she?" asked Harry, sternly.

"Well, I don't see as it concerns you to know. I'd like to git rid of the lazy thing any way." The woman commenced a vigorous sweeping.

"Why do you keep her, if you don't want her? Would it not be better to give her away, or send her to the alms-house?"

"Law, sir, I wouldn't dare to. The neighbors would make a fuss. She was, my husband's child, by his first wife—a terrible shiftless critter by all accounts; but John sot the world by her. The young un takes after the mother. When John died he gin me the farm, and I was to provide for the girl. I've two young uns of my own to take care on, and if folks wouldn't talk so, I'd put her in the poor-house."

Harry gave way to a generous impulse.

"Give her to me, if she will go," he exclaimed.

"I will send her to school and educate her as my own sister. Are you willing?"

The woman looked suspiciously at him, then hesitated.

"She shall be well taken care of," remarked Harry, noticing her hesitation.

"And brung up right?" asked the woman, leaning on her broom.

"I pledge you my honor." Harry's face flushed.

"And I wout have to spend nothin' on her?"

"No, you shall be relieved of all expenses. I am rich, and can do as I please."

"Well, if she is willing you can have her, but her services will be a loss to me. Here," she exclaimed, as the child entered with a full basket, "do you want to go away with this gentleman, Molly?"

The child's eyes absolutely flashed with delight.

"May I go, sir? Will you take me?" she exclaimed, almost incredulously.

"Yes—if you will go with me, and be my little sister," he answered, kindly.

The child caught up her sun-bonnet and hastened to the door.

"Can't you kiss me good-by, Moll? I would not let the girl go, if it wasn't goin' to be such a good thing for her. But it will be deprivin' me of her services, and I'm none too well off."

Harry laid a gold eagle on the table, which the woman saw with ill-concealed delight. She accompanied them to the gate, and assisted the child, who was very small of her age, to her seat in front of her young protector.

"Good-by, Molly, and if good luck comes to you, don't forget your friends."

In any person, however bad, we are told, there is at least one germ of good. In Mrs. Crown, Molly's stepmother, it was her love for her own children. It was her passion—no work, no hardship was too hard for her to endure for them.

As they rode along slowly, the child's head rested trustingly on Harry's breast. He began to have a delightful feeling, thinking how pleasant it was to have some one to protect and watch over. Looking down on the bare neck and arms, which were covered with stripes and wales, a sense of pity and indignation mingled in his breast.

"What is your name, my child?"

"Faith Crown. My mother calls me Molly," said the child, looking up.

"How old are you?"

"Most eleven, sir."

"Have you been to school much, Faith?"

"Not much, sir. But I'm a good scholar. I can spell lots, and read in the Third Reader. I know 'rithmetic, too."

Harry was amused.

"How much do you know of arithmetic?"

"I can add and multiply, and lots more. I never studied nothin' besides."

Harry mused a few moments, while the child was silent with a full heart, because of his kind words. Poor little one! she was unused to such, and the tears filled her eyes.

"There, you can most see the village, mister," said little Molly, anxious to entertain him.

"Look up, Faith, while I talk to you. Your name, henceforth, shall be called Faith Winthrop. Do you understand?"

"Yes, sir. What is your name?" she asked, timidly.

"Harry Winthrop. You may call me brother—no," he said, his fastidious nature revolting from too close intimacy and too great familiarity with such a sun-burned little thing—"no, call me uncle—Uncle Harry."

A stop of three days at the village hotel recruited all Harry's energies, and at the same time put Faith's wardrobe in good condition, for Harry engaged a competent dressmaker to clothe the child neatly and tastefully. When dressed, she was quite presentable. Her slender little figure in white muslin, tied with a pink sash-ribbon, looked very different from the ill-clad, wretched-looking farmer's daughter. Her hair was combed and hung in soft, silky curls; her little sun-burned face had had the tears and dust washed away, and revealed a patient, subdued expression, with a fearful glance in the eye, and a quivering lip. Yet the face wore an innocent, artless look, full of childish purity, and that pleased her young protector.

Since taking her, Harry Winthrop had once or twice called himself "a foolish boy," and wondered what his city friends would think of his adopted niece. But he had no one to love, no one to whom he was all the world. He felt that Providence had given him this little waif, and he resolved to train her for a useful life. What her future would be he did not pause to think. Her quaint manners, her odd, intelligent little speeches, decided him to educate her. Still he realized that his was an awkward situation—he, a college youth of twenty-one, sole and only guardian to a little child, ten years his junior.

He took her to the city in which his college was located, and placed her at a fashionable seminary, under the charge of an accomplished preceptress. His little protegee filled many a thought, and many were the plans he formed for her benefit. Although absorbed in study, and determined to be the first man in his class, and make his fellow-collegians recognize in him talent, and perhaps genius, he still found time to call on his little "Daisy," as he loved to call her, twice every week. Faith regarded him as a superior being, and loved him with a wild intensity, whose depths could not be sounded. Every kind word, all his little gifts, his brotherly counsel and caresses were treasured by the child, and served to brighten and strengthen the chain which united them. And her helplessness, her reverence for him, her innocence and purity, made him love her as if she had been his sister, and he sometimes felt inferior to her in the love of angels. By the end of the year, her brusquerie and country awkwardness were partially dissipated. She had lost somewhat of her too great timidity, and began to show a thirst for knowledge.

Harry Winthrop's studies were finished. He had delivered the valedictory amidst marked applause. He had won high honors, and he had now the world before him. The dream of his life had been to travel, and now he was determined to see his dream fulfilled. No longer should it be a dim, misty vision, but a sweet reality. And so, bidding adieu to Faith and his other friends, he went to Germany to study.

Five years had passed over the hills and valleys of life, and Harry Winthrop, a bronzed and bearded man, with foreign air, strode again his native shore. Since he had left his alma mater, the suns of many different lands and climes had kissed his once pale cheek, and he had looked on ruins and stately edifices, and had learned to think. In rambling over the old world he had first learned man's power and might, and his weakness and insignificance. He went a light-hearted student; he returned a grave, thoughtful, dignified man; a man who felt the importance of life, who realized his own native powers, and who was a man among men.

It was a June afternoon when he strolled up the seminary walk, and entered the chapel where hundreds were congregated. It was the last day of examination, and the young graduates were to read their essays before a criticizing audience. On the platform, but far back, were rows of seats, and eagerly did Harry scan each face to find his country blossom. Curly heads and dark eyes, sunny tresses and azure orbs—from all these how could he choose his Daisy? He knew it was her graduation day, and he resolved to watch the young girls, feeling convinced he would know Faith in a moment. A tall, stately girl, with raven hair and splendid oriental eyes, read her essay first. That could not be Faith. Next came a proud, haughty being, with a cold, reserved air. Then half a dozen passable-looking girls, by no means brilliant, but doubtless possessed of those qualities which make home happy. Mr. Winthrop immediately decided that Faith was not among them. Then, with a blundering air, came a short, plump girl, evidently the light of some farm-house—with auburn hair, blue eyes, a good-natured expression, but plain-featured, with a universal awkwardness. She shrank from reading her composition, looking around fearfully, the paper trembling in her hand, and a blush suffusing the healthy cheek.

That was Faith—so Harry decided. He did not doubt he was right, and he began to congratulate himself on the kind impulse which had led to her education, though no talent and but little close application to study could be perceived in her effusion. He was scarcely satisfied with her progress, but he determined she should study at home—for Harry owned an elegantly furnished mansion in his native city, which was now ready for the reception of himself and protegee.

The young lady whose turn came next, advanced with graceful self-possession, which Harry scarcely noticed, so busily was he thinking of the brown, plump country girl. But his attention was drawn to her well-turned sentences, the close thought, the nice distinctions, the evident love for the beautiful, the true talent displayed, and so well pleased was he, that he turned his attention to its author. She was of medium height, slender and graceful. Her hair was of a rich, sunny brown, and her eyes dark gray. He could only see the color for a moment, then the long lashes swept her cheek. He was struck by the innocence and purity of the pale, earnest face. He looked at her, watched her movements, forgetting all else, and then he began to wish that Faith's school-days were not yet ended; he wished to leave her at the seminary. She needed further instruction, for her composition showed ignorance and a lack of reflection. He began to think he should hate to see her about his beautiful home, after seeing this girl, who, though she was not strictly beautiful, possessed a glorious soul. The country girl was so material beside this earnest young enthusiast.

Somewhat out of humor, he left the hall and found his way to the seminary parlor. Ringing the bell, he desired to see Miss Faith Winthrop as soon as the services were concluded, and then he gave himself up to thought. He heard the rush of departing footsteps, and he carelessly twirled the leaves of a crimson and gold album, as he heard light, approaching footsteps. He did not look up until he felt a pair of arms thrown around his neck, and a soft cheek pressed to his, and a sweet voice say, "Dear Uncle Harry!"

Somewhat offended at this display from a bread-and-butter school-girl, he gently unwound the clinging arms and looked—not into the face he expected, but the pale, earnest one he had seen with a little heart-fluttering.

"Is it possible that this is my Daisy?" he asked, almost incredulous, seating her by himself on a sofa.

"Quite possible, dear Uncle Harry," she answered, blushing. "I had almost given up your coming. You know you wrote me you would be here a week ago."

Harry did not think it worth while to inform her that the week had been spent in his city home, he, the while, chafing that his peculiar habits must be infringed upon by a romping girl. Neither did he consider it worth his while to tell her how he had dreaded coming for her, and blamed once or twice his "boyish folly" in removing her from her native sphere. He was angry at himself now.

Faith told him about her school-life, and said that her kind preceptress had offered her a situation as teacher, if she desired it, and she thought she would like to accept it. Mr. Winthrop quickly vetoed such an arrangement, by virtue of his authority, and Faith was not sorry. The next morning they were settled in their city home.

Mr. Winthrop had an excellent housekeeper, but conceiving it to be improper, in the eyes of the world, for his adopted niece to have no lady-companion, he said to her, a week after their arrival at their home:

"Now, Daisy, haven't you some school-girl friend you would like to invite to spend a year with you? You will be lonely oftentimes with only an old bachelor uncle, who must give half his time to his literary labors. You might invite two friends, Daisy, and then you shall enjoy yourselves in society."

Faith was not fond of gay society, but finding her guardian really in earnest, she wrote to two of her school-friends, and her invitations were speedily accepted. Mr. Winthrop had expected to endure a perpetual martyrdom after the arrival of the young ladies, and had resolved to bear it as best he might. But, greatly to his surprise, his study was never molested, the library was kept in order, and his literary labors were undisturbed by sounds of laughter and revelry, though the halls, the parlors, the drawing-room, and the young ladies' apartments echoed musical laughter and gay young voices.

The two guests of Faith Winthrop were very unlike. Bessie Randolph was a bright little Southern beauty, possessed of a fortune. She was an orphan, and had been a parlor-boarder at the seminary. She was a wilful, capricious, restless, little beauty, and she loved Faith devotedly, as much as she could and not disregard the claims of a college youth, with whom she became acquainted while at school.

Adele Vane was a tall, slender girl, with pale yellow hair—you could scarce call it golden—light blue eyes and fair complexion. She was the second daughter of a family of seven children. Her mother was dead, and her sister Charlotte took a mother's place with the wild, unruly boys, and the two girls, Adele and Ermance. Her supervision was especially distasteful to the proud Adele. Their father's income was small, and when the invitation to Adele arrived, the girl's heart gave a glad throb, and she inwardly resolved though she went away from home in a style displeasing to her tastes, she would return the betrothed bride of a rich man. Faith had heard Adele say that she was unhappy at home, and her kind heart, rather than any affection, prompted the invitation. Adele was unscrupulous as to what means she employed to gain the end for which she sighed, and she had not been in the house two days, ere she was determined to become mistress of it, and the wife of the grave, dignified man who owned it. He was wealthy, and a fit target for her arrows.

With winning grace she tried to induce him to join their social circle, and enjoy their music and gay chats. He complied so far as to introduce a number of friends to them, and to give them a grand party. Then he became more than ever studious and taciturn. Sighing, Faith thought of that first week at home—its quiet tete-a-tetes and morning walks; the music, in which his deep, rich voice joined hers, and the pleasant readings aloud of new books.

She was half buried among the cushions of a huge easy-chair, in her own sitting-room, and her friends were with her. Carrie was embroidering a pin-cushion, and Adele was busy with canvass and worsteds.

"Faith, dear," exclaimed Carrie, "your cushion progresses beautifully. I wonder for whom Adele is making those slippers? Do tell us, Adele," she said, turning to Miss Vane.

"You shall know sometime, but I shall only tell you now that I shall give them to my lover."

"Your lover! Not here a fortnight, and yet you have a lover?" cried Bessie, in astonishment.

A peculiar smile wreathed Adele Vane's lips, but she answered not.

Though very different, the three girls were each possessed of a share of youthful beauty. If one were to compare them to stones, you would say that Adele was a diamond; brilliant, though neither beautiful nor witty enough to merit the simile, but she was showy. You would call Bessie Randolph a ruby, bright and sparkling. Faith Winthrop would remind you of a pearl—a pure human pearl was she. In society they all attracted admiration, and so were soon absorbed in the whirl of fashionable life. Many ladies offered to play chaperons to the three belles, and thus Mr. Winthrop was rescued from attending them, save at his own pleasure.

One morning he accompanied them to a large party given by one of his lady-friends. He had meant to enter the room with Faith, but in a way unaccountable to himself, he found Miss Vane leaning on his arm, and Faith was with a very fine-looking gentleman, who seemed absorbed in her remarks. Bessie was with a fop, whose forked moustache had evidently received more cultivation than his brains. He was disappointed; and still more, that he found no opportunity to speak to her. She was all the time surrounded, and he longed to hear the animated tones; but Miss Vane, too, was the centre of a delightful coterie, and she still was leaning on his arm. After that evening Mr. Winthrop's studious habits were confirmed, and the girls soon found that all entreaties for him to indulge in society were met by a smile, or perhaps a sarcastic speech. Bessie did not mind this, but the others did. Adele, because it tended to discourage her plans, and Faith because she saw so little of him, except at table. They were all sitting in the parlor one evening, when visitors were announced.

"Mr. Hastings," whispered Adele to Faith, in a tone intended for Mr. Winthrop's ear. "Why, Faith, you haven't seen him since last evening at the opera. He finds in you his beau ideal, I heard him say. There he comes." And she turned to greet the gentleman with a smile.

A blush mantled Faith's face, as Mr. Winthrop gazed searchingly at her, and he too turned to his visitors with a pale face and white lips. He watched their manners to each other, and became convinced that Mr. Hastings loved his ward. The blush he considered proof positive that that love was returned.

Adele was carrying on a gay conversation with the fop who had played the gallant to Bessie, and during the conversation, she made many allusions to "the family mansion," the avenue leading to the house, "the plate" and the jewelry she had inherited. Mr. Trenton, believing her rich, began to pay her exclusive attention. Adele had heard he was rich, and so encouraged him, believing it better to have "two strings to her bow." How would the aristocratic Mr. Trenton have rated himself had he known "the family mansion" was a two-story cottage, "the avenue," a stone footpath, "the plate," a dozen silver spoons and forks, the "inherited jewelry," a watch and chain left her by her mother? His prolific fancy conjured up a magnificent structure of huge dimensions, with a lawn, a park, a carriage-drive; a table laden with all the delicacies of the season, and Adele herself the fair queen of all; the idol of her father, with a necklace of diamonds around her throat, a tiara on her head, bracelets on her arms, and a general profusion and display of miscellaneous gems. The pictures surely were very unlike. Adele did not mention her brothers and sisters, but left him to conclude she was the sole heiress. But if he had known that Mr. Vane was an honest, intelligent shoemaker, in tolerably good business for the small place, he would have returned to Bessie, whose lack of pretension and boasting had made him think her poor.

Bessie, Faith and Mr. Hastings enjoyed themselves in conversation, and did not heed the flirtation going on in the bay window. When the guests had departed, the girls sat in the drawing-room, and criticised the gentlemen, while Faith performed the part of listener. Adele Vane had been saying that Mr. Hastings was conceited, and thought himself superior to most men. To this Faith answered, for she always spoke in behalf of the absent, if there was occasion for defence.

"Adele, I am sure Mr. Hastings is superior to most men; and is it not natural that he who knows the power of his own mind, should feel it too? He is superior, but not conceited, Adele. If you knew him better, you would not say that. Of all the gentlemen who are attentive to us, he is the most of a gentleman, in my opinion."

"Mine, also," chimed in Bessie.

"I am glad to see that you entertain such a high opinion of him, for he considers you an angel," remarked Adele, carelessly.

Faith blushed.

"I am glad you appreciate him, Faith," said the kind voice of her guardian, at her side.

"Uncle Harry, when did you enter the room?" exclaimed the young girl, in astonishment.

"I have been here since you began talking of Mr. Hastings; I did not suppose the conversation private, or I should have spoken before."

He seated himself on a sofa near Adele. Faith turned her attention to Bessie, and in a moment, arm-in-arm, the two retired to their own apartments, leaving Mr. Winthrop and Adele together.

Nearly six months had passed away, and Adele Vane's object was not accomplished. Mr. Winthrop had not proposed for her hand, and she determined to adopt some decisive measure. The foppish Mr. Trenton still hovered in her footsteps, still considered her "divinely charming, 'pon honaw." He would long ago have proposed for her hand, but her conduct was variable—sometimes encouraging, sometimes repellant, just as her hopes or fears concerning Mr. Winthrop predominated. Then Mr. Trenton put on "property airs," and vowed revenge when the fortune and its fair, imagined possessor should be all his own.

Bright, sunbeam Bessie Randolph made music throughout the whole house, and her presence consoled Faith for the unpleasant addition to their society in Adele Vane. Faith's pure mind each day found something to regret in Adele, but she never spoke of it.

It was the week before Christmas, and the servants were busy preparing dainties. Faith had no more to do with the kitchen than her guests, but she loved to concoct some favorite dish for her guardian, and her presence was always hailed with delight by the housekeeper and her assistants. Adele Vane was very shrewd, and had discovered that it was Faith who prevented her becoming mistress of Winthrop house. She saw that as man seldom loves, Mr. Winthrop loved Faith, and that he thought himself disliked by her. This latter idea she wished to strengthen, and on every occasion she contrived to join Mr. Hastings's name to Faith's. Faith had told the girls the circumstances of her real life, and that she had no claim on her kind guardian.

One afternoon, the week before Christmas, Faith sat in the library alone. She had been reading the poem "Child Harold," and unconsciously she repeated:

"The day drags through, tho' storms keep out the sun,
And thus the heart will break, yes brokenly live on."

She looked out of the window, trying to recall the picture she had read. It was a cold, sleety day; the wind blew, and out of doors the gray hue made it seem peculiarly unpleasant to one who sat as did Faith, surrounded by books, pictures, and elegant statues. It was a cheerless day, and sometimes a soft, slow, drizzling rain pattered against the windows, and obscured the next houses, and even the leaden-hued sky. Her thoughts took their tone from the weather. She remembered her sad childhood, and in thankfulness she lifted her eyes, as if trying to pierce through the misty rain, up to where the rain never falls, and all is sunlight, radiant, beautiful. She looked back through the aisles where her feet had wandered; she saw the shadows and sunshine that God had given her, and she saw the flowers as well as the storms. She looked to the future. The shadows were thick in the large, dim library, as she asked herself, "What shall be my future? Bailey says:—

'The heart is its own Fate. Passion is destiny.'

What shall mine be? I am not fulfilling the end for which I was created, idling on silken cushions, and with no thought for the higher things of life. I want intensity, depth, individuality to this life of mine. To live, not to exist; to strive, to battle, to conquer. I am not satisfied with my life," she exclaimed, her face glowing, the color coming and going.

"Miss Faith," said the housekeeper, entering after a preliminary rap at the door, "there is a poor boy in the kitchen, begging for cold victuals and old clothes. Have you any old dresses, or anything for his mother, ma'am?"

"I will go and see him, Mrs. Williams," said the young girl, rising and accompanying her.

A little boy with ragged clothes and tattered hat, and shoes with plenty of holes for ventilation, unkempt hair and honest, clean little face, stood near the door, with basket in hand. A few questions from Faith drew out a story, touching, and artlessly told. The mother was sick, the father was drunk, the baby worried with teething, and the children were too small to work. Bidding the boy sit down, Faith filled the basket with bread and cakes, adding some dainties and wine for the sick woman. The boy's eyes sparkled with delight, as he lifted his tattered cap, and exclaimed: "God bless ye, ma'am!"

In answer to a few questions more, he told her he was Johnny O'Flynn, and lived about half a mile away.

"Wait till I come back, Johnny," said Faith.

She entered the drawing-room and told the touching story to her guests. With characteristic generosity, Bessie half-emptied her purse in Faith's lap, but Adele said she did not like to encourage beggars.

Faith's pretty blue silk dress was soon exchanged for a quiet gray merino, and with hood and cloak she soon returned to the parlor. Bessie and Adele both declined accompanying her, and with one hand on the basket-handle, helping Johnny, and a small bundle in the other hand, Faith came up from the basement, passing the drawing-room window, unheeding the laughter of the two girls.

Half an hour passed dully enough to the two young ladies. Bessie reclined on the sofa, and Adele sat in the window. Mr. Winthrop entered with his favorite Review.

"Mr. Winthrop, you should have been here a few minutes ago," smiled Adele.

"Why so? Where is Faith?" he asked, now noting her absence.

"She's been hidden somewhere all day, until a while ago she entered to beg for a poor little fellow, who had all the troubles of Job," said Bessie.

"And a few minutes after, we saw her facing the wind, helping an Irish boy carry potatoes, or some such thing," continued Adele, adding: "I cannot see how a person with any delicacy could do so—making herself a sport to the gentlemen who see her." Mr. Winthrop looked grave.

"Faith out in this storm—she is a noble girl!"

Meanwhile Faith was rocking a baby in her arms and soothing it to sleep. The mother, too, was sleeping, and at a table near were half-a-dozen children eating heartily. The mother slept for hours, and woke refreshed, to find the stranger lady still holding the baby and reading aloud from the Book of books to the children, and to a dirty-looking man with a pipe in his mouth, whom the children called "father."

The rain grew heavier, and it was almost dark, so Faith left them, promising in answer to Mr. O'Flynn's uncouth, though well-meant invitation, and his wife's more urgent one, to come again soon. Johnny walked home with her. He was only ten years old, and his warm, Irish imagination was enkindled by the sight of her pale, innocent face, and with boyish ardor he began to love the gentle girl.

Arrived at home, Faith went to her own room, and was soon clad in dry clothing. Mr. Winthrop, unaware of her return, admiring her self-denial, was pacing the library with firm, quick tread, pale face and uneasy air. Sometimes he paused to listen if he might hear her footstep. He had questioned the housekeeper, but she did not know in what direction the boy lived. The servant had lighted the pendant lamps in the library; the evening meal had been eaten without their kind host, who still walked, head bent forward, hands clasped behind him, to and fro across the library, crushing the gorgeous velvet flowers under his heavy tread. His noble face was shrouded in gloom, his lips were compressed.

Suddenly his heart fluttered; he heard a light footstep that he knew. Not caring to betray his emotion, he stepped into a niche, in the shadow of a full length statue of Minerva. Faith entered, smiling sadly; he noticed it with a pang at the heart. Robed in a soft gray silk, which well suited her dovelike beauty, Faith stole to the window and pressed her cheek to the glass. There had been a coldness in Mr. Winthrop's manner to her for weeks, and she could not tell why. Thinking thus, the tears blinded her eyes. She determined to go back to the seminary and become a teacher—with a low, gasping sob, as she resolved on that step, Mr. Winthrop came forward.

"Faith, you should not have been so carried away by such a benevolent impulse, as to go out in such a rain," he said, reproachfully.

"But, Uncle Harry, I think I did some good," answered Faith, meekly.

"I don't doubt it, Faith, but you must have regard for your own health. I wish to talk to you. I received to-day from Ralph Hastings an offer for your hand. I believe he had your heart long ago. I need not tell you, Faith, that he is wealthy, talented, good and noble, for your heart will tell you the last, and I know you too well to suppose wealth would influence your decision. I promised to talk with you, and I told Mr. Hastings to call this evening for his answer. You will see him in an hour, Faith." Mr. Winthrop's tone was cold, hard and reserved.

Adele Vane had been insinuating that Faith loved Mr. Hastings, and that her health was injured by letting "concealment, like a worm in the bud," etc. Mr. Winthrop had remembered that Faith's form had grown slighter, her face whiter and purer, her eyes shining with a light which had nothing earthly in it, but a radiance which perchance was a foreshadowing of the glory of the beyond. He had noticed, too, the wistful quiver of the little mouth and its thin lips, and had sighed as he saw the transparent hands and the pure forehead, through which the blue veins showed so plainly. He had thought from Adele's words, that this was owing to her love for Mr. Hastings, and the uncertainty as to that gentleman's feelings for her.

"Faith," he continued, "Mr. Hastings will be here soon, and I will leave you to think the matter over seriously, though of course there can be but one answer." He turned to leave the apartment.

"Stay, dear Uncle Harry," exclaimed Faith, with an effort; "will you not give him my answer. A spasm convulsed her guardian's face, as he answered, in a strange tone:

"You know not what you ask." Then he rapidly paced the apartment several times—then stood before her. "I will tell him, Faith, that you accept him. Will you see him this evening?"

"No, sir; and I hope you will not tell him that I accept him either. Please decline his offer in my name, sir."

"Faith, are you insane? Will you do violence to your own heart? Will you voluntarily darken your own life?" asked her guardian, with a strange mixture of wonder and misery in his tone.

"I do not love him, Uncle Harry," said Faith, gently.

"Not love him! Is it possible?"

"Quite possible, Uncle Harry."

"Don't call me 'Uncle Harry' again, Faith. I—but I hear Hastings's step in the hall. Come down to the library in an hour, Faith. I wish to talk with you."

Faith flew silently and unobserved to her own apartment. An hour had passed when her gentle face appeared at the library door, but it blanched to a death pallor, when looking in, she saw her guardian sitting on a cosy sofa, and at his side sat Adele Vane. Mr. Winthrop's feet were enconced within the canvass slippers Adele had embroidered. He was listening intently to her words.

"Ah!" thought Faith, "he wished to tell me how he loved Adele Vane." And she stole back again to her own room.

The rain pattered against the windows, the wind shook the blinds and shutters, and Faith looked out until the city clocks struck twelve. Restless, she knew not why, she lighted a small hand-lamp and stole down to the library, in search of an odd, antiquated book, which she had seen on a certain shelf, in the further corner. It was a book of magic and sorcery, such a one as to frighten such a timid dove as Faith was, but she wanted something exciting, something to subdue her restlessness. She stood with the lamp in her hand, when the door again opened, and Mr. Winthrop entered. Faith started, as did he, in surprise that it was no burglar, as he supposed.

"I was restless, and came here for a book," said Faith, in reply to his questioning glance.

"Why didn't you keep your appointment with me to-night, Faith?"

"You were too busily occupied to see me, Mr. Winthrop. I came, but did not wish to interrupt you."

"Interrupt me! O, I understand, it was when Adele was in here. Tell me now, Faith, why you rejected Mr. Hastings." His tone was eager.

"Because I did not love him enough to be his wife," answered Faith, coldly, turning to go.

"Wait a moment, Daisy. I have been trying to think if this be a coquettish whim." His keen eyes searched her face.

"No, sir, it is no whim. Perhaps, Mr. Winthrop, as I have few chances to speak to you alone, I had better now say that I wish to return to the seminary as teacher. I think I had better go next week. Good night, sir."

In perfect astonishment her guardian looked at her.

"Will you not stay, Faith?"

"I cannot, sir—I ought not," she cried, gently.

"You must, Faith—you must not go. Will you leave me who love you so?" he cried.

Faith leaned against the books.

"Daisy, I love you better than my own soul; will you be mine?" His tone was eager and passionate.

"Do you not love Adele Vane?" asked Faith, in a low tone, lifting her head from his shoulder.

"Love Adele Vane! No, indeed, darling, I love you, and you alone, with a fervor and devotion of which I have been afraid. Mine—mine, my birdie," he said, exultingly, as she disappeared up the winding stairs.

Adele Vane was too well-bred, too heartless besides, to show any mortification, especially as she vainly believed that her host's keen eyes had not penetrated her schemes. She encouraged Mr. Trenton, who delightedly proposed, and begged the engagement might be a short one. And then, for her plans were but half-accomplished, she by tears, hints, and successful manoeuvres, tried to prevail on Faith to allow the wedding at Winthrop house. This, the fair blushing Daisy did not feel authorized to grant, but Mr. Winthrop, who saw it all, quietly told Miss Vane that it would give him pleasure to have her marriage solemnized in his house.

One bright January eve, in the presence of many guests, Adele Vane became Adele Trenton, with solemn vows and promises. Her two young friends were her bridesmaids. Bessie Randolph looked like a glorious picture of morning, so bright, so beautiful was she—and Faith like a holy twilight, uttering a holy quiet over all human thoughts and emotions that were sinful; calming one, and making one feel purer, better, and more thoughtful. Faith was one of those who live near to Jesus, who each day grow better and more like the angels.

They visited Adele's home; but there vanished all the proud air-castles of Mr. Trenton's brain. He reproached his bride, who told him that as he was rich, it could not matter. To her surprise, she was informed that most of his wealth consisted in unpaid debts, and he was getting ashamed to meet his tailor. The journey that began so happily, ended in their return to the city with mutual distrust and coldness.

Adele Trenton was present at a small gathering at Winthrop house in early March. The bright little humming-bird Bessie Randolph again enacted the part of bridesmaid, and a tall student's eyes followed her every motion with fond delight and pride. And the bearded, noble-looking man, with the slight form at his side, looking up with pale, earnest face, and pure, truthful eyes, they were Harry Winthrop and Faith his bride. And Adele Trenton sighed, and a faint wish, as faint as the shadow of a cloud on a quiet lake, stole in her mind, that she had lived a true life, been true to her better nature, and true to her God. But she banished the thought, and was as gay and brilliant as if no pain was gnawing at her heart-strings, and as if her life were not a living mockery. Mr. Hastings was gone to Maine on business, and he could not be present. From his joy Harry pitied Ralph Hastings. After the usual bridal tour to the Falls, to Washington, and the principal Atlantic cities, the bridal party returned to Winthrop house, and quiet peaceful happiness. It was pleasant for Bessie Randolph that her lover began to practise law in the city, and pleasanter still for him.

Living nobly up to their high standard, and walking with loving hearts through this earthly pilgrimage, are Harry and Faith Winthrop.

HEALTH OF AMERICANS.—De Bow's mortality statistics, compiled from the last census, show that the people of the United States are the healthiest on the globe. The deaths are three hundred and twenty thousand per year, or one and a half per cent. of the population. In England the ratio is near two per cent., and in France nearly three per cent. Virginia and North Carolina are the healthiest States, and have six hundred and thirty-eight inhabitants over one hundred years of age.

THE STRANGER'S GRAVE.

BY OSCAR N. KENNELS.

They laid him down in the cold, dark grave,
Around whose sides the rushes wave;
They marked his grave with nameless stone,
And they left him there to sleep alone.

No teardrop fell on the clammy ground,
No rosebush marks the lonely mound,
No token reared by a sister's hand,
For he died far off, in a foreign land.

The thistled plant with its bonnet blue,
Drank o'er his grave the falling dew;
And the wildbird sang its sweetest note,
On the balmy breeze of spring to float.

But he lies all silent there beneath,
And the wild vine twines his only wreath;
He has died afar from friends and home,
And he sleeps unhonored and unknown.

But there were friends that wept on a foreign shore,
And long they looked, but he came no more:
And they sighed and started in their home,
In hope that the loved and lost would come.

But they never knew how he calmly slept,
And the trailing vine o'er his tombstone crept;
They met—not on earth, but the golden shore
Of the heavenly clime, where he went before.

WHO WON HER?

BY ESTHER SERLE KENNETH.

"LESLIE."

But Leslie Leonard, lying stretched out at full length on the green turf at my side, with his hands clasped beneath his head and his blue eyes half-shut, made no reply. The sunshine, streaming brokenly through the dancing leaves of the tree above us, played over his broad, white forehead and glorified his beautiful Raphael face.

"Leslie."

"Don't disturb me when I am engaged. Ladies grand chain!"

"In mercy's name, Leslie, what are you doing?" I asked, bewildered.

"Calling the changes," he replied, quietly.

"Who for?" I cried, beginning to have a dim idea of his meaning, as I followed his gaze to a bar of sunshine in which some insects were sporting.

"Those flies. They dance the 'Lancers' as well as ever I saw it danced in my life. The only trouble is, that they will persist in changing partners on the floor. Forward and address! There—did you ever see a figure gone through with better in your life?"

I could not forbear smiling, but the next instant I was serious again.

"I wish you would let the flies alone and talk with me," I said, after a pause.

"Well, when this figure is through. Balance at the corners!"

As he lay in that position of luxuriant indolence with a half-smile parting the ripe redness of his lips, I gazed as I had never gazed before on the perfect beauty of his face. I contrasted it with my own as I had seen it that morning in my mirror, and then pressed my teeth into my under lip until the blood came. How I envied him his pink and white complexion, his yellow curls and dark-lashed, blue eyes! But it was not for my own gratification that I coveted his beauty. No, indeed. I liked my own dark, irregularly-featured face best, but I knew the eye of the woman I loved would be charmed with his roses and lilies. She loved beauty, as all women do, in any shape, and could I hope that she would turn from his winning eyes to my plain face, knowing nothing of the great, worshipping heart that beat for her in my bosom?

"It is not right," I muttered. "He is none the more worthy of her because his face is perfect. O, if she only knew!"

"What are you talking about, John? and what do you want of me? Tell me while my dancers are choosing partners."

He turned, bright-eyed and smiling, towards me as he spoke. I looked at him steadily a moment, and then, bending forward, I laid my hand upon his arm.

"Leslie, do you love Ellen Vernon?"

Was it my strong will that held his gaze? for the blue eyes did not flinch, though a soft color, delicate and rich as the blush of a girl, tinged his cheeks, and the smile died on his lips.

"Why, John, what is the matter?" he cried, raising himself up after a moment and laying his hand on my shoulder. I was tempted to shake off the friendly touch but did not, only repeated my question.

"Tell me why you ask me this?" he said, wonderingly.

"Answer me first. Do you love Ellen Vernon?"

"I do."

He made answer in a firm tone with his face flushing and his eyes darkening. I dropped my gaze and turned away.

Kneeling beside me on the grass he wound his arm about my neck.

"John, dear boy—for Heaven's sake, tell me what you mean!"

In my bitter, jealous mood, the gentle, anxious tone chafed me, the caress seemed an insult.

"Save your blandishments and soft words for your wooing, though you will hardly need them with that face of yours," I said, shortly, withdrawing from his encircling arms.

He rose to his feet and stood looking at me as if he feared I was insane. I would not raise my eyes, but looking through my lashes in a sullen way, I saw a light flash over his features as if he comprehended me at last, and then I met his gaze. He drew a quick breath, and with a nervous movement tossed the fair hair away from his face. Then coming to where I stood leaning against the trunk of a tree, for I had arisen, he laid his hand on my arm.

"John, this must not be," he said. "We have been true friends too long to be divided now. That we love the same woman is a sign of good taste in both, I think. We must be fair, and whoever wins must wear."

He smiled in his winning way, and tried to steal his hand into mine as he spoke. It was an old trick of his. I had seen that look and manner a hundred times in his boyhood when seeking reconciliation after a quarrel. Through sheer force of habit, I was about to take his hand, but recollecting myself I drew back. How dare he speak in that way to me when we stood side by side where our faces and forms were reflected in the water? It was an insult, a mockery. I told him so.

"It can never be," I said. "One must give up to the other, or we must choose between her and our friendship. I cannot kiss you or take your hand, knowing that if you were able you would rob me of my dearest hold on life. I cannot be your friend and Ellen Vernon's lover while you support the same claim. You must choose between us."

Standing silent, his gaze wandered across the river shining like glass, across the meadow blue with wild pea blossoms, on the other side, across the wide, brown road beyond, with cattle grazing on either side, and rested at last on a low, red farmhouse, with two large maples before it. And in a great swing which was fastened to the boughs of one of them, Ellen Vernon swayed back and forth. My heart stood still at the sight—Leslie's cheek flushed.

He turned suddenly to me again, at last, and I could see pain in the clear depths of his eyes as he spoke.

"Think a moment, John. Are we to part forever in this way?"

"If you will not—" I commenced.

"I never will," he interrupted quickly. "You will not be fair or generous. You are like a school boy who would fetter his competitor's feet when prepared for a race, and then run for the prize alone. Of course, I will not consent to your terms!"

"Very well, then. That is all."

With my arms folded across my chest, I turned away from him and walked slowly along the bank of the river. I thought that he would follow me, and ask for a good-by grasp of the hand, but he did not. At a bend of the stream I glanced back and saw him standing alone under the tree where I had left him, his gaze wandering over the river and meadow and road, and resting again on the snowy-robed figure that flitted back and forth beneath the old maples which stood before the door of the little, red, farmhouse. I held my hand over my face to smother a sob, which I thought in my selfishness he was unworthy of, as the love I had cherished for him died in my heart, and was carried away by dark thoughts as a corpse is borne forth by stern-visaged bearers. Then lonely, unloved, despairing, I pursued my way.

Well, the summer passed by. During its months I had offered myself to Ellen Vernon and been refused. It was no disappointment. I had never expected that she would marry me, for I had never been fool-hardy enough to construe her friendliness into a warmer sentiment. But I asked her to marry me in sheer desperation—because I was wearing my life away, and because the certainty that she would not be my wife was no harder to bear after I had asked her than before. I met Leslie very seldom during that time, and we never spoke to each other when we did meet. The last time I saw him we passed each other in the street and Ellen Vernon was leaning on his arm.

The next day I went to New York. In the hurry and strife of business old memories were lost. The years rolled by. I became a wealthy, influential man. On my thirtieth birthday, I married my partner's daughter, slipping the bridal ring on her white finger with a last sigh for Ellen Vernon. My wife was beautiful, refined, intelligent and sweet-tempered. I grew a scoffer at the theory of first love. Little children which I called my own, came and nestled in my arms and climbed upon my knees. My hearthstone was a bright and happy one. All this time I had never seen Leslie Leonard.

When I was forty I retired from active business, and purchasing a gem of a cottage in the suburbs of the town, took my family thither. My wife was more charming than ever in her new sphere, and my little ones thrived as only country babies will. The days were full of calm pleasure. There was no studied, artistic look about the place, but all was shady, and sweet, and beautiful, and people in passing often stopped to admire it.

I was reading in my porch just at sundown one day, and with my youngest child clinging to my knee, when a chaise stopped before the door and a gentleman sprang out. He came up the gravelled walk towards me, and in a pleasant, mellow voice that made me look sharply at him, asked for a glass of water, for a lady. He was a slightly-built, light-complexioned man, about five years younger than myself, and wore a heavy beard of a tawny gold color. Pleased with the request, for simple as it was, it seemed to infer that my place bore a hospitable air, I entered the house for a glass, intending to take the stranger directly to the well, where the clear, spring water was drawn up from its pebbly resting-place in an old, wooden bucket. When I came out I found that he had coaxed my little one into his arms, and carrying her, he followed me to the other side of the house, talking to her as he went.

"What is your name, bright eyes?" he asked, as we walked along.

But my pet put her dimpled forefinger in her rosy mouth and would not answer.

"Tell the gentleman that your name is Ellen," I said, reprovingly.

"Ellen?" said the stranger. "Ah! that is my wife's name."

I stopped, gave him a searching glance, and grasped his hand.

"Leslie!—Leslie Leonard, don't you know me?"

He looked bewilderingly at my face so changed by time, and with the dark hair that shaded it streaked with gray, and then with the old sudden lighting up of his eyes, which I remembered well, flung his arm about my neck, and our bearded lips met as in the old time.

"John Thornton—by my life! Why, you dear, old fellow, I was never so glad to see any one before since I was born," he said, wringing my hand.

"Come into the house and stay awhile. I have got so much to say to you!"

"I would like to best of anything in the world, but cannot! My wife is waiting for me, and we must be in town at eight this evening. But come and see me, and—you are married?"

"Yes."

"Good—and bring your family. Here—" and he hastily scribbled his address on a card, and handed it to me. "Come immediately—tomorrow!"

"I will come, certainly. Give me the child, while you carry the water."

"Is it yours?"

"Yes."

He grasped the glass and hurried away with my little one clinging to his neck. Standing half-concealed by the shrubbery, I saw him reach the glass of water to a lady who sat in the carriage, and the skirt of whose dress I could see. He said something in an earnest voice, and held the child up to her. I looked eagerly but I could not behold her face as she bent forward to kiss it.

"I wonder how she looks now!"—I said to myself—"if her face has grown pale and careworn like mine? She must be near thirty now. Leslie is still the same frank, warm-hearted fellow. What a fool I have been!"

I went to meet him and receive the glass, the child, and his good-by grasp of the hand.

"Be sure, and come soon. I shall expect you every day till you do come," he said, and then kissed the baby and hurried away. I watched him spring into the chaise and drive off, and then turned and walked slowly up the path to the house.

That evening as we sat alone, I told my wife of the incident of the day, and the story connected with it. She smiled and kissed me, and wanted to see Leslie and his wife, so we agreed to visit them next week. And we went.

Leslie met us at the door, welcoming us with all the enthusiasm of his youth. He said, laughingly, that he had stayed at home waiting for us ever since the day he had met me so unexpectedly. His wife was out, but would be in very soon. Meanwhile we made ourselves comfortable in his cosy little parlor. His house was a small one in the very heart of the city, but perfect in every arrangement. He said that he had lived there ever since he had been married, which was just five years.

In about half an hour afterwards his wife came in. She had not been informed of our arrival, and entered the room in her outdoor wrappings, a little child clinging to her, half-laughing, half-crying. But Ellen Vernon never owned the sweet, radiant face that she turned towards me, as she gave me her hand. The blood that had rushed to my face at her entrance, ebbed away again before Leonard looked at me, and I went down to dinner by her side, entirely at my ease. But that evening, after tea, as Leslie and I sat alone with our cigars, and our wives chatted confidentially in the nursery overhead, I said:

"By the way, what ever became of Ellen Vernon, Leslie?"

"She married a Western lawyer, and went to Illinois," he replied, knocking the ashes off his cigar with his little finger.

"Why didn't you marry her?" I queried.

"Simply because she wouldn't have me," he replied.

And we looked in each other's faces and laughed.

A WITTY RETORT.

Engineer Stone, or, as he was more generally called among his acquaintances, "Old Rock," who runs on the east end of the Peoria and Oquawka railroad, is a natural wag, quick at a repartee, and dry as a chip. One day Rock met with a lot of St. Louis, Alton and Chicago railroad boys, at Peoria Junction, and they stepped into Sam Emery's for a social glass of ale. Conductor Hedges, of the St. Louis road, as a sort of sentiment, gave "Old Rock, otherwise Stone, a perfect brick!" That's very good," exclaimed Stone; "here's to old Brush, otherwise Hedges, a perfect stick!" The next that was seen of Rock, he was pursuing a "two forty" gait toward his engine, Hedges, with a stick, close on his rear. This is not quite as good as the repartee of Dick Denton, while a division engineer on the Illinois Central, at a festival several years ago in De Witt county. A fellow named Jack R—, gave as a sentiment, "The two Nicks, Old Nick and Nick Denton." The tables came down with a clatter. Nick rose, as grave as a judge. When the noise had subsided, he said he fully appreciated the honor conferred upon him in being named in connection with Jack's most intimate friend! He hardly knew how to requite the kindness, but as one good turn always deserves another, he would give: "The two Jacks, Jack R— and Jackass." Jack R— collapsed, and the company went into hysterics.—Illinois Herald.

"GOING TO DO IT."

"Going to do it," never made a fortune, built a house, or won a name. "Going to do it" has been the bane of more people than would fill the census of a dozen New Yorks. The man who is always "going to do it," rarely if ever does it. The only thing he does do is to go out of the world without doing it. If he has a task which must be done, he at once announces, with a great deal of boasting and a great waste of words, time and breath, that he is "going to do it." And while he is thus "going to do it," somebody who is not suspected of "going to do it," does it and reaps the reward.—Portland Transcript.

NIGHT.

How beautiful is night!
A dewy freshness fills the silent air;
No mist obscure, nor cloud, nor speck, nor stain,
Breaks the serene of heaven.
In full-orbed glory, yonder moon divine
Rolls through the dark-blue depths;
Beneath her steady ray
The desert-circles spread,
Like the round ocean, girdled with the sky.
How beautiful is night!

A LEAP YEAR STORY.

BY ALICE H. HARRIS.

A CHEERFUL fire blazed up in the kitchen fireplace, and threw its ruddy gleams over the polished floor and homely furniture of the great, wide room. Grandmother occupied an old-fashioned, penitential arm-chair, which was so placed as to command a view of the fire and one half of the room; the rest was in utter darkness. Aunt Ellen—dear, plump, bewitching Aunt Ellen, was seated upon a cricket opposite grandmother, and was holding her face upon her hand and gazing thoughtfully into the blaze.

We girls—Mat, Bess, Nell and myself, who rejoiced in the name of Sarah, corrupted to Saity, had wandered about from one window to another, peering out into the dark, rainy night, and half wishing we had gone to bed at seven o'clock, and escaped such an uncomfortable evening. We were terribly afraid too, that Nell, our little Western cousin, would become disgusted with our dear old Massachusetts, and set off directly for home. To add to our discomfort, Bess began to see ghosts in the corners, and Mat whispered that she believed a black spider had bitten her.

"Girls, come here," said Aunt Ellen, just at this critical moment. "I see you want me to tell you a story," continued she, as we came trooping around her. "Now sit down and tell me what it shall be about."

"A Leap Year story," suggested Bess, upon whom the fact that it was leap year made a great impression.

"Well, a Leap Year story it shall be then," said Aunt Ellen, smiling a peculiar sort of a smile, which we could not at all understand.

"A great many years ago I had a beau—"

"O fie!" said little Nell, assuming a very savage look. But Aunt Ellen only laughed and went on.

"I'll call him Richard for the present, though that wasn't his name. He was a very clever young man, very steady and industrious, and as happy as the day was long. I declare, I never liked any one better in my life."

"Why did you not marry him then?" asked Bess.

"O, I'll tell you by-and-by," said Aunt Ellen, placidly. "Well, we were all walking home from church one Sunday afternoon, when we saw just ahead of us Richard's brother Nathan and my sister Mary."

"I didn't know we had an Aunt Mary," interposed Mat.

"They were walking along very quietly, neither speaking, apparently contented to just be in each other's sight. Richard looked at them thoughtfully for a few moments, and then said: 'Ellen, what do you think of that match?'

"I just told him that I had done thinking about it at all; for you see Nathan had waited upon our Mary seven years, and was likely to wait upon her twenty years longer. I didn't suppose they would ever be married, for Nathan thought Mary was a deal too good for him, and Mary thought just the same of Nathan."

"'Can't we help them to an understanding?' asked Richard. 'Come, Ellen, you were always a great schemer—just put your wits to work, and by Thanksgiving we'll have a real wedding in the family.'

"'It's Leap Year,' said I, demurely.

"'What of that?' asked Richard.

"'Why, nothing, only that Mary has a perfect right to propose to Nathan, seeing he will never screw up courage to propose himself.'

"'I've got it now,' shouted Richard. 'Nathan is going to spend a couple of weeks in New Hampshire soon, and while he is gone, I will write a formal proposal to Mary, appearing to come from him. Upon the same day you can write one from Mary to Nathan, claiming as her privilege the right to propose to him. Then, presto, the matter is finished, and we shall have the proud satisfaction of knowing that we have benefited the human race.'

"I readily assented to all this, for I was always ready for any scheme that promised amusement, and in this case, I quieted my conscience by saying to myself that we were going to practise a little deception that a great deal of good might come of it. In due time Nathan went on his journey, and on the day agreed upon I sat down to write my letter.

"I never shall forget that day—a pleasant May morning, and the pink and white blossoms of the fruit trees looking so beautifully, and the birds singing at the top of their voices. I was in the room above this, for I dared not write in this room because Mary was here. I had the paper before me, and the pen already dipped in the ink, when suddenly I paused, and thought for the first time seriously of what I was doing. But I remembered that it would never do to leave the scheme half-completed, for by that time probably, Richard had accomplished his part, and so I set myself to work again. I wrote a very firm but modest letter, and ended it by signing Mary's name in full. I was not very particular about imitating her hand-writing, for to my certain knowledge they had never before written to each other. Just as I had finished the super-scription, Mary entered the room, and expressed some surprise at my occupation.

"Who is that letter for?" asked she, approaching the table and observing it with great curiosity.

"I took it up carelessly. 'Guess,' said I."

"She shook her head. 'I really can't tell, unless you have got a new lover and have been writing to him.'"

"'Wrong,' said I, laughing. Pretty soon she went away, and then I hurried to deliver it into Richard's hands, who mailed it for me.

"'There,' said I, to myself, as I walked homeward, 'I'm glad that's done. Now there are some hopes that we shall have Mary married and happy at last. Dear me, I wonder what the folks would say if they only knew?'"

"That evening, Richard called to escort me to singing-school. As I was tying on my bonnet, I ventured to ask Mary to go with us, and to my great surprise, she consented. As we three went along, Richard and I talking and laughing, and Mary only speaking a word now and then, we came up behind another party.

"'I never in my life,' said Eleanor Mason, 'saw two such fools as Nathan Richardson and Mary Bright. If she had only managed rightly, she might have entrapped him years ago; and if he had only had the courage of a mouse, he would act like a man and not like an idiot.'"

"We fell behind and walked slower. I never was so angry in my life, and as for Mary, she seemed to grow quite faint and feeble all of a sudden. I knew Richard was angry too, but he said nothing, and presently we came to the schoolhouse. As we forced through the entry, Eleanor Mason met us face to face.

"'Good evening, Ellen,' said she, 'and Mary here, too—why, how do you do?'"

"Mary answered her in a cool, quiet way, but as for me, I flounced past her, without even looking at her. How Mary got through that evening I don't know, but she did somehow. When we got home, I went directly up stairs, but she said she would come in here and warm her, for the night was rather chilly. So I went up alone, but presently came back in my stocking feet and listened at that door, and then pushed it open a little and looked in. There she was, kneeling by the fire with her head in a chair, crying very quietly. It was evident that Eleanor Mason's words had wounded her deeply, more deeply than I had supposed. Ah me! if Eleanor Mason had only known what a worthless husband she was going to have herself, I think she would not have been so harsh in judging others.

"Well, a day or two went by, and one morning Neighbor Judkins stopped in his ox team, and after a great deal of preparation, fished out from his coat-pocket a letter, and handed it to mother. Mother put on those very spectacles of hers, and looked, and looked, and looked, and at last, she concluded that it must be for our Mary. Mary had gone to the barn after eggs, and so I took the letter and ran out to find her. There she was perched on a mow, hunting for the speckled hen's nest, and I tossed the letter up to her, and ran off. I saw no more of her until dinner-time, and mother was dreadfully angry to think she wasn't there to wash the vegetables and arrange the table, for I had to do something else that day. Well, while we were at dinner, she came in with the step of a queen, and a face as bright as a June day.

"'Bless the girl!' said mother, laying down her knife and fork and looking at her. Father stared, but said nothing, and I attended pretty closely to my dinner. After dinner Mary washed the dishes as usual, and not a word was said to any of us about the letter. I understood pretty well why this was, for in writing it, Richard had said, in Nathan's name of course, that it would be better to keep the matter quiet until he should get home.

"The days went by. Everybody remarked that Mary looked younger and appeared more animated than we had remembered her as looking or appearing for some time. Mother thought it was owing to her stirring about doing the housework, and not sewing as much as she used to. Father ascribed the change to his nice cider, which was, in his opinion, the cure for all the ills that flesh is heir to. I, who was in the secret, knew that Mary was drinking large quantities of an elixir which you know nothing about, children. One evening, father came in with his newspaper, and took a seat just here by the fire to read the news, as was his custom.

A sudden exclamation from father made us all look up; he had his eyes fixed upon the paper, but after a while he lifted them, and shot a queer, quick glance at Mary, and then raised his hand to his mouth, as if to keep back a groan.

"'What is the matter?' said mother. Mary didn't speak, but she kept her eyes fixed on father, awaiting his answer. He took another look at Mary, stammered out something which we couldn't understand, and then folding up the paper and putting it in his pocket, he began to walk up and down the room. Mother didn't ask another question, she understood father too well for that, but she, as well as the rest of us, watched him as closely as we dared. Pretty soon he took down his hat and went towards the outer door, but when he got as far as the entry, he stopped and called to mother, and they held a long whispered conference there, not a word of which we heard. By-and-by father opened the door and went out, and mother came back to the fire.

"'Mary,' said she, 'you look tired—you had better go to bed; and Ellen too—I don't want you any longer.'

"We were both young women grown, but we acted upon her hint without a word. Children were better trained in those days than they are now. As we passed through the entry, Mary stooped and picked up something, which she hid in her dress until we were up stairs and safe in our own room. Then she drew out before my eyes the identical paper father had been reading, and which he had somehow dropped in the entry.

"'O, Mary,' said I, as if the idea had just struck me, 'let me look at that paper a minute; there is an advertisement that I want to see.'

"The fact was, I was anxious that she should not look at the paper that night, for I felt certain there was bad news for her in it. So I said the first thing that came into my head in hopes to get possession of it.

"'You may have it in a minute, Ellen,' said she, firmly, 'but I must look at it first.'

"Then she seated herself and ran her eye eagerly over the first page. I was in despair, as you may imagine, but not long, for just as Mary was turning the sheet and preparing to scan the next page, I leaned forward and blew out the light.

"How she deplored her carelessness, as she supposed it, which had put out the light. Then she asked me eagerly, if there were any matches in the box, and I groped my way to it, and having ascertained, I answered with truth that there was not one there.

"Just then we heard mother coming up stairs, and we saw the gleam of the light she carried, as she passed by our room door. She went directly on to the south chamber, which we kept for a spare room then, and we heard her moving about in it apparently arranging things, for full half an hour. Then, our attention was suddenly attracted by a noise below, the opening of doors, voices hushed to whispers, and finally what seemed to be a procession coming up the stairway, the sound of feet treading cautiously and planted firmly on every stair, as if the burden that the hands bore was exceedingly valuable.

"I never was so frightened in my life, children. Those mysterious noises in the night-time, too, filled me with more awe than anything ever did before or has since. I whispered to Mary, but she made me no answer, and when I had found my way to her side, I discovered that she had fainted, and was lying on the floor as if dead.

"What should I do? I debated a moment, and then cautiously unlatched the chamber door and passed into the entry. Some one had left a candle upon the floor, probably setting it down hastily and then forgetting it. Though the light was a feeble one, I immediately decided that it was sufficient for my purpose, which was to read that portion of the news in the paper which had so affected my father. So I brought the paper out, unfolded it and hastily looked it over; I was more fortunate or unfortunate perhaps than Mary, for it was not long before my eyes fell upon this paragraph:

"'We are deeply pained to include among the victims of the late frightful railroad accident, one of our own townsmen, Mr. Nathan Richardson, a young man of whose talents and character it is needless to speak.'

"There was more, but I couldn't read the rest of it, I was so thunderstruck. I understood now the mystery of that evening; Nathan was dead and had been brought to our house, for having no mother or sisters, Nathan and Richard had no settled home. A step startled me and a hand laid on my shoulder made me shiver with fright.

"'Ellen, what are you doing here?'

"It was Richard, who spoke, but his voice was hoarse, and his face paler and sterner than I had ever before seen it. I held up the paper.

"'I know all, Richard—he is dead!'

"'No, Ellen, thank Heaven, it is not as bad as that; he lies in a very critical situation, it is true, but as long as there is life I shall hope.' He brushed his hand across his face as he spoke; they two being alone in the world had more affection for each other than brothers usually have.

"'Where is Mary?' said he, suddenly. 'Try and keep this from her till the morning.'

"I started; I had entirely forgotten Mary, and had left her lying upon the floor. I took a hasty leave of Richard, brought a light into our room, and after a while I succeeded in bringing Mary to life, though I almost thought then, that it would be as well for her to die, as to come back into such a cruel world. Fortunately for herself and for me, she sank into a sleep, which lasted through the night.

"Scarcely anybody ate breakfast that morning, though nearly all pretended to do so; but it wouldn't do, anxiety made us almost hate the sight of food. Mary had been told, and had borne it beautifully as mother said. We saw nothing of her, for she had gone at once to Nathan's room and was busy in the duties of her new office. And a quieter, more gentle or better nurse there never was in the world.

"Well, time went on, and one day Nathan was better and the next he was worse, but after a long time the doctor said he would recover.

"I used to watch Nathan and Mary sometimes, and wonder if the affair of the letters was ever mentioned, and each day I half-dreaded to be called to an account for my share in the business. Richard and I often congratulated ourselves upon the success of our scheme, for the pair of lovers for whom we had plotted, appeared almost as happy as we could wish. I say almost, for occasionally I noticed a slight shade on Mary's face which did not betoken perfect happiness. One day, long after Nathan had left our house, I went into that great closet to look for some pieces of a dress, leaving the door a few inches ajar. Mary sat sewing and humming some good old tune; but in a moment the humming ceased, I heard a step in the entry, and in came Nathan, looking, as I noticed through the crack of the door, as if he were perfectly satisfied with the world and everything in it.

"I was still looking, at him, when by a quick movement he dislodged a letter from some pocket, and it fell at Mary's feet. She stooped forward, rather hastily, I thought, and picked it up, just glancing at the superscription, as she returned it to the owner.

"That must be a very valuable letter," said she; "I hardly ever saw it out of your hands whilst you were sick."

"It is invaluable," was Nathan's laughing answer. "I wouldn't part with it in exchange for a mine of gold."

"Perhaps it is from a lady," said Mary, looking as if she would like to see the inside of it.

"Exactly," was the reply, "you've hit the mark; it is from a lady."

"I shouldn't be at all surprised if it were a love-letter," was Mary's next remark, uttered with a laugh, which didn't sound at all natural.

"You are right again, Mary—it is a love-letter. How wonderful that you should guess so correctly," and here he laughed as if the matter was some good joke and intensely amusing. Mary moved away towards the window and kept quite silent, whilst I, like the geese that I was, remained in the closet, half-smothered, hardly daring to breathe, and still less daring to go out and proclaim the truth, that the letter had been written by myself. There was a long silence; it seemed full an hour to me in my uncomfortable hiding-place, then I heard Nathan say:

"Well, Mary, you see I'm waiting patiently to be catechized?"

"She looked at him sharply. 'I don't understand you,' she said.

"Shall I tell you more about that letter;

the subject seemed to be interesting to you just now?" I actually trembled for fear of what would come next.

"I care nothing about your letters," said Mary, in a tone of voice which did not quite agree with her words. "You are able, I suppose, to take care of your own correspondence; or perhaps you would like to have me assist you?"

"To be sure I should," was the mild reply to this last bitter retort; "but at present I've no idea of corresponding with any one, for I have something pleasanter to think of. So you would acknowledge you know who wrote this letter?"

"I of course not. What have I to do with your love-letters?"

"A great deal, I should judge, as long as you wrote the only one I ever received."

"What in the world do you mean? I do believe you are crazy," and Mary looked angry enough, whilst I felt as if I could sink through the floor into China, if by that means I could escape this pair of angry lovers.

"Nathan advanced and held out his letter to Mary. She cast her eyes over it and then returned it, not haughtily but quietly.

"Did you think I could write that letter, Nathan, and then look you in the face afterwards? Some one has done this for a joke, it is not my handwriting."

"It was now Nathan's turn to look indignant.

"I wish I had those jokers here," said he. Mary glanced once more at the letter.

"The date is the same as that of the one which you wrote me," was her remark.

"I wrote you! I solemnly declare, I never wrote you a letter in my life, Mary."

"I couldn't help it, but just at that terrible moment the shelf above me, which I had laid hold of in my agony, gave way, and down came a heap of dishes upon my devoted head. The astounding crash frightened me into a fainting fit, and when I came to myself, I found that I was safe up stairs out of the reach of the infuriated Nathan.

"You bad girl, how could you?" said Mary, leaning over me and laughing. "We've found you out, and Richard, too; but it's all right now; Nathan and I have had our last quarrel."

"And sure enough the next Thanksgiving, there were two couples married at our house, and mother and father lost all their daughters. There, children, there's my Leap Year exploit for you, not to imitate, but to take warning by."

"Aunt," said Mat, "where are Nathan and Mary now?"

"With your father and mother, I suppose," was the laughing reply.

MEDITATION.

BY J. HOWARD WERT.

'Tis not in a gilded palace,
That glows with sapphire's beam;
But a dense and lonely forest
Beside a crystal stream,

Where the gentle wavelets ripple
In a soft, melodious flow,
And the withered leaves of autumn
Reflect a golden glow,

That I fondly love to dwell,
With my heart and harp alone,
And sing in my plaintive strain
My world of grief and groan.

'Tis here I've often wandered
With her I loved so well;
While the sky above me seemed
Of happiness to tell.

But she's gone to a better land,
Which rises to my view;
Where the angels plume their golden wings
Through the endless realms of blue;

While I am sitting all alone
On the sad and mystic shore
Of the beautiful, babbling, shaded brook,
That she treads upon no more.

But I'll not tarry long below:
But a few more dreary hours,
And I shall come to the pearly gates
And vine-encircled bowers.

THE SECRET CRIME.

A SINGULAR NARRATIVE.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

Not among the least curious and entertaining experiences in crime, and the fallibility of human penetration to detect its authors, afforded by the records of the English Pleas of the Crown, from a remote period to the present day, is the following strange incident, the very peculiarity of which seems a sufficient warranty of its truth, since efforts of fiction rarely place men in positions so novel, and yet so entirely possible. A dim recollection of having seen a somewhat similar narrative in print a number of years since, has not deterred the writer from offering it to the public, as it must necessarily be new to many.

The locality of the story was the little village of N—, lying half a league inland from one of the coasts, and containing a mixed population, chiefly composed of rough and hardy seafaring men. By this designation, the reader will understand as well those who were openly and notoriously engaged in the contraband trade, plying a hazardous and illicit, but extremely profitable commerce, between their own country and the neighboring shores of France, as well as those who engaged in the more honest operation of coasting and fishing.

As a natural consequence of this state of facts, the inhabitants of N— were in a remarkable degree rude and uncultivated. The women, for the most part, were ill-favored and slatternly in their appearance, and the men uncouth, rough and boorish. Nor were these the only unfavorable characteristics of the place. Some of the younger and more daring spirits were criminals, who had fled from other sections of the country, and who had, we may reasonably suppose, been attracted thither by the congenial freedom and recklessness of the smuggler's life. This latter class, while for the most part, young, handsome and remarkably courageous in their peculiar calling, were at the same time, malignant, vindictive and ferocious; the best evidence of which qualities, were the brawls which periodically disturbed the village. The inhabitants of the neighboring towns held the contrabandists of N— in the worst possible repute, and it was more than hinted that they were guilty of other and more heinous crimes than that of smuggling. But as regards the uncivilized character of the inhabitants of N—, there must be made one exception. For seventeen years there had been growing up to womanhood and beauty, in this unlovely community, a being whose virtues and loveliness might have redeemed it from all its reproaches. Kate Clifford—this was her name—had been rescued when a mere infant by some of the coasters, from a wrecked merchantman, which foundered in a heavy gale near the shore; she, it was believed, being the only person saved from the wreck. Thrown thus, in her earliest childhood, waif-like, among this peculiar people (a people especially zealous in bad works), she ripened from girlish beauty into womanly perfection the more speedily because of the wild and careless freedom of her life. Tall and perfectly symmetrical in person, with her dark, eloquent eye and musical voice, she might have well ornamented any higher grade of social existence, in which fate might have chanced to place her.

And yet, there was that in her daily intercourse with the rudest of those who surrounded her, which elsewhere would be sought in vain. They treated her with a deference and respect which fully showed that she was acknowledged among them as a superior being—in fact, she seemed to hold the same relation with them that a queen might to her loyal subjects.

The leaders of the young and desperate spirits to whom allusion has been made, and themselves the most desperate and unscrupulous of any, were Edgar Carroll and Mark Maynard. Each was the leader of an admiring class, and they had hitherto been rivals in all matters connected with their occupation. Now, however, they met in a rivalry more fierce, more anxious than any which had yet engaged their minds. Both seemed simultaneously to have suddenly become aware of the peculiar beauty of Kate Clifford—and with the headlong impulsiveness which characterized all of their passions, they abandoned for the while all other pursuits, and devoted themselves exclusively to her service. But it was at best a hopeless love from the first. Both seemed to feel instinctively, that a prize so bright as this which they were seeking, was far beyond their grasp—that Kate Clifford, matchless as she was, in her loveliness of person and refinement of spirit, could never mate with them, and that their vanity in this direction was destined to work no profit to either. Yet, with a gloomy, dogged obstinacy, they continually met each other in her society, happy to receive the occasional smiles which the womanly vanity and coquetry of their idol prompted her to bestow upon them, while at the same time, their half-rude, half-bashful advances were received with a quiet dignity which effectually abashed them.

A few words will be amply sufficient to describe the sentiments of the village beauty towards these hopeless aspirants for her love. Secretly despising them both, she yet encouraged their passions sufficiently to keep it alive, from the gratification afforded her by the knowledge that her power had been strong enough to humble two such ungovernable natures to her feet; and in the lack of hearts more congenial to conquer, with a coquettish exercise of her charms of person and mind, which half-invited, half-repelled, and at the same time almost crazed her admirers, she readily coerced them into a perfect state of submissive devotion, that filled their every thought and act.

Not far from the village, separated from it by a strip of the forest, filled with underwood (which we shall have occasion to refer to hereafter), stood the lofty turrets of Grenville Castle. And it was while matters were in the position just described, at the village, that Lord Robert, the present representative of the noble family whose name he bore, took up his abode there, with the avowed intention of continuing it indefinitely.

The history of this nobleman, young, handsome and wealthy as he was, was as brief as instructive. Naturally of a generous and impulsive temperament, upon succeeding to his ancestral title, five years previous to the date of this, his first appearance at Grenville Castle, tempted by the example of gay companions, and betrayed by his own too ardent spirits, he had plunged into the whirlpool of metropolitan life, and enjoyed to satiety the intoxication which its splendid sins offered him. Tired and disgusted at length with the heartless emptiness of his life, his better nature once more gaining the predominance, he emerged from the gay haunts of London, forswore its dissipations forever, and resolved to abandon at the same time all his vicious associates and habits. In pursuance of this resolution, he came to the castle, bringing with him a number of domestics, and entered at once upon the new course of life which he had prescribed for himself.

It was the second morning after his arrival, while walking upon the headland which bordered the sea, that he accidentally encountered Kate Clifford. She stood near the edge of the cliff, having removed the gipsy hat which she wore in her occasional rambles, and with her black hair unbound and streaming back in wild luxuriance over her shoulders, her eyes lighted with natural enthusiasm at the scene she beheld, and the red tinge of exercise burning faintly through the rich brunette of her complexion, she was looking off upon the sea, as it heaved its white-crested billows with perpetual restlessness, and flashed back the bright rays of the summer sun. Lord Robert paused involuntarily, and gazed with the fascination of admiration and surprise upon the beautiful girl. Never, he secretly confessed, had he seen anything in the shape of woman one half so lovely—no, not even the proudest belles of the metropolis. How long he might have gazed, unconscious of anything save her presence, must have been problematical; but a slight noise made by him drew her attention towards him, and her color deepened as she encountered his earnest eyes. Raising his hat with a respectful bow, Lord Robert passed on, querying in his own mind who and what the lady—for so he mentally styled her—could be.

His curiosity upon this point was soon satisfied by inquiries, and the story of Kate Clifford's romantic introduction and life among the people of N—, increased his interest in her. Frequent meetings, always accompanied by a bow upon his part, and a smile of recognition from her, speedily ripened into an acquaintance. And that Lord Grenville's admiration gradually warmed into affection, is demonstrated by the fact that he now sought her company daily, and that their rambles were never as before, taken in solitude.

The event of this intimacy was certain from the first. Its causes may be briefly recited. Further companionship with Kate Clifford had fully persuaded Lord Robert that he had at last discovered the great predominant necessity of his life—a woman, beautiful in mind as in person, of a congenial heart, and who loved him truly and devotedly. And upon his part the passion was most ardently reciprocated; for the first time in his wayward life, he had gained the experience of a pure and earnest passion. What the world might say he cared not. He had discarded forever the heartless conventionalities of his former life, and was now living, and so meant to live, in virtuous and happy seclusion. And after what has just been said, the reader will find no great difficulty in believing that Kate had consented to share this existence with him.

It was hardly eight months subsequent to Grenville's arrival, that the castle blazed with light one evening in honor of the marriage of its lord with the beauty of the village. Every window held a dozen lighted tapers, and soon music lent its witchery to the joy of the evening. A merry company of Lord Grenville's friends, male and female, were gathered within to rejoice in his happiness; and more than one of the gentlemen present, as he looked towards Kate, now Lady Grenville, as, robed in a dress of the purest white, her hair twined with orange blossoms, and her beautiful face beaming with pride and joy, she leaned lovingly on the arm of her husband—more than one of these secretly envied the latter his choice.

And while the music swelled the loudest, while the feet of the dancers tripped the merriest, and the mirth and joy of those within was at its height, a strange and significant spectacle might have been witnessed without. Attracted by the glare of light from the castle, a man had just crossed the meadows which lay between it and the sea, and pausing before the great entrance, gazed curiously at the windows. He was clothed in the dress usually worn by the inhabitants of N—; in addition to which he wore a wide-brimmed hat, slouched low down over his eyes. One of the servants just then issued from the castle, and to him the man directed the inquiry:

"What's all this—what's going on inside?"

"It is my lord's wedding night," was the reply.

"A wedding—who is the bride?"

The servant shook his head.

"He called her Kate, once when I was by. The other name I don't remember, but I should know it if I should hear it spoken."

"Kate?" the other exclaimed, with startling emphasis. "Not Kate Clifford?"

"Yes, that was it. I remember—"

A curse—an oath—an imprecation, so bitter, so fearful, that the servitor recoiled with astonishment, dropped from the lips of the stranger. The latter instantly raised his glaring, bloodshot eyes towards the window of the drawing-room, just above him, where a moment before the shadowy silhouettes of the figures of Lord and Lady Grenville had appeared, sharply defined upon the light drapery which intervened between them and the strange spectator. With the most hateful fury depicted upon his malignant face, the latter shook his clenched hand repeatedly towards the window, uttered another and most frightful imprecation, and disappeared.

Indulgent reader, we have told thus far what might reasonably pass for a love story; your pardon—we had no intention of doing so at the outset. We must censure this insane pen of ours, ever too ready as it is, to scribble its way into the heartsome experiences of life, and to ignore the severe actualities. And if the reader has perchance become interested in this chance love story (for, upon our honor, it wrote itself, almost; that is, the love part of it), we are sure he will pardon us for marring it so sadly as we must, in order to introduce the actual facts upon which it is based.

Two days had elapsed since the wedding at the castle, and the hilarity connected with the event had suffered no perceptible diminution. Upon the morning of the third, an equestrian expedition was projected, and as the plan met the hearty concurrence of all, preparations were immediately made. All were speedily in the saddle, save Lord Robert and his bride, and in a moment they also appeared. The former lifted the lady lightly to her saddle, and then looked for an instant from her graceful form, clad in a closely-fitting riding-habit of green, to the plume which shadowed her face.

"Bend thee hither a moment, my Lady Kate, I have something to whisper," he said, with mock gravity. And as she inclined towards him, yielding to the pressure of his arm, he snatched a kiss from her lips. Her riding-whip descended lightly upon his shoulders, and with a merry laugh she transferred the blow to her horse, which bounded fleetly away. Waving her cap in laughing defiance, she increased the speed of her flight, pursued now by the whole company, headed by Sir Robert. It was the sunniest of April days, the air was soft and balmy, and the hoofs of the horses severed the violets as they passed, while many a laborer suspended his toil as the gallant cavalcade swept past him, enlivened with gleeful shouts and peals of merriment, as Lady Kate still led the mad gallop over league after league of grassy plains.

Laugh on right merrily, goodly companions! Gaze proudly, Lord Robert, at your peerless bride—kiss your hand again to her, in answer to her repeated defiance! But never again shall she feel the pressure of your lips—that playful kiss was the last! When her lips again meet yours, two shall be white and cold, chilled with a lasting coldness!

Running through the centre of the wood which lay between the castle and the village, once before referred to, was a sinuous path, barely of sufficient width to allow two horsemen to pass abreast. The sun had passed perhaps half way from the zenith to the horizon, when our cavalcade entered the forest from the village side, and proceeded leisurely towards the castle. Lord Robert and Kate led the way, riding together, and the others followed, each lady riding by her cavalier. A third of the way had been passed, and the leaders had just turned an abrupt curve in the path. Lord Robert turned his face towards his bride, smiling approval at a light jest she had uttered—the first words of a retort were upon his lips, when the report of a pistol, which still sounded too heavy for that of a pistol, rang through the forest. Lord Grenville reeled in the saddle, clutched wildly at his loosened rein, fell forward upon the neck of his horse and instantly expired!

In men of well-balanced minds, the presence of alarming danger has the effect of exciting instant action. Before the echoes of the fatal shot had died away, four of the gentlemen had thrown themselves from their saddles; two rushed to secure the rearing and terrified horse, which still bore the weight of his dead master; the others threw themselves upon a man whom their quick eyes had detected standing within the wood, still holding in his hand a loaded pistol. The promptness of their action allowed no chance for escape; and though the prisoner at first struggled violently with his captors, he was unceremoniously hurled senseless to the earth by the indignant hands of one of them.

Lord Robert was at once lifted carefully from his saddle and stretched upon the grass, his head resting upon the knee of one of his friends. A round, smooth hole in the very centre of his white forehead, marked too surely the passage of the murderous bullet. Anxiously the companions gathered around the spot, the ladies sobbing with terror, and leaning upon their attendants, themselves hardly less moved. Lady Kate was kneeling by the side of her slain husband, clasping his cold hand tightly in hers, and repressing for the moment the crushing agony which blanched her face to a deathly whiteness. One of the gentlemen placed his fingers upon Lord Robert's pulse, but it failed to respond to the pressure. As a last test, his hunting-frock and waistcoat were torn open, and the hand pressed upon his heart. It was still—the breast itself was hardly warm!

"He is dead!" The words fell like the voice of doom upon the ear of Lady Grenville. Turning her eyes in a frenzy of horror towards the man, who was just recovering from the stunning effects of the blow he had received, and who had arisen to a sitting posture—a hand being laid heavily upon either shoulder—and then seeking once more the paling features of the dead, she sank senseless into the arms of one of the ladies, with the feebly-uttered words:

"My husband—Mark Maynard—O, you have murdered him!"

Slowly, sadly, and with heavy hearts, the cavalcade returned to the castle, bearing with it the dead, the still insensible lady, and the prisoner. Three days after, Sir Robert Grenville was placed in his ancestral tomb, mourned by his friends, but most of all by his bereaved and heart-broken bride. As for Mark Maynard, he exhibited from the first moment of his arrest, a brutal indifference which added to the universal indignation felt in the neighborhood against him. So prevalent indeed did the absolute conviction of his guilt appear, that it became plainly evident that an impartial trial in the county where the offence was committed, would be simply impossible; and a successful application was made soon after indictment, for a change of venue. London was designated as the proper place of trial, and the cause was accordingly placed upon the calendar of the then next ensuing Old Bailey.

Aside from the deep interest usually attending the examination of a capital crime, the trial of Mark Maynard elicited a degree of excitement and curiosity rarely equalled, even in London. The popularity of Lord Grenville, the singular circumstances of the crime, and general sympathy for Lady Kate, drew together such a throng upon the morning of the trial as the courtroom had never before held.

The evidence of the prosecution was brief, direct, and of itself conclusive. The place and particulars of Lord Robert's death were proved by Lady Grenville, and a number of those who had accompanied them, as well as the arrest of Maynard within ten feet of the murdered man's horses, holding the discharged pistol. So plain and convicting, in fact, was the testimony, that there seemed no loophole for escape. Upon the part of the defence, however, a most singular and startling fact was proven—and that by the witnesses for the prosecution. Both Lady Grenville and the two who immediately followed herself and husband as they rode through the forest, testified unequivocally, and with positive certainty, that at the instant of the report of the pistol, Lord Robert had turned in his saddle, looking towards Lady Grenville, so that his face was turned directly from the spot where Mark Maynard was discovered! It was further proved that the wound was in the forehead, that the bullet penetrated barely half way through the head, and that not the slightest trace of a wound was visible anywhere else upon his head or body! Here was a contradiction as strange as it was unexpected; and as the facts were shown with the absolute certainty of eye-witnesses, they seemed at first glance to preclude the possibility of the prisoner's guilt. And yet, if Mark Maynard was innocent, who could be guilty? There was but one report—there had been no other human being seen by the party since its entrance into the forest; and the circumstances of his arrest, deeply significant as they were, and which were not attempted to be explained, told heavily against him. Resort was had to other witnesses—every person who had been present was placed upon the stand, and each, so far as his or her position at the moment of the shot allowed a positive declaration, promptly corroborated the facts of the case, as they already stood.

The evidence closed here; and in an argument of great ingenuity and power, the prisoner's counsel insisted that the testimony, as it stood, demanded the acquittal of Maynard. Every conceivable hypothesis was made use of to account for his presence at the place of the murder, under circumstances so suspicious; and it was particularly urged, that no inquiry must be made as to the possibility of the deed having been committed by some other than Maynard; that upon failure to fix the crime absolutely upon him as its perpetrator, he must necessarily be acquitted. The public prosecutor followed, reviewing the evidence at length, and drawing from it the inference of Maynard's guilt; and the judge, in a charge which seemed to incline rather towards the prisoner, dwelt with much emphasis upon the legal principle, that if there appeared to the jury a reasonable and well-grounded doubt of the prisoner's guilt, he must receive the benefit of it and his discharge. For more than forty-eight hours after the case was finally submitted to them, the jury remained out in doubtful consultation. And when Maynard's friends had grown confident of an unchangeable disagreement, if not an absolute acquittal, they returned with a verdict of guilty!

Upon the following day the prisoner was arraigned for sentence. Upon being asked what he had to say why sentence of death should not be pronounced upon him, with the sullen indifference that had characterized his appearance through the trial, he replied:

"Nothing; what should I say, except to say I'm glad he's dead? And if there's any doubt as to who killed him, I may as well say now, that I hid myself where they found me, and waited there, because I wished to kill him—and that I did kill him! How the wound came in his forehead, I neither know nor care; it's enough to satisfy me, that I put it there!"

None, after this brutal declaration, could entertain a shadow of doubt as to the justice of the verdict, and it was followed by groans and hisses of indignation. The miserable man, unmoved and defiant to the last, was immediately sentenced to death, and a month after suffered the awful penalty of the law, with an unflinching fortitude which was worthy of a better end.

Twenty-five years had passed since the occurrence of the events above detailed, and this lapse of time had almost obliterated the strange tale of the death of Lord Grenville from the public mind. Twenty-five years of chastened sorrow had passed over the head of Lady Kate, and left it prematurely gray. Grief, blunted and enduring, had left her the mere wreck of her former loveliness: yet, true to the memory of her noble husband of a day, as it were, she fondly cherished his remembrance, patiently waiting for the hour which should re-unite them. So rare and beautiful a fidelity as this, gained for her the hearty sympathy and esteem, alike of the peer and the peasant; and thus, secluded from observation, at the castle, she calmly lived out the last years of her sorrowfully romantic life. Occasionally, however, she left her retreat to minister at the couch of sickness, or in the hovel of poverty—and frequently her presence in the cottages of the rude smugglers of the village, caused her name to be coupled with prayers and blessings, from lips which were far more accustomed to boisterous profanity.

Upon a wild, wintry night of January, when the snow fell fast and thick, and the shrieking blast swept in with icy chilliness from the sea, a smuggler lay dying in one of the huts of N—. He was a powerful, stalwart man of the middle age, and his face, roughly bearded and hardened, bore the marks of fierce and life-long passions. A ghastly sword-wound, laying open bone and brain, received the day before in a desperate struggle with the crew of a revenue-vessel, upon the beach, showed the cause of his prostration. For more than twenty-four hours he had lain there without sense or motion, but sinking rapidly, as could be perceived from his hard, irregular breathing, more faintly drawn at every inspiration. Suddenly opening his eyes, his consciousness returning in the hour of death, he exclaimed, in a thrilling whisper:

"Call Lady Grenville—bring Kate Clifford to my bedside! For God's sake, don't delay—I'm dying—but I will live till she comes! Hasten!"

His wife immediately despatched a messenger to the castle, and before an hour had elapsed, Lady Grenville entered the cottage. As she seated herself by the bedside, the dying smuggler fastened his eyes eagerly upon her face, and asked: "Do you know me, Lady Kate?"

She looked earnestly at him, and then shook her head negatively. How could she recognize him? Time itself is a wonderful transformer of the human countenance; but add to this twenty-five years of crime, and the loose rein of all evil passions, and the change must be great indeed!

"Then let me tell you," the man huskily whispered. "Listen, my lady, for I've a strange story for your ear! I am Edgar Carroll—and my hand sped the bullet that slew your husband!"

"You—you the murderer!" his auditor exclaimed, recoiling in horror and surprise. "How can this be?—Mark Maynard was convicted and hung for the crime!"

"Ay—and 'twas a fit punishment for the intermeddling fool!" was the vindictive rejoinder, accompanied by a hateful gleam of the eye. "Fool—who made him an avenger?" he continued, vehemently. "I was well satisfied to let him hang. But no matter, let me tell my tale while I have speech to tell it."

"You can forgive me, Lady Kate, for loving you as I did, if not for killing the man whom you loved. I was an idiot to think of you—but you compelled me to do it. You, Lady Kate—you were the cause of Sir Robert's death!"

"In Heaven's name, wretched man, explain yourself! What can you mean?" the terrified woman asked.

"It is true as God's word!" was the wildly-spoken rejoinder. "Why did you craze me with your beauty? Why did you smile upon me, till the lurking devil in my heart made me swear to kill Lord Grenville, because you had chosen him to smile upon, and not me? It was a bitter oath,

I promise you. I swore it before the castle, upon your bridal night—and I kept it most religiously! But hearken only for a moment," he continued, as his listener averted her pale and tearful face, "and you shall know all. I hid myself in the forest, some distance from the path, the next day, with a loaded pistol, and waited for your party to pass. At last the moment came; you rode upon the side nearest me, and Lord Grenville just beyond. I fired just as he turned his face toward you, and the ball lodged in his forehead, as I meant it should. And at the very instant, at the second when I fired, I saw the flash of a pistol, directly opposite me; and the bullet from that pistol entered the very tree behind which I stood! You can find it there to-day, without question.

"You will forgive me, Lady Kate? Lord Robert died—Maynard died—I'm dying—and you, too, must one day die! Don't curse me for killing him. Smile once, just as you used to, to show that you forgive it. There—God bless you,—God forgive me!"

A faint smile of forgiveness illumined for an instant the pallid features of the lady. Before the eyes of the penitent outlaw, it shone like the harbinger of eternal peace. Seizing her hand, he pressed it convulsively to his bearded lips, and then fell back upon his pallet, dead.

It is perhaps unnecessary to add the explanation, that Mark Maynard had suffered death at the hands of the hangman, in profound ignorance that he was innocent of the murder of Lord Grenville, in fact. Innocent in fact, but not in heart; and it can hardly be said that the unparalleled train of accidents which consigned him to the gallows, visited him with an unmerited doom.

A SCOTCH LEAP YEAR STORY.

A bachelor in the village of Carnoustie, having been left alone in the house with the servant, one evening lately, had been sitting meditatively, when the room door was thrown open, and the fair "help" appeared, and told him that she could live no longer without him, and consequently that he must marry her, and the sooner the better. The astonishment of the gentleman was so great, that some time elapsed before he could reply in the negative, and the damsel was coolly preparing to act as mistress, when he ordered her to quit his presence, which she did after some hesitation. Next morning, acting upon the advice of a friend, the persecuted bachelor dismissed the abigail, who found herself expelled from a house, of which she fondly imagined she would soon become the mistress.

HOMESICK.

BY MRS. E. B. EDSON.

I've stood upon the rocky strand,
And listened to the breakers' roar;
I've heard the sephyræ die away,
Low rippling on Lake Erie's shore;
I've watched the crimson sunset dyes
Transforming, with their magic wand,
To more than Eden loveliness
The flowery realms of prairie land.

I've climbed the Rocky Mountains' height,
Whose spires far-reaching cleave the sky;
Who grimly keep their sentry-watch,
While cycles roll and nations die.
And I have knelt with reverent awe
Amid those scenes so wildly grand,
And wondered if could be more fair
The haven of rest—the better land.

Yet ever breathes one haunting spell,
One thought in every whisper borne,
Of where I twined the orange flower,
And where the cypress-wreath are worn.
That home of all o'er this fair earth
Is closest to my being wed;
For there first woke my natal morn,
And there repose my sainted dead.

Trials of Margaret Hepsibah.

BY LYDIA C. GRAVES.

WELL, the mischief was done now to be sure! Immersed in Tennyson, which I had seldom an opportunity of reading, I had relaxed my usual vigilance, and allowed that sacred portal, the garden gate, to be opened by profane hands. Tramp, tramp, tramp! up, the garden walk came a pair of feet, encased in a pair of remarkably stout shoes. Thus much of the daring intruder I saw through the branches of the honeysuckle, which was trained over my window.

With unusual heroism and presence of mind, I ran to the door, which opened into the garden and took a long look out. O, horror of horrors! what did I behold! A swarthy foreigner, seated under a currant bush, gathering the blushing fruit into a large basket.

Now I had had warnings enough if that were all; warnings from every member of the household, from "mater-familias" down to the pet Effie. The universal cry had been:

"Now, Maggie, be sure and keep an eye on the currants; there's no knowing how many of 'them' strollers there may be about."

Hadn't I also been told that by to-morrow morning the fruit would be just in a fit state to be gathered; and hadn't it been arranged that we were to go out in a body to perform that duty; and hadn't Aunt Jane been promised a bushel with which to make currant wine; and, O, dear! there was that horrid, hateful wretch, filling his dirty basket.

Harriet Anne, my sister, has a great horror of strollers and pedlars, and invariably slams the door in their faces. I, on the contrary, always view them as very picturesque objects, and treat them accordingly; nothing can be more courteous than the gracious wave of the hand with which I dismiss them from the premises.

Here, however, was a different case; an uncommonly forbidding-looking person, seated in the shadow of our currant bushes, busily engaged in filling the capacious maw of a filthy basket, was anything but a picturesque sight in my indignant eyes. I literally rushed from the house, and planting myself directly by the intruder, I favored him with the following burst of eloquence:

"Take yourself out of this garden at once, sir! What do you mean by coming in here and stealing our fruit?"

No answer! but the villanous face was slowly turned towards me, and a combination of a leer and a smile played for an instant about the ugly mouth. At that sight my wrath bubbled up anew.

"Begone, you wretch! There's the gate! Take yourself out of it quickly!" and as I spoke, I pointed in a theatrical manner at the sacred portal.

No answer! but following the direction of my finger with his eyes, this audacious thief nodded with the air of a man, who, having been requested to look at some rural object in which he had not the slightest interest, was disposed to do all that was courteous and polite in the matter.

A thought struck me; perhaps the man did not understand English! I would try him in Italian. My knowledge of this language is not very great, but I was rather proud than otherwise of the speech which I addressed to the intruder, in the soft accents of his native land.

No answer! far from being paralyzed and cowed by my unwonted effort in Italian, the wretch only went on steadily filling his dirty basket.

I would try him in French, though I was rather dubious about his being a Frenchman. Now, I have studied French all my life, and speak it almost as well as a native. As the people of this nation are unusually polite, I thought it best to word my request in as polite a manner as possible. So I put my strong Saxon phrase into softened French, and lest the feelings of my companion should be very much injured, I ended my sentence with a courteous, "s'il vous plait, monsieur."

No answer! but I was frightened to observe that the huge basket was more than a quarter full, and that the horrid creature was grinning to himself. Perhaps he was a German, and had wandered from Fatherland to our hospitable shore; I wished, for goodness' sake, that he were back in his own beer-drinking land. I am not an enthusiastic admirer of the German language, and know very well that I shall lose caste among my friends for making such a confession. However, that's neither here nor there.

Many a time have I been drilled upon those gutturals, and don't I hate them? The only practical use I ever put my knowledge to, was upon the occasion to which I am referring. Putting on my loftiest air, I growled out a few words to the thief in the shadow of our currant bushes. The sound seemed to come from some subterranean cavern, and produced more impression upon myself than upon my companion. There was no answer from him, but the filthy basket was almost half-full.

O, dear me! what should I do! I had exhausted my store of languages, and all this without success. It was no sort of use to try Greek and Latin, and as for Spanish, I didn't know a word of it; besides, I was almost sure he was not a Spaniard.

A bright idea came into my head, the thief must be deaf and dumb. Now I had once spent some months in a blind asylum, and as there were some there who were also deaf and dumb, I had learned their alphabet perfectly. I took a new station in front of this voiceless tormentor, and having attracted his attention, I commenced. Before I had got through the first word, down dropped his eyes, the fingers of both hands went faster to work than ever, and, O, horror! the basket was two-thirds full.

What do you suppose I did next? Having threatened in every language, I descended to entreaties in each, commencing as before in English.

"O, dear, good man," I said, "please go away; you'll get caught if you don't. If you'll go right away now, you may have all the currants you've got. Do go, please. If you will, I'll never tell any one about it."

No answer! though I tried the same appeal, irresistible I considered it, in every language, I was mistress of, it was no sort of use. The hardened wretch replied only by a grin.

Time was passing; the sun was slowly but surely travelling towards the west, and that frightful basket was almost full. All my hopes now clustered about that same basket; just as soon as that was full I expected to see this bold thief march off with his ill-gotten plunder. So it was with a sort of desperate calmness that I watched and waited. Now, it was full up to the brim, but that wasn't sufficient for this boldest of robbers. With almost a feeling of admiration I watched the skill with which he piled one bunch above another, until the basket could bear not one currant more. Then a sense of relief came over me; it was more than brimming full, and now he would surely go off.

He rose, shook himself, cast a look at his stout shoes, moved his basket carefully out of the path, and then walked towards the house.

"Stop!" I cried, "you're going the wrong way; the other path leads to the gate."

This valuable information drew no answer in return. The monster walked straight on to the house, and came through the back door, into the kitchen. I followed in a state of mind bordering on madness. He seemed to divine, with a sort of instinct, which was the door of the closet; swinging it open he looked in, there was nothing there but dishes.

Nothing daunted, he walked straight on, till he came to the cellar door, opened that, and disappeared down the stairs. At that moment I fervently wished he would fall and break his neck; but I was not destined to be gratified. For some moments I heard the creature rummaging around below, and during this time I remained quietly in the kitchen, for I was at my wits' end, and knew not what to do. I had one forlorn hope left; and that was, that in his wanderings, he would fall into a hoghead of water that was placed in the cellar. Vain, indeed, was this hope; for it wasn't long before he re-appeared at the cellar door, and O, horrors! he was laden with food. First, there were the remains of the chicken-pie that we had had for dinner, then a plate of bread, one of cheese, an apple-pie, and lastly a plate of pickles.

These were all arranged, very neatly I must confess, upon the kitchen table, and then my self-invited guest sat down to enjoy himself. At every epithet that I applied to him, for I began with "thief," and ran through the whole scale, my companion only ate the faster and with greater gusto; finding that such a course was only a whet to his appetite, I presently desisted from it.

The chicken-pie disappeared with marvellous rapidity, as did all the other viands, with the exception of one pickle. Indeed the trencher performance was finished without a sign of choking, and consequently there was no hope of defeating my enemy in that manner.

Having finished his meal, my visitor arose, shook himself again, took another admiring look at his great, horrid shoes, and wound up by looking me straight in the face for the first time, making two or three motions with his hands and drawing our great bread-knife playfully across his throat. I understood him perfectly, he meant simply, "if you tell, I'll kill you."

The moment the door had closed upon him, I both locked and bolted it, and then sat down to have a comfortable cry. Having accomplished this much, I arose, opened the door again, and seizing the remaining pickle with a pair of tongs, I threw it as far as possible into the garden.

"Mag, what in the world are you about?" said Harriet Anne, who entered at that moment, followed by the rest of the family.

"Hum!" said Amanda Jane, who, between you and me, is a very sharp girl—"Mag, what have you had here? Hum—pickles! hum—chicken! hum—cheese!"

"Margaret Hepsibah," said "mater-familias," drawing on her spectacles and casting a severe look upon me, "who has been here, child?"

"O, the garden gate is open," said Effie, who had been making explorations.

"Euphemia Angelina, be quiet," said "mater-familias;" "now, Margaret Hepsibah, has any one been here—tell me, quickly, child?"

"Yes, marm."

"Some stroller, I'll be bound," said Harriet Anne, whose objection to this class of people I have before mentioned.

It isn't worth while to relate the particulars of that conversation between the indignant members of my family and myself. Suffice it to say, that the remembrance of that playful pantomime, in which our bread-knife took a conspicuous part, effectually sealed my lips on the subject of my visitor.

It might have been a week after this occurrence, that "mater-familias" saw fit to make an afternoon visit in company with Harriet Anne, and Effie; consequently Amanda Jane and myself were left at home to employ ourselves according to our own "sweet will." Amanda Jane's "sweet will" soon took her off in company with an escaped convic—no, I mean collegian, in the person of Cousin Charley, who was a dreadful rattle-pate and a great friend of Amanda Jane's. It was with some misgivings that I saw the laughing pair march off arm-in-arm, and realized my lonesome situation; not a soul in the house but myself—and that horrid stroller might come again.

"Au revoir," said Charles, kissing his fingers to me and grinning maliciously, ere he disappeared with his frivolous and unromantic companion over the brow of the hill.

I shall always think that some fatality is sure to attend the reading of Tennyson. Now "mater-familias" had not exactly forbidden me to read that volume, but she invariably looks daggers at it, when it appeared in my hands; so I used to read it by stealth. Following my "sweet will" I had opened the book and was just in the midst of one of the most bewitching poems, when there was a knock at the door.

I jumped up in dismay. What if my stroller had come back again! if he had, I should die on the spot. Goodness! what a relief! As I opened the door, my eyes fell upon a very dapper personage, whose carpet-bag and small trunk revealed the fact that he was a pedler.

"Will you buy anything to-day, marm?" fell upon my ears in the sweetest of voices, agreeably mingled with a slight foreign accent.

I glanced sharply at the person before me. His long, dark hair hung down upon his shoulders, and accorded well with the bronzed complexion, and the dark, glossy beard which adorned the lower part of his face. He was neatly dressed, and wore very respectable shoes; I mention this because I am fastidious in the matter of shoes, and had been disgusted by a sight of those worn by the stroller, whose acquaintance I had made the week before.

"Will you buy anything to-day, marm?"

There he stood, meek and pleasing, his eyes modestly cast downward, his whole appearance just what it should be. Now, I had been warned time and time again, against purchasing of pedlers, for, as "mater-familias" said, "them foreigners were great cheats." But here was a slightly different case; in fact, my heart was melted by the youthful appearance, the modest mein, and the pleasing air of the person before me.

I looked at his wares; there was the usual assortment of needles, pins, tapes, etc., none of which I wanted. I shook my head to signify as much, and he slowly and with a sorrowful air, began replacing the articles. Suddenly his face brightened; he drew a paper from his pocket, and unrolling it, displayed to my admiring eyes, a rich gold locket, most beautifully chased.

"I picked this up one day in travelling, and I cannot find an owner for it. Will you buy it?" His voice seemed to grow more melodious, and his manner more pleasing.

Now, I am passionately fond of poetry and jewelry, and as I twirled this beautiful locket between my fingers, I thought how delighted I should be to own it. I had for some time been jealous of Amanda Jane who possessed, as a birthday present from "mater-familias," a gold locket similar to this one, but not nearly so beautiful. Here was a rare chance of happiness offered to me, and should I let it slip through my fingers? I timidly inquired the price of the treasure.

"Three dollars, and very cheap, marm," he replied.

Yes, it was cheap; why, "mater-familias" had paid an almost fabulous price for Amanda Jane's, and this one was just as good gold and very beautiful in its finish. I resolved to take it, and running up stairs, procured my purse in which was the sum of three dollars and two cents. Descending, I handed the three dollars to the pedler, who thanked me in that peculiarly sweet voice of his, and then gathering up his treasures, he departed through the front gate.

An hour afterwards, Amanda Jane came slowly sauntering in, and her eye soon caught sight of my treasure, which I had taken pains to put in a conspicuous situation.

"What's this, Mag?"

"A gold locket, dear," in my softest and sweetest tones.

"Where did you get it?" said Amanda Jane, sharply.

"I bought it, love," said I, blandly.

"Of whom?" and she looked at me sternly.

"A pedler, dear; it was so cheap."

"How much did you give?"

"Three dollars, love; isn't it beautiful?" and my voice expressed an unchristian-like exultation, which Amanda Jane must have noticed.

"Margaret Hepsibah, you're a fool!" said Amanda Jane, with a sternness I never knew her to exhibit before.

I looked at her inquiringly; her face was flushed, and she trembled all over.

"Don't you see?" continued she, "that this is my locket, and that it must have been stolen?"

No, I didn't see any such thing, Amanda Jane needn't try to wheedle me out of everything.

"Look here, Mag!" I looked, and saw three letters, A. J. O. which stood for Amanda Jane Onthank, cunningly inscribed upon a portion of the locket.

It is impossible to describe the scene that followed. "Mater-familias" came home in the midst of it, and, O, such persecutions as I endured. Amanda Jane was the most gentle towards me, but the other three were bitter enough. Euphemia Angelina, upon whom I have expended a small fortune in molasses candy, proved a most implacable enemy. Such is the gratitude of pets!

I sat that evening, moodily devouring the village paper. Such a quantity of trash as they contrive to crowd into that sheet, it is impossible for any one to comprehend unless they have been bored with it once a week, for half a dozen years, as we have. Something new met my eager eye in the shape of a matrimonial notice. "A gentleman, etc., etc., good habits and connection, etc., a young lady of cheerful disposition, etc.," in fact, the usual rigmarole employed in such cases.

I have no great opinion now of the people who insert such advertisements in the papers, but I was only "sweet seventeen," then, and moreover, I was enduring great persecutions from my nearest of kindred. It was under such desperate circumstances that I penned a note to Carolus Flagstaff, the gentleman whose name appeared under the advertisement I have mentioned. I penned it in secret, for I dared not brave the wrath of "mater-familias" a third time. Hadn't I, time and again, heard her say that "people who wrote them" advertisements ought to be "taken" up and put in jail—when "mater-familias" is angry, she is very apt to bid defiance to all rules of grammar—and now if she found me out wouldn't she scold?

To prevent such a discovery, I mailed my letter from the next town, and then waited with some anxiety to hear from Mr. Flagstaff. He was evidently one of those men, who consider "punctuality as the soul of business," for the very next mail brought me a comical-looking document, which informed me that the writer would consider it a great favor if I would still continue to correspond with him, and as business would shortly bring him to our village, he should hope for a speedy meeting. So far, so good; indeed, the only thing that now troubled me, was the style of Mr. Flagstaff's handwriting, which was decidedly poor, very school-boyish, in fact.

In my new and delightful occupation, household troubles were in a measure forgotten. It took just about half my time to write notes, and the other half to take them to the post-office, so that every spare moment was agreeably occupied. In the course of time, Mr. Flagstaff announced to me that he had arrived in our village, and our long-proposed meeting was arranged to take place in a quiet spot near our house.

I put on my prettiest dress that afternoon, for I wished very much to make a favorable impression. Amanda Jane was troublesomely curious to know where I was going, but I would not gratify her. I don't think I ever looked better than I did that day, when having completed my toilet, I set out for my walk.

I walked on in the best of spirits until I came to the brow of the hill; then I began to wish myself back again, and to wonder what "mater-familias" would say, if she should hear of the affair. "Courage," I said to myself, and then walked steadily on again, until I came to the very spot.

At first I saw nothing, but soon recovering my vision, I discovered to my infinite horror, that same greasy foreigner, who had stolen our currants and eaten our victuals on a former memorable occasion.

"Take yourself off, you wretch!" said I, forgetting that it was useless to talk to him.

The wretch looked at me for a few moments, then slowly opened a capacious mouth, and uttered the loudest ha! ha! ha! I ever heard in my life. The sound was echoed from the top of the hill, and looking around, I saw Amanda Jane coming towards us, almost convulsed with merriment.

"Amanda Jane!" said I, with great dignity. My speech was greeted with another explosion of laughter, so loud and so long, that furious as I was, I caught myself joining in it.

What should I do? Every moment, I expected to see the tall, elegant figure of Mr. Flagstaff coming over the hill—you see, I had made up my mind that he was both tall and elegant.

"Go away at once, sir, else I shall expose you as a thief!" I ventured to say to the hateful-looking man.

He opened his mouth and spoke in a shockingly mocking manner:

"O, dear, good man, please go away; you'll get caught if you don't."

Amanda Jane greeted this feeble attempt at pleasantry with another burst of laughter. Where had I heard those words?

"I picked up this locket in my travels; will you buy it?" and this time, the wretch spoke in the sweetest of voices.

"O, please, Charley, do tell her! if you don't I shall die laughing," and Amanda Jane caught hold of the arm of that dirty foreigner.

Charley! hum! was it possible!

"O, dear, dear!" said Charley, who is the best mimic in the world, "Margaret Hepsibah, recognize in me the thief, the pedler, and—Mr. Flagstaff. I've had the greatest fun, goosey, that ever was, and so has Amanda Jane. We've done nothing but laugh at you the last six weeks; it's almost too bad, I confess, but forgive us, Margaret Hepsibah!"

I managed, in my fury, to speak but one word: "Monster!"

"Come, come, Mag," said Charley, "I am about tired of 'wretch' and 'monster,' and all those sorts of words. Invent something new, and then abuse me as much as you please. You can't think how nicely our currant wine tastes, and all because I selected the richest and ripest berries."

I wasn't to be wheedled into forgiving him, not I. When Charley married our Amanda Jane, it was Harriet Anne who officiated as bridesmaid, not Margaret Hepsibah.

LEARN THE VALUE OF MONEY.

A silver dollar represents a day's work of the laborer. If it is given to a boy, he has no idea of what it cost, or of what it is worth. He would be as likely to give a dollar as a dime for a top, or any other toy. But if the boy has learned to earn his dimes and dollars by the sweat of his face, he knows the difference. Hard work is to him a measure of values that can never be rubbed out of his mind. Let him learn by experience that a hundred dollars represents a hundred weary days' labor, and it seems a great sum of money. A thousand dollars is a fortune, and ten thousand is almost inconceivable, for it is far more than he ever expects to possess. When he has earned a dollar, he thinks twice before he spends it. He wants to invest it so as to get the full value of a day's work for it. It is a great wrong to society and to a boy, to bring him up to a man's estate without this knowledge. A fortune at twenty-one, without it, is almost inevitably thrown away. With it and a little capital to start on, he will make his own fortune better than any one can make it for him.

PLANT TREES.—There is no way in which a man can keep his memory "greener" than by planting trees. Napoleon the Third seems desirous of emulating the fame of Henry IV. in his skill in planting. Chestnut trees are making their appearance in all portions of Paris. The Conservatoire des Arts et Metiers, the square in the Marche des Innocents, the Place du Louvre, the Boulevards, from the Madeleine to the Bastille, attest the emperor's energy; and now the south side of the Champs Elysees is to follow the example set it by the north in the variety of its trees and gardens.

PORTRAIT PAINTERS.

Constable, in his youth, is said to have attempted the portrait of a gentleman six several times, and in neither could he satisfy his employer—a gentleman of the class who expect the painter to remedy the defects of Nature and supply beauty where there is not even a hint to suggest it. He finally procured a head of Saint Paul—the study of some tyro, in the usual style—and having modernized the drapery, he requested the gentleman to sit again, painting at the same time on a landscape, while his sitter supposed him occupied with his countenance. In due time the painting was sent home, giving entire satisfaction, and receiving the praise of a wonderful production—the gentleman at the same time saying it was a most perfect portrait, and condemning the taste of his friends who protested “there was no likeness at all.”

Hogarth having painted a portrait which a difficult sitter refused to take, metamorphosed it, with a few strokes of his pencil, into the likeness of a gentlemanly ape—still retaining enough of the expression of the sitter to make it known at first sight. It is needless to state that it was soon taken off his hands at a fair valuation. The Art Union relates a story of a lady—an emulative parvenue—who wished to rival another in the expensiveness of her portrait, as well as in that of her equipage. She inquired of the artist the most expensive colors. “Ultra-Marine,” was the reply. “Then paint me all Ultra-Marine.”—Anecdotes of Painters.

WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR.

The following extract from the life of the wife of the Conqueror is exceedingly curious, as being highly characteristic of the manners of a semi-civilized age and nation: “After some years delay, William appears to have become desperate, and, if we may trust to the evidence of the Chronicle of Ingerbe, in the year 1047, waylaid Matilda in the streets of Bruges as she was returning from mass, seized her, rolled her in the dirt, spoiled her rich array, and, not content with these outrages, struck her repeatedly, and rode off at full speed. This Teutonic method of courtship, according to our author, brought the affair to a crisis; for Matilda, either convinced of the strength of William’s passion by the violence of his behaviour, or afraid of encountering a second beating, consented to become his wife. How he ever presumed to enter her presence again, after such a series of enormities, the chronicler saith not, and we are at a loss to imagine.”—Miss Strickland.

A SHREWD QUESTIONER.

“Friend,” said a shrewd Quaker to a man with a drove of hogs, “hast any hogs in thy drove with large bones?”

“Yes,” replied the drover, “they all have.”

“Hast any with long heads and sharp noses?”

“Yes, they all have.”

“Hast any with long ears, like those of the elephant, hanging down over their eyes?”

“Yes, all my drove are of that description, and will suit you exactly.”

“I rather think they wouldn’t suit me, friend, if they are such as thou describes them. Thou may’st drive along.”—Providence Journal.

A RESURRECTION.

In 1800, the 31st regiment was serving in Holland, and at Egmont-op-Zee crossed bayonets with the French bearing the same number; a ball fired during the retreat of the latter regiment, passed through the jaws of a soldier of the 31st, named Robert Hullock; in the course of the afternoon he was buried in the sand hill where he had fallen, by a soldier of his regiment named Carnes. During the night Hullock recovered, and having been lightly covered with sand, crept out and crawled to a picket of his regiment posted near. He was sent to the hospital, recovered, and was serving with his regiment in Malta in 1806. His face having been much discolored, and his voice scarcely intelligible (a part of his tongue and palate having been carried away), he had for some years served as pioneer to his company; a soldier of it died, and Hullock, as a part of his duty, dug the grave, in which he was found on the arrival of the body for interment, still at work, though then nearly ten feet deep. On being drawn out and asked his reason for making it so unusually deep, he replied: “Why, sir, it is for poor John Carnes, who buried me; and I think, sir, if I get him that deep, it will puzzle him to creep out as I did.” On the burial service being read, he proceeded to fill up the grave, and actually buried the man who ten years previous had buried him. Hullock was discharged and pensioned in 1814.—United Service Journal.

EFFECTS OF IMAGINATION.

When the waters of Glastenbury were at the height of their reputation, in 1751, the following story was told by a gentleman of character:—An old woman of the workhouse at Yovril, who had long been a cripple and made use of crutches, was strongly inclined to drink of the Glastenbury water, which she was assured would cure her lameness. The master of the workhouse procured her several bottles of water, which had such an effect that she soon laid aside one crutch, and not long after, the other. This was extolled as a most miraculous cure, but the man protested to his friends that he had imposed upon her and fetched water from an ordinary spring. I need not tell your readers that the force of imagination had spent itself, and she relapsed into her former infirmity.—Blackwood.

KAFFIR PUNISHMENTS.

Death is frequently inflicted among this nation, and in various ways, most of them diabolically cruel. This is one specimen of the most ingenious and refined cruelty, and one of the most frightful tortures that can be inflicted. The culprit is rubbed all over with grease; he is then taken to an ant-hill, against which he is placed and secured to the ground. The ant-hill is then broken, and the ants left to crawl over him, and eat his flesh from his bones, which they do in time most effectually. The Inquisition never invented a torture so horrible and lingering as this must be. Let us remind the reader that ants are three times the size of those he is accustomed to see in England and their bite most irritating and painful.—The Cape and the Kaffirs.

THE REALM OF THOUGHT.

BY JAMES HOWARD.

Know ye the fair land where the ivy is twining
 With circlets of laurel and bay;
 Where there's no weeping, nor sorrow, nor pining,
 But light and gold-sphyr'd day;

Where the fragrance of flowers is forevermore welling
 Through the nebulous depths of air,
 And myriad voices in chorus are swelling,
 Like the voices of angels fair;

Where the gold-pinked songster mounts the blue sky,
 And warbles forevermore;
 Where the azure-tinted billows sweep lovingly by,
 And kiss the jewel-clad shore;

Where the sephyr's float over the moss-covered glens,
 And sing in the palm-covered plain;
 Where Scotia's mountains, and turrets, and fens,
 Are mingled with India's main?

'Tis the fair, fleeting land of vision and thought,
 Surcharged with golden dreams;
 With love and beauty as bounteously fraught,
 As Elysium's pearly streams.

GOING INTO THE COUNTRY.

BY MARY W. JANVRIK.

"AND so, brother mine, instead of accompanying our party to Newport, you will persist in burying yourself in the woods?" pouted the rich, fashionable and aristocratic Mrs. Fanny Webster, as her handsome brother trifled with the tassel of his dressing-gown at the breakfast table. "Now it does seem so strange to me, Ellis, that you should want to rusticate when everybody is going to the seaside! I should think you'd had enough of seclusion in that horrid law school, to want to quit your musty books and enjoy society for a season. I declare, it vexes me that you will disappoint me so, when I had half promised Josephine Sumner and her friends that you would make one of our party. And Edward is as much vexed as myself. If he can get away for a week from business, why need you refuse? Come, Ellis, say you will go with us!" urged Mrs. Webster.

"Couldn't, for my word's sake, Fanny. Sorry to disappoint you, but you see the promise of this visit is a year old, made when I was up to Uncle John's for a day or two last summer; and now the old gentleman has written to remind me of it. See here!" And the young man drew forth a square folded letter, minus envelope, and superscribed in an old-fashioned, cramped hand, "Ellis Leighton, Esquire, No. 20 C— Street, Boston, Massachusetts." "And so you see, sister, 'twouldn't be just right to disappoint him."

"Well, if you care more for old Uncle John's invitation than mine—"

"Or Miss Josephine Sumner's," interrupted Ellis, drily.

"You may go and bury yourself up in that out-of-the-way Suncook!" pouted pretty Mrs. Fanny Webster, the petted bride of six months. "For you're the oddest mortal I ever did see, Ellis! As for Miss Sumner, you never have met the lady; and what put the absurd idea into your head that she cares for you as an addition to our party, I can't conceive! But it's just like you. Men are so conceited, now-a-days! Vanity is the besetting sin of every one of you. Even Edward, he thinks—"

"Just what his little wife Fanny thinks, that he's the best husband, and the handsomest, and wears the most splendid moustache of any man in all Boston! And how little Fanny Leighton did manœuvre to get him, to be sure!" exclaimed Mr. Webster, coming back into the breakfast room from the hall where he had overheard this conversation. "But never mind me, Fan, scold that lazy brother of yours well, he deserves it all; and give me a kiss, quick, for I must hurry to catch the down town 'bus!" And the young husband hurried away.

"Seriously, brother, I wish you'd put away some of these whims, and let me introduce you to Miss Sumner. She is far from what you imagine her—a gay belle!" persisted Mrs. Webster.

"O, haven't I heard her quoted—her doings and sayings, the style of her wardrobe, her singing, dancing, etc.? In short, have I heard anything else among your young lady friends since I came to board with you, but this Miss Sumner? No, Fanny, thus far have I escaped the Sumner mania, so allow me to go hence free from the contagion." And Ellis was about rising from the table.

"Stay, Miss Sumner is not to blame for being handsome or wealthy," retorted Mrs. Webster. "And how could she help becoming the mode, with her attractions? Neither you nor I are insensible to such, if we tell our honest opinions. I won't be deceitful, Ellis, I like handsome people, and gay, fashionable people, but I like goodness, too; and Miss Sumner is refined, intelligent, and noble-hearted, as she is beautiful. If you knew her, you would learn this."

"Ah, most gracious requisites for the belle of a city season. I do not doubt the lady's attractions," said Ellis, half sneeringly, "but I do doubt her power to number among her admirers your very humble brother, Ellis Leighton. But I must go down town. Do you know that I go in as partner with Esquire Brief—Brief & Co.—in September? Fact, sister, your brother will make a 'rising lawyer' one of these years, provided he sticks to his profession and leaves matrimony out of the question. Can't become both famous and a Benedict in one breath, Fanny; so I'll cut Cupid, and court Coke and Blackstone. As for Miss Sumner, I am glad to hear of her transformation into a noble-hearted woman, for really, sister, I must say before I leave, that I had always judged her to be, what I thoroughly despise, a heartless flirt! But wonders will never cease, and woman is an anomaly. Good morning, Fanny!" And with a strange, sarcastic smile on his well-cut lips, Ellis Leighton ascended to his own room.

"How peculiar Ellis is! Such notions as he persists in about Josephine Sumner! I shall never bring about their meeting now, and they are made for each other! O, dear, Ellis will certainly be a bachelor!" sighed pretty Fanny Webster, over the breakfast table.

"A noble-hearted woman!" repeated the young man bitterly as he entered his room, and, unlocking a private escritoire, took thence an elegant velvet lined miniature on which he gazed with curling lips. "No, you are not to blame for being handsome and wealthy, Josephine Sumner, but you are to blame for being what I know you are, a heartless coquette! And now, to endeavor to ensnare me in your toils again! No wonder you have not dared tell Fanny how we met, and how we parted!" Then he hastily replaced the miniature, turned the key in the escritoire, and a few minutes later descended the staircase to the street door, lightly humming an opera air, apparently the careless-hearted fellow whom everybody took Ellis Leighton to be.

And as he walked down Beacon Street, sedulously avoiding even a glance at the elegant mansion not many rods distant from his sister's door, where Miss Sumner was spending a few months with her maternal uncle and guardian, the rich merchant, Mr. Benton, in whose firm Edward Webster was junior partner—as he walked along, a pair of hazel eyes peered from behind the closed blinds of the drawing-room, and a white hand nervously crushed the silken tassel swaying from the window hangings.

An hour after, blooming Nelly Benton, her youthful, sixteen-year old cousin, came into the drawing-room with a decided pout on her lips, and sinking on a lounge, and fanning herself violently with her hat brim, exclaimed:

"It's too bad, Josey! I've just come from Fanny Webster's, and she says Ellis is going off, post haste, into the country, and has quite refused joining her at Newport, and here I'd been planning for you two to meet, I knew you'd like him so! It's real mean! I used to like Ellis Leighton, ever so much, but I think he's a great hateful now—that I do!—and I'll tell him so the very first time I have an opportunity. Only to think! he hasn't set foot in our house for these four months, and he used to be so social. It must be that he's afraid of you, Josey, so many gentlemen come here, you know."

"Yes," said Josephine Sumner, bitterly, when left alone, blinding tears springing into her eyes, "yes, Ellis Leighton is afraid to come here, for he thinks me vain and heartless. O, if he but knew—but knew! Can it be that we are never to meet? That I can never explain that fatal mistake?" And the tears dropped thickly on her jewelled fingers.

That day week Fanny Webster's brocatelle upholstered furniture was in brown Holland covers; and, joined by her husband, with Miss Sumner, Nelly Benton and her elegant brother Edgar, and others of their set, comprising a gay and fashionable party, they turned their faces Newportward. And on the twilight of the same day that bore the pleasure seekers from their city homes, Ellis Leighton alighted from the old-fashioned stagecoach at the door of a cool, airy farmhouse in New Hampshire; and Aunt Mary and golden-haired Cousin Bessie came out to greet him, and Uncle John heartily echoed their warm welcome.

Days and weeks went by at Newport. It was the old story over again—the routine of all fashionable watering-places—late breakfasts, where belles, pale and languid from last night's dissipation, slowly sipped their coffee, the forenoon dip in the surf, the ordeal of dressing for a fashionable dinner, the afternoon lounge or nap, the evening ride down the sand, or the hop in the great saloon—and among the many beautiful belles at this pleasure haunt by the sounding sea, none won more admiration than the fascinating Josephine Sumner.

But did this life satisfy her? Can it satisfy any woman who realizes that she was made for something better than a mere puppet of fashion?

"I am so weary, weary of it all!" she sighed, one afternoon, languidly surveying an elegant grenadine ball dress lying over the arm of the lounge in her room, for there was to be a brilliant hop that evening. "A hollow round of gaiety. It can never bring me rest; and where will it all end?" And she seemed lost in a deep and painful reverie.

"Why, Cousin Josey, I declare you look blue enough to make one shiver! Are you sick?" And Nelly Benton bounded into the room with all the exuberance of a girl just "out" in society. "Such a splendid time as I mean to have this evening! Brother Edgar says he is going to introduce me to those new arrivals, the Delameres. And I shall dance every polka with him. I could polk all night, Josey! O, don't you think Henri Benoir waltzes divinely? And did you see that splendid seal ring on his little finger? They say his father's the richest planter in Louisiana. And, O, Josey, don't the Dodworths play the Wedding March splendidly? I couldn't stand still last night. Do you wonder that papa laughed, and called me his 'crazy girl?' But, O, I forgot, Josey, here's a letter for you—can't make out the post-mark—Edgar was bringing it up to you!" And she tossed a letter into her cousin's lap.

The belle languidly raised the letter, but when she read the superscription, her listlessness vanished.

"It is from Cousin Lucy," she said, breaking the seal. "And little Cecil is very ill. Dear child, I must go to him!"

"DEAR JOSEPHINE (so the letter ran):—I have barely time to write you a few words by the morning's mail. Our boy, our darling—your pet Cecy—lies very ill of brain fever. The physicians have given him over. It is pitiful to see the dear child's sufferings, and know we can do nothing. We are in great distress. George is unmanned, and I scarce know how to pray for aid. O, must our only darling die? Why cannot we save him? If you were only here, Josephine! You are so cool, so thoughtful, and perhaps—who knows?—you might aid us! 'He dear lamb calls for you continually, moaning for 'Cousin Josey!' 'Cousin Josey!' You remember how he loved you. If it is not asking too much, will you not come to us immediately?"

"Yours in deep affliction,

"LUCY DOANE."

"Suncook, August 1."

Josephine looked again at the superscription. The letter had been mailed five days before, directed to Boston, then re-mailed to Newport.

"Five days ago—he may be dead and buried before now—but I must go to poor Lucy. Nelly, dear, will you ring for Jane to pack my trunk, and please lay out my travelling dress. I shall leave Newport by the evening boat."

"Josey! Josey! Wont Cousin Josey come?" murmured a little golden-haired sufferer, tossing to and fro on the pillows. "Wont Cousin Josey ever get here, and pull me the strawberries and pretty flowers down by the brook, like she used to last summer? Mama, I want Josey!" And two thin, pale hands were stretched forth imploringly.

"Yes, darling, Cousin Josey will soon be here!" said the mother, leaning over the pillow and bathing the child's forehead. Just then the rumble of carriage wheels came in the yard below. "Go down, George, she has come," she whispered. And the anxious father left the apartment where, for many weary days, he had watched beside his stricken darling.

"How is he, Lucy?" eagerly whispered the new comer, hastening up to the sick room on the threshold of which she met the pale mother.

"Better, thank God! the doctor says he will live—but, O, Josey, it has been so terrible!" And poor, worn-out Lucy Doane sank sobbing on the shoulder to which she was drawn.

"Poor girl!" And the stately Josephine Sumner, the whilom belle of Newport, tenderly kissed Lucy's careworn cheek, then took her station by the pillow. "Go and lie down on the lounge and try and get a little rest. Not a word, dear! I am strong, and not in the least fatigued, and will watch by this little darling here. Let me have my own way, now, please, Lucy!" And so the weary woman resigned the post she had held through weeks of that terrible fever, and sought rest.

"I did want to see you so bad, dear Josey," faintly whispered the little wan sufferer on the pillow. "Everybody was good to me; but papa looked pale, and mama cried, Cecy was so sick—and the doctor gave me bitter stuff—and I wanted you to sing to me and get me flowers. O, I forgot—" And the boy feebly lifted one emaciated hand to his head as if to recall his wandering memory. "He was real good, and got me pretty flowers one time. Mr. Leighton is real good and nice, isn't he, Cousin Josey?"

"Yes, dear," softly answered the stately girl, after a sudden start of surprise, a few tears dropping down on the little child's forehead over which she bent.

"Does it make you cry, 'cause Cecy's so sick?" queried the boy, looking up languidly into her face.

"Hush, Cecil, you mustn't talk, now," softly said Mr. Doane, stepping forward from the threshold whereon he had paused to listen to his boy's words, and no uninterested listener was he to this little episode. "You must try and sleep now, and let Cousin Josey rest. Josephine, let me take your place. And will you step down into my library a moment before you seek your own room? Go, please, you can trust me, cousin?" he said, catching the expression of her pale, questioning face.

"Yes, I can trust you, Cousin George!" And with a nameless terror at her heart, but a firm resolve, she went below.

There, in the cool, twilight-shaded library, while the household was quiet, they two again met—Ellis Leighton and Josephine Sumner; and there, too, all was explained.

No matter though Ellis did grasp his riding-whip nervously, protesting he had just ridden over from his Uncle John's to inquire for his favorite, the sick boy, and had paused in the library at his friend Doane's request, not knowing that they expected Miss Sumner; no matter though Josephine's proud heart rose haughtily at first against all her previous vows to win an explanation if again she ever met Ellis Leighton—the time had at length come.

Ellis was nothing loath at last to drop his riding-whip altogether, and, grasping his companion's hand, implore her pardon for his impetuous disposition and his doubts of her truth to the vows she had plighted him there in that very room, that pleasant summer time two years ago, when Josephine had been quietly domesticated in her cousin's family, and the student had escaped his studies and the city's heat during a long vacation on Uncle John's farm; and, further, to beg anew her forgiveness for the hasty and cutting words he had uttered, when the next winter they met in a crowded saloon at the house of a professor at Cambridge, and the young law student had fancied that the brilliant, courted woman, whose society was sought by men of intellect and station, looked coldly on her humbler lover.

Meeting her alone one moment that evening, he had flung off her hand, saying proudly and rashly:

"I perceive the mistake you made when you said you loved me. You are free, Miss Sumner."

And now, after nearly two years of estrangement, they talked of those days—of the days when they first met, and when they parted—and here again the fabled sisters who weave the warp and woof of life, gathered up anew the threads and joined them to weave into a golden tissue.

After the storm comes ever the clear sky, and the calm to troubled waters; but not always, after weary months of estrangement, comes peace to two such hearts as those that beat joyfully side by side in the quiet library that still summer's afternoon.

Above, in his darkened chamber, lay the boy Cecil, in a long, refreshing slumber; and weary Lucy Doane slept soundly on her couch; while her husband watched beside his sleepers with a smile on his lip, as he thought of the prolonged interview in the library below from which the repeated neighs of his horse, tethered to a young tree in the yard, could not hasten Ellis Leighton.

And when Mrs. Fanny Webster, on her return from Newport, learned that what her "management" for a whole city season had failed to accomplish had been brought about very naturally "up there in the woods," she manifested a great deal of surprise and joy, and welcomed her brother's affiancée very warmly, protesting she never, never should regret that brother Ellis, instead of going with them to Newport, persisted in GOING INTO THE COUNTRY.

LOVE TOKENS.

The gossips tell a funny story, in which two Russian noblemen and a favorite Parisian actress play the principal parts. Both of the Bayards were suitors for the fair lady's smiles, and both seemed to be equally esteemed by her. It would appear that, in Russia, as well as in many other countries, a lock of hair is considered a signal pledge of the tender passion; but, if the truth must be told, few of our theatrical divinities are endowed with profuse chevelures, and if they were, the incessant demand would soon exhaust the supply. Mademoiselle Alix glories in the possession of auburn ringlets, and wouldn't part with one of them for less than a duchy. Her Russian admirers, the Count de L—, and the Baron de M—, both happened to have hair of the same golden hue as that of their mutual Dulcinea. Each begged for a tress of her hair in exchange for a lock of his own, to which the charming creature readily assented, and without touching a single curl of her head, cunningly managed to effect an exchange of parcels, by which each gentleman received a tuft of his rival's capillaries. The count now wears the baron's "wool" next his heart, and the baron sleeps with the count's scalp-lock under his pillow. What terrible deceivers these "female women" are.—Paris Paper.

HARSHNESS OF DEMEANOR.

There is something in the temper of man so adverse to boisterous and severe treatment, that he who endeavors to carry his point that way, instead of prevailing, generally leaves the mind of him whom he has thus attempted in a more confirmed and obstinate situation than he found it at first. Bitter words and hard usage freeze the heart into a kind of obduracy, which mild persuasion and gentle language only can dissolve and soften.

Never yet
Was noble man but made ignoble talk.
He makes no friend who never made a foe.

BOATING.

BY EDWIN B. STEINOK.

The sun along the eastern sky
His fiery arrows hurled,
And morning o'er the far blue hills
Her misty banners furled;
The winding river glimmered through
The tangled thorny hedge,
The valleys decked with fern and rose
Came sloping to its edge.

But fairer than the sweet wild-rose,
Brighter than sunrise sky,
Was the mantling blush, the pouting lip,
And the glance of her laughing eye.
Dear little witch! how the rosy light
In the roguish dimples hide;
Is it just the same, I would like to know,
When others are by her side?

Our bonnie boat in the summer breeze
Rocked lightly on the tide;
While May, with a dainty hook and line,
Sat angling by my side.
You would know by her look of conscious power,
By the flash of her hazel eye,
That she knew she could catch, not only the fish,
But somebody else, did she try!

Did she know, as she tossed the lily leaves
Over my hands and face,
That I saw but the snowy drifts that lay
On her curls with such witching grace?
Did she know as she flirted the dripping oars
In her saucy, careless way,
That every drop was a spark of fire
In my heart for darling May?

Gay little sprite! how she blushes and laughs,
Till the tears rain down her face,
As she piles the oars with her little soft palms,
With an awkward kind of grace.
My beautiful pet, my darling, my pride,
O, would that my life might be
One long June morn in my bonnie boat,
Sweet May, alone with thee!

CHRISTINE'S TRIUMPH.

BY AMANDA M. HALE.

In the spacious school-room, at Madame L'Estrange's Pensionnat for young ladies, the day before the annual examination, there was a great deal of chattering, laughing and running to and fro, an incessant trying on of costume and rehearsing of parts, and not a little disputing—the collocutors sometimes forgetting their acquired French and breaking into their own vernacular.

It was a motley group, quite picturesque in its variety, and artistically disposed. Here was Christine Roelke, a tall, superbly-shaped German girl, wearing the dress of the queen, which was her part for the next day—for the young ladies were to appear in a petite drama, composed for the occasion by Madame L'Estrange's versatile French teacher, Monsieur Lenoire.

The purple velvet mantle hung in rich folds about Christine's queenly figure, and she bore herself as if she really were a scion of royalty. Those were the days of the republic, and patriotic little French girls sometimes sneered at Christine's penchant for the aristocracy; but she did not mind—she paraded her predilections all the same, and took no pains to conceal her contempt for the canaille. At Christine's feet knelt our little English daisy, Lucia Morland—a blue-eyed, brown-haired maiden, modest in mien and graceful in every movement.

Flitting here and there, sometimes assisting Lucia in the arrangement of Christine's train, and sometimes stopping to admire the effect of her own grisette attire, was Annette d'Olivet, the French girl who was to play the part of lady-in-waiting to Queen Marie, known on common occasions as Christine Roelke.

"Voilà, Christine, c'est assez! Now look at me." And she spread out her hands, and set her little head on one side with the most comical air. Voyez! ma petite blanc chapeau. N'est ce pas charmant? Who would not be a grisette?"

"Not I," said Christine, scornfully.

"Pourquoi, madame?" said Annette, simply.

"Don't ask foolish questions, Annette," returned Christine, pettishly.

Annette twinkled her bright little eyes with a puzzled air, and whirled away in a waltz. Christine gazed after her contemptuously a moment, and then drawing her work-box towards her, sat down to mend a rent in her fictitious gold lace.

"These people have no more brains than so many wooden puppets," she said, in an undertone.

Lucia looked up quickly, as if she would have remonstrated with earnestness, but she only uttered the word—"Christine!"

"It's true," persisted Christine. "They've no ambition, no pride, no sense of propriety—real propriety, I mean. They're au fait in little things, the details of social life, I know; but in nothing else. There's Annette—she belongs to one of the best families in Brussels, and does not value her position in the least. She might as well be a bourgeoisie."

Christine glanced at me, as if she expected some rejoinder. It was a standing subject of dispute between us. I felt bound to maintain republican principles in virtue of my transatlantic birth.

"And why should she?" I said, with spirit. "All men are born free and equal. 'Liberté. Fraternité, Egalité.'"

Lucia laughed. Christine curled her lip.

"That's what you call a humbug. All men are not equal; if they were, I—" She paused.

"What would you do?" asked Lucia, brightening up a false pearl.

Christine laughed. "I'd emigrate to another planet. I'd sell my birthright cheaper than Esau did, and think I had got a bargain."

We all laughed, and Christine continued:

"When I was a little girl, I had a young American for a tutor in history and English reading, and he used sometimes to hold forth those absurd democratic ideas; but I knew they were nonsense then."

"Was that the way in which you picked up so many Americanisms?" said Lucia.

"I suppose so. Do you know, Julie, I like your nation? I admire their straightforwardness; and their coarse phrases—for they are coarse—which they have coined, are more characteristic of them than anything else you have. When you become a monarchy and have a hereditary nobility, you'll be worthy to rank with us Europeans."

Of course I made the usual answer that our nobility held its own, in virtue of merit—that in our country moral and intellectual superiority were the only passports to popular favor, etc.—yet haunted all the time by a consciousness of Mrs. Purseproud, whose palace on Fifth Avenue is the resort of the elite of the metropolis, although Mrs. Purseproud hasn't two ideas in her head, and has no more principle than a Carib. I had, too, a dim impression that Mrs. Brahmin, whose great-great-grandfather was a lineal descendant of Vishnu, and whose maternal ancestor was own son to Lord Lyndhurst's valet, might, by the bare fact of her existence, militate somewhat strongly against my theory; but those were the days of my girlish simplicity, when I innocently imagined that ideas represented things. So I swallowed down my ghosts of doubts as confidently as if my moral sense had possessed the toughness of cala.

"How very absurd!" said Christine, indignantly, when I had finished. "How absurd to assert that yonder swarthy little Bohemian, whose ancestors have been peasants ever since the middle ages, is equal to Lucia, in whose veins runs the best blood of England!"

"Or to Christine Rolke, whose mother wrote Von before her name," I added, ironically.

Christine's face flushed, and Lucia looked at me reproachfully. But Christine did not reply. She had that consummate prudence that stands so well in the place of genuine good temper. She always knew where to aim her shafts of satire and scorn, and hence, though she was famed for her power of saying sharp things, nobody feared but everybody liked Christine. Love her, they did not. Love is not for such as she. They must be content with ordinary, surface liking, which is a vastly more common and practical sentiment than love. When a few persons do love such people, as Lucia loved Christine, it does not argue their goodness, but rather that of the simple, trusting souls who cannot choose but love.

I repented of my rude speech in a moment, and asked forgiveness, which Christine loftily accorded.

"Now we are friends again," said Lucia, with her sweet smile.

"How good tempered you are!" said Christine, admiringly. "You, who have both rank and wealth, can afford to be; while we, who have only one or neither, must needs be vexing ourselves at every trifle."

It was my turn to be angry now; but Lucia did not notice Christine's thrust at me, and asked:

"Would you like so much to be rich, Christine?"

She drew herself up with her queenly air, and answered:

"Would I not? I would like to wrap myself in ermine, and flash in gems. I would like to repose on velvet couches, and breathe airs laden with fragrance. And I covet power, too. I would like to preside over a sumptuous household and entertain lordly men at my table. I would like to know that my smile or frown influenced the destinies of a nation, and that my caprice could exalt or depress them."

"You should be the stately wife of the English premier," said Lucia, smiling.

"Or of some intriguing French courtier," I added.

"Or some shrewd Yankee politician," sneered Christine.

Lucia interposed. "I wish I could give you a taste of English country life, Christine. You would like us too, I think. You should have pictures and statuary, and luxurious furniture, to your heart's content. You should have horses and carriages and maid servants," she said, playfully. "Wont you go home with me, Christine?"

I hoped she would refuse, for I was tired of our daily combats and longed for an armistice. I was a waif upon the world, and in the interim of finding a governess's situation, had been glad to accept Lucia's invitation to spend a month with her at her father's country seat. Perhaps I might find a place to suit me in some English family, and then I need not cross the ocean again. All my most cherished associations were on the European side of the Atlantic. My friends were there—it was home to me, and my feeling for fatherland was only a romantic, unpractical sentiment, not strong enough to control my actions.

But while these thoughts were running through my mind, Christine had decided to go to England. I have no doubt she had meant to do so from the time it was first proposed; but now she announced the determination as if it were impromptu.

"I think I will go with you, Lucia."

Lucia sprang up delighted.

"O, Christine! will you really? That's a darling girl!" And she danced about, as gaily as Annette might have done.

"Only you must promise that Julie shall not quarrel with me," said Christine, freeing herself from Lucia's embrace.

"O, Julie will be good! I'll get Theodore to take her in charge."

"Ah!" Christine looked into Lucia's face.

"He's only a cousin, my dear?"

"Only my cousin," said Lucia, blushing.

But I knew that he was a betrothed lover, and that our little English daisy loved him with all her heart. Many a moonlight eve, when the quaint old towers of Brussels shone whitely in the clear light, had Lucia told me tales of Theodore Burleigh, her playmate from childhood and her husband, if God willed. I had formed a very exaggerated notion of this piece of masculine perfection, as I afterwards found. Looking at him through the double medium of my own and Lucia's imagination, I had fancied that no king or statesman was his peer. But I am anticipating.

So Christine was going to England. Why should she not, when, as she truly said, she had not a friend in the world who would inquire for her the day after her departure? But why should she go? I had always thought she was qualifying herself to teach French in her own native city of Frankfort.

"Christine?" I said, inquiringly.

At that moment Mademoiselle St. Hilaire rang her bell, and when the chattering ceased, said in her sharp tones:

"It is time for the promenade, demoiselles. You will meet here at seven to-morrow for rehearsal. Allons!"

And I followed the rest out, wondering why Christine was going to England.

The next day, the whole large house was in a confused bustle of preparation. In the morning the grand exhibition took place, and every corner of the school-room was crowded. It was a great success, and madame's eyes sparkled with gratified pride and the prospect of future gain. A prize was to be awarded for the best French theme, and we were none of us disappointed when the name of Christine Roelke was announced as that of the successful competitor.

Christine was not beautiful or amiable, nor even a coquette, and yet she had her admirers among the Brusselian youth; and when, with an unwonted flush upon her cheek and with her majestic air, she walked down the passage and ascended the estrade, a loud burst of applause rang out from the great audience. She bent her head, and the director threw the ribbon over her neck and the glittering prize fell at her side. She lifted her eyes, threw one swift, sweeping glance over the hall, and then returned to her place. The long-fringed eyelids haughtily dropped, and except the unusual color, she was apparently wholly unmoved.

But it was a proud moment for Christine, and I knew that her heart beat high with exultant pride.

After the award of the prizes, there was little to hold the attention of the spectators, and the exercises were hurried through. Once free of the school-room, the young ladies hastened to join the troop who had worked all day at the scenic decorations. The folding-doors between the school-room and the adjoining recitation apartments were thrown open, and the place quickly assumed the appearance of a tolerable theatre. The stage was erected at the extremity of Monsieur Lenoire's room, and the French teacher himself was busy in overseeing the arrangements. Lucia and I had no role assigned to us, and we wandered at our pleasure about the house, gathering flowers, assisting in the green room, and walking up and down the cool alleys of the garden. Towards seven, Christine came running down the linden walk.

"Come in, Lucia," she exclaimed hurriedly. "You promised to assist me in my toilet." And she unceremoniously pushed me aside and appropriated Lucia to herself.

I followed them to Christine's apartment and sat down, quietly watching the long auburn curls as they shaped themselves into lustrous coils under Lucia's skilful fingers. Christine placed herself before the mirror, and as she did so, I noticed that she smoothed out the wrinkles which her late excitement and haste had occasioned, and assumed a more placid expression. It was not favorable to her beauty, which, apart from her regal carriage and figure, and the rich, soft hair, lay rather in expression than in color and form. I have heard her called plain; but those who found her so could never have seen her when enthusiasm kindled her eyes and flushed her cheek. I did not think her beautiful that night when she left us, just before making her debut upon the stage; but when later, stimulated by applause and the consciousness of her own rich gifts, she threw the whole force of her nature into the representation of her part, I was led captive by her loveliness.

When we entered the improvised theatre, the best seats were already filled, and soon the spectators flocked in so numerously that the aisles overflowed, and even the window recesses were crowded. In front were the pupils, in every style of holiday costume, their light drapery waving in the wind, which came in cool and fresh at the windows, and the rounded arms of the English girls and the dark, piercing eyes of the Spanish maidens alike gleaming in the light. In the rear, and encircling them upon either side, were the friends and patrons of the establishment, and conspicuous among them was Madame L'Estrange, radiant in her pride and exultation at this new success. The room was flooded with light, the air sweet with perfumes, wreaths of gorgeous flowers encircled the pillars, and brilliant cloths festooned the walls. It was a gorgeous, festal scene, and when, presently, the curtain rose and revealed a magnificently furnished boudoir, in which stood Christine in her royal robes, and bearing herself so regally, the whole tableau was so enchanting, that the admiration of the audience broke forth spontaneously, and cries of "Charmant! C'est belle!" resounded throughout the apartment. Christine advanced a step, and faced the assembly; instantly every sound was hushed, and the silence, even more than the applause, confessed the effect which she had produced.

The play was a thrilling drama, founded upon one of those episodes in the life of royalty where the mainspring of interest is the working of those feelings common to all hearts, and which only derive an additional power from the prestige of rank.

With the suffering queen, maddened by wrong and repulsed where she should have been cherished, every woman in the house could sympathize, from Annette d'Olivet who flirted with the English teacher, to the Princess Alkoff who had that morning parted from her lord for the twentieth time. When in the last act, the queen, driven to despair, revenges her wrong and holds up in the sight of the spectators the poniard dripping with the blood of her rival, the effect was terrible, and no words could do justice to the impression produced. Could one be so transformed? Was that Christine—that pallid face, those set lips, that almost demoniac rage? The audience went wild. In French fashion, they gave themselves up to the delirium of the moment. Again and again Christine was called before the curtain to receive their delighted homage. Never had such amateur acting been known—rarely had any such professional success been achieved.

Among the audience there was one not a Frenchman, I imagined, though he threw himself into the enjoyment of the moment with a very un-English-like abandon. A slight figure, dark, with a crimson flush on his face—though that might be the effect of excitement—soft, violet eyes, scintillating with light—his whole appearance was novel and distingue.

Who could it be? I was familiar with the habitudes of Brussels, and this was not one of them. He held in his hand an elegant bouquet, and when Christine appeared for the last time, the fragrant offering fell at her feet. She turned—I saw her glance fall upon him—their eyes met—and Christine bent her head. When I looked at her again, the whole look of the tragedy queen was gone, and a graceful, beautiful woman stood there, modestly blushing at her praises. Who could the stranger be? I turned to ask Lucia, but the play was over, the company leaving, and a dozen rude girls had separated me from her.

I made my way out into the open air, almost dazed with the excitement. I walked around the balcony toward the private entrance. Turning a corner, I suddenly came upon a trio who stood chatting in the moonlight.

"Julie!" It was Lucia's voice, and then Christine's rich tones broke in: "Come, Julie, you are not such a Goth as not to admire these flowers!"

She held in her hand the very bouquet which I had seen her receive with so much empressment—and here, close by her side, stood the slight, elegant youth whose movements I had observed. Lucia put her hand upon mine, and with a charming, girlish hesitancy, introduced her cousin Theodore.

I was an awkward school girl, at the best, and my surprise only increased my discomposure; so as I responded shyly to his courteous remarks, I did not wonder that he ceased to address me and devoted himself to Lucia and Christine. Lucia, indeed, drew somewhat into the shade. It was one of her daisy ways, and I loved her the better for it; but in this pushing, grasping world, he who shoves himself foremost, gets the greatest share of the good things, and so in that epitome of the world which we call society, the daisies and violets fall into the background, however fair and sweet they may be, and the flaunting hollyhocks and dahlias usurp the front rank.

Christine enjoyed her triumph, and they chatted on about a thousand things which could not interest Lucia, but in which Christine's esprit displayed itself to the best advantage. Theodore Burleigh had come over, partly on a pleasure tour, partly to await Lucia's return. Arriving at Brussels just before the exhibition commenced and after we were seated, he could not gain access to Lucia, he said, and pleased himself with surprising her among the crowd in the hall.

By-and-by I left them—and Christine followed me, to my surprise. We went up stairs, and as her apartment adjoined mine, she came in and stood before my mirror, unloosing the bandeaux of gems from her hair.

"Julie," she said, suddenly, "do you know I've found my vocation?"

I looked up. Her eyes were glowing, and her color was a vivid crimson.

"I shall go upon the stage," she said, determinedly.

"Why, Christine! with your aristocratic prejudices?"

"I fling them away—no, I hoard them—I'll keep them, and one day I'll win a right to a place among the highest, and by my own genius, too. Julie, you don't like me—but you own that I have genius?"

"Yes," I said, indifferently.

"Yes, I knew it, and before to-night. I'll use my power." She began to pace the room. "I'll not delve for my livelihood like a common person. I'll not spend my life in teaching French to dullards. You blame my ambition. It is my right. My mother wrote Von before her name. Julie, your sneer was directed against the truth. Isn't poverty a curse? It threw us down from our rank, it sent my father into exile, and my mother to the grave. It has driven me to the stage. No matter. My fame shall atone. What is better than fame, fortune, rank, won by one's own exertions?"

"Love—goodness," I answered.

"Pshaw, little Puritan. Now don't bore me with romance. I'll betake myself to my own domain."

"Tres bien, bon soir," I returned, laughingly. She went away, humming an air.

"By the way, Julie," she said, putting her head in at the door again, "is Daisy engaged to this English knight?"

I knew Lucia had not told Christine, but something tempted me to betray the secret, and I answered shortly, "Yes." Christine laughed and shut the door. It was a strange laugh. I sprang up and ran to her room.

"Christine," I burst forth, passionately, "if you meddle in this, may God reward you."

"I hope he will. One doesn't like to work for nothing. But don't fret, my pious little Round-head. He may do as a dernier resort, not otherwise," she said, coolly.

I clasped my hands together in anger. But of what use was it? It was like the surf beating the everlasting rock, only to dash itself to pieces. I lay awake long that night. Some hours later Lucia came up and took her place by me.

"Lucia, dear!"

"Yes, Julie."

It was dark, I could not see her face, but the tone was sweet and calm, and full of content. There were love and trust and joy in her heart, and I prayed God they might ever abide there.

It was a merry party that crossed the Channel and landed on the English shores the next week. Sir William Morland was a frank, hospitable gentleman, proud of his daughter, and valuing her more than anything else in the world. For her sake he gave a cordial welcome to Christine and myself.

It was curious to see how quickly Christine ingratiated herself into his favor, with what alacrity she resigned to him the most comfortable seat, with what changing affability she listened to his often-told story of his last success at the Derby matches, how patiently she bore his little caprices, and ministered to the gratification of his whims. She had the tact to conceal her art, and fairly surprised the simple-hearted gentleman into a genuine liking for her. Sometimes it puzzled me to account for the coolness with which she treated Theodore Burleigh. She left him to amuse himself when they were alone together, she was always busy if he wanted her to sing, and Theodore was forced to devote himself to Lucia. Since the exhibition night Christine had not shown the tragic side of her character. Her role now was that of the amiable, graceful woman, and in that part she could not rival Lucia. It was her genius that had awakened his enthusiasm, and when she ceased to reveal it he was disenchanted. So for the present my fears were at rest, but I knew that Christine had the power to re-kindle his admiration, and if it suited her purpose she would do so. I heartily wished her a thousand miles off, anywhere that she could not interfere with Lucia's peace.

I knew she had some definite aim in view, and that her conduct was all in accordance with some plan; but I was unused to coquettish arts and could not understand her. Afterward I understood her too well; but at that time I had only an indefinite, vague apprehension of something wrong.

My sweet Daisy, how happy she was all the voyage, more gay and vivacious than was usual in her calm, gentle temperament. When we landed at Dover, I thought if ever Theodore's heart had wandered from her, it had returned to its allegiance, for his manner was now so uniformly the expression of unwavering affection that I could not doubt his devotedness.

It was in the full ripeness of summer that we reached Roselands. Everywhere, in the thick forests and on the open plain, in the green vales and upon the rounded hills, in orchard and garden, in the blue heavens and over the crystal waters of the wave the spirit of beauty brooded. It was something to dwell in the midst of so much loveliness, to wander in the silent forest shades and sit, in the soft, summer nights, in moonlit arbors, coming from the quaint, formal old city, with vivid remembrances of its prim alleys, and stiff, unnatural trees, the free, unrestrained luxuriance of nature had for us a double charm. Christine unfolded wonderfully. The luxury that environed her seemed her birthright. She was at home amid it all, and she drew inspiration from the beauty about her. Her rare, novel loveliness caught a richer glow, her voice modulated itself to greater sweetness, and her genius flashed out more vividly. How could I ever have thought her plain, I said to myself. The whole household noticed the change.

"Christine has grown prettier since coming here," said Sir William, one morning at the breakfast table.

We had all risen except the baronet, and Christine had gone to dress for a ride.

"Pretty! Do you call that prettiness, that brilliant face, radiant with soul? I don't think Christine is pretty," said Theodore, his face flushing, and his eye kindling with spirit as he spoke.

Lucia looked up. The baronet laughed.

"Perhaps I don't choose my words very well," he said, good-humoredly. "She is a splendid girl, you won't deny. I wish we could keep her here."

I glanced at Lucia. She looked quite as usual. If any sorrow lay waiting for her in the future she did not see it. No dark shadow fell athwart her sunny way. Christine still tarried, and Theodore walked the room impatiently. Lucia went to hasten her and they presently entered the room together. The contrast was striking. Lucia's delicate, girlish loveliness had its charm, but Christine's imperial beauty surprised and took you captive. Theodore put her in the saddle, and she thanked him with a gracious smile.

They rode off in advance of us; all the morning they were alone together, and Christine's color was deepened, and her eyes gleamed with exultation when we once more rode up to the steps. From that day it was clear to me how it would be. Natures, impressible as Theodore's, kindle into flame at a glance, and no development of her character, no unamiable thing he might see in her, could now alienate his affection from her.

I was half wild with sorrow and indignation. What could I do? Lucia was blind—God help her! Of what use would it be to arouse her from her trusting dream? Theodore was always kind, and her unsuspecting temperament was content. She did not see his color rise, his eye flash at Christine's coming. She did not notice the wavering voice, the dreamy quietude, or the enthusiasm which her presence could occasion. With her whole heart Lucia had loved him, and with her whole heart she believed in him. Could I speak to Theodore, tell him that this proud, ambitious woman would surely wreck his happiness? As well might I attempt with my weak hand to stay the sea in its tidal flow, as to turn his love away from her. Sir William? What would it avail? I would go to Christine herself, I said, passionately. She would scorn me, she would mock me. No matter, I would go.

I went to her room that night. Lucia was asleep, and Christine could not escape me. She was at her writing-desk when I tapped at the door, and she met me with a guilty face. Her features hardened, however, into an expression of indomitable resolution. She assumed her light, careless air.

"Now, New England, you've come to give me a lecture, I know. Let me introduce you to the audience." And she took my hand and led me into the floor.

I drew my hand away. "Christine, don't jest, I do want to have some serious talk with you."

"Tres bien," she replied, indifferently, and giving me a chair, she seated herself upon a low stool in front of it, and folded her hands in mock humility. "Upon which one of my numerous misdemeanors will it please you to hold forth upon this occasion?" she asked.

"You must know, Christine, what I mean. You cannot think that you are treating Lucia honorably—" I paused.

A slight sneer curled her lips, and she said, coolly: "Proceed, I am all attention."

Her coolness was too much to bear. "Christine," I burst forth, "you will break Lucia's heart, you know you will."

She laughed. "A broken heart! I'd like to see one once. The British Museum would pay a price for it. It would be the eighth wonder of the world."

"O, Christine, it is cruel of you to talk so. You cannot mean it. Love is everything to Lucia—she cannot live without it—and she is so innocent and unsuspecting, too!"

"It does take the edge off one's triumph a little, I confess," responded Christine, quietly. "I wish it were you, now. There would be some satisfaction in being your rival. But Lucia, she might as well be a statue."

"Her trust in you is all the more reason why you should not wrong her," I said, impetuously.

"Perhaps it is. I have never considered the matter."

"Christine, how can you have the heart to do so?"

"I haven't any heart. That's a luxury I cannot afford to indulge in."

"You do not love Theodore, Christine?"

"You can't expect me to tell you that. Why, I haven't even told him yet," she returned, maliciously.

"But I know you do not love him."

"You doubt my capacity, I see. I'm inclined to think you are right."

"Christine, do you mean to marry him? Will a connection with him satisfy your ambition?"

"Now you are reasonable," she said, laughingly, "I don't mind taking you into my confidence a little bit. I don't know whether I shall marry him or not. Perhaps—why not? He is rich, and of good family, though a commoner. On the other hand, a colossal fortune would not come amiss with me, and a coronet is vastly becoming, don't you think so?"

"Then you mean to hold Mr. Burleigh in reserve, and if an earl with a greater fortune presents himself, you'll play Theodore false?"

"Precisely. In coming to that conclusion, you have exhibited an acuteness quite creditable to you. May I ask if you've any further suggestions to make?"

"None," I said, rising, "I only hope your earl will present himself forthwith."

"Je vous remercie," she replied, laughing, and I went away.

The next week the house was to be thronged with company, and I fervently hoped that there might be some one upon whom Christine could ply her arts successfully, provided it brought misery to no one else. In four days more a dozen trunks had been deposited in the hall, and half as many visitors ensconced in the guest chambers. On one of these days, at sunset, a coach drove up with servants in livery. Christine, Lucia and I were alone in the library. We went to the window at the sound of wheels.

"That is Lord Dacres's livery," exclaimed Lucia.

"Lord Dacres!" It was Christine's voice.

"Yes; he is a friend of papa's. He lives in Devonshire. O, Christine, you should see his house. It is a perfect gallery of art."

Christine's eyes sparkled. "His lordship is a connoisseur, then."

"He's a bachelor, too," added Lucia, smiling, "but then he's old and personally disagreeable to me."

"Is it the Lord Dacres who makes speeches in parliament?" I asked.

"I dare say, he has 'prodigious talent,' as papa says."

"O, I know," cried Christine, with animation, "he is the leader of the opposition, and the most eloquent speaker on that side."

"And he has a house in Belgravia, probably," I added.

"So much the better," laughed Christine.

At that instant the large bay window in the drawing-room adjoining came down with a crash, and Lucia, springing to the door which was ajar, exclaimed:

"Why, that was Theodore. Here is 'Maud,' which he has been reading, and there he is himself."

I followed her to the window. Theodore was pacing across the lawn, with a quick, excited step. He disappeared in the shrubbery, and Lucia said, musingly:

"What can be the matter with him?"

"Perhaps he is going to be jealous of Lord Dacres," said Christine, with a wicked smile playing about her lips.

We did not meet Theodore again till dinner was served. He came in then, looking pale and wearied, and as I followed Lucia's anxious gaze into his face, the tears came to my eyes at the thought of so much unrequited devotion.

Christine was brilliant and charming. At a characteristic bow mot, Dacres lifted his cold, gray eyes to her face, he had not noticed her before, and something like a gleam of admiration lighted them up. When the gentlemen joined us in the drawing-room, Christine was called to the piano. Music was one of her gifts, and that night she sang divinely.

Lord Dacres was fascinated, and his homage seemed to inspire her, for she outshone herself. His lordship lingered near the piano, and when she rose he led her to a seat and placed himself at her side. Theodore gloomed in a corner, and Lucia tried with sweet gentleness to draw him out of his moody humor. It was in vain. She could not scare the cloud from his brow, and I saw her sweet face grow sad as she sat down quietly alone. By-and-by Christine withdrew her attention from Lord Dacres, and he, perceiving it, politely took himself and his accomplishments to another part of the saloon. I saw Christine glance at Theodore and I knew the magnetism of that look would bring him to the vacant seat. It did, and with subtle art she sought to soothe his wounded love, and the cloud cleared away, his face lighted up with smiles, and Christine basked in the sunshine of tender looks. Lucia watched them with an expression of pained perplexity. She could not make it out.

This was the inauguration of a succession of like scenes. Lord Dacres was enthralled, and it was evident that a coronet would be at her disposal. What would she do? Could I doubt, after the revelation I had had of her heartlessness? And how would Theodore bear it? Would he return again to his love for Lucia? My heart sorely misgave when I thought of his intense, passionate nature, and how he had concentrated all the forces of his soul in one burning love for Christine. One day—it was a soft, September day, when the heavens bent lovingly over the glorious earth, and the golden sunlight flooded the landscape, and in all the air a serene peace brooded like a holy presence—on this day a hunting party had been made up in the morning, and the gentlemen were not expected home till late in the afternoon.

When the shadows grew deep and dark under the oaks, Lucia proposed to me a ramble in the park. I demurred. Christine had been missing since the last hour, and I had a vague fear that her absence might be in some way connected with Theodore. But Lucia insisted, and I could not find an excuse for refusing to go. We went along the forest paths, Lucia chatting gaily and breaking now and then into a song. But after a time she grew more quiet, and as we entered deeper into the seclusion of the forest, a soberness came over us, and we walked on in silence.

"Let us go to the Glen," said Lucia, at length. It was a wild, romantic spot, and with it were associated dark legends of love and hate and revenge. The servants at the house were superstitious in regard to it, and wondrous stories were afloat of strange shapes seen there in the gray of the morning light. Once before, Lucia and I had been there, and without difficulty we found our way through the mazes of the path. It was shut in on all sides by hills, and seldom visited on account of its inaccessibility. We entered the ravine by the usual way, and pushing aside the tangled boughs that overhung the path, pressed forward. Further on, just on the edge of a brook that rippled through the valley, the gray ruins of a rustic temple, built in the times of the first Morlands, offered a charming retreat. We were near the ruins, when Lucia, who was in advance, suddenly stopped.

"What's the matter?" I asked.

She did not reply. With another step I gained her side. She was pale and trembling.

"Lucia," I cried, alarmed, "what is it?"

"Hark!" she whispered.

I stood still and listened. There were voices, the tones came distinct and clear through the silence of the forest. Lucia clenched my hand. Her grasp was like that of icy fingers.

"Hark!" she whispered again, with ashy lips.

It was Theodore's voice that I heard in passionate, pleading tones.

"Christine, darling, speak! You have not played me false? Tell me that this shameful story is an infamous lie."

I put my arm around Lucia. I tried to draw her away—but she could not move—she was like one dead, only the dead are at peace and she suffered. For years the look of agony which was on her face that moment haunted me in my dreams.

"Christine," the voice went on, "Christine, my own beloved, God knows what I have sacrificed for you. Have I not yielded up honor, peace of conscience, everything for your love? When my perfidy becomes known I shall be branded as a despicable traitor—I am one—I know it, but it is for your sake. Only say you love me still, Christine, and I will tell Lord Dacres he lies to his face."

"Lord Dacres has spoken the truth, Theodore."

The words were said in Christine's own cold, cruel tones.

"Christine, Christine!" he shouted, and the appealing horror in his voice thrills me even now, "It is false, say it is false."

"It is true. I have promised Lord Dacres to be his wife."

There was a deep groan, so full of woe and despair that I shuddered at the sound, and then I heard him say:

"O, God, what is left for me now?"

Lucia unloosed my hand. "I must go," she murmured.

"Stay, Lucia, stay!" I put out my hands to restrain her, but in my terror I was scarcely conscious of what she did, and she glided out from the shade of the bushes, and on to the grassy bank where Theodore stood. She went near him.

"Theodore, you do not love me, but I love you, and I pity you. Do not let that cruel woman break your heart. O, Theodore, for the sake of what I was to you once, do not—"

She tottered forward a step. He extended his arms, but a shudder passed over her, and she would have fallen but for me.

"Well, you will not come to me," he said, hoarsely. "You are right; but, Lucia, I did not mean to do you this wrong, God is my witness."

She must have heard him, for a faint smile flitted over her face—she sank back—

"Theodore, Theodore!" I cried, in terror.

He sprang forward, he lifted her from the ground, and his tears fell like rain upon her face. She opened her eyes, and that love which is stronger than death, was in the look she gave him. She half lifted herself, a fearful, wonderful pallor overspread her face, her eyes closed—ay, forevermore. Theodore held her fast for one moment, he kissed her lips and cheeks tenderly, reverently, then he arose and turned to Christine. The low, calm voice in which he spoke was more awful than any outburst of passion.

"This, too, is your work, and mine. Will you not have joy in it? In your princely home will it never haunt you? Will your womanly spirit find satisfaction in it? When you stand before the altar—when you promise love and fealty to Lord Dacres—think of it; think of that poor, broken heart, think of my wronged love, my unutterable remorse—think of it—think of this, Christine!"

He put his hand to his bosom, a gleam of steel dazzled me, a sharp, quick flash blinded my eyes, then a crash, a horrible, stunning sound convulsed the air. A loud, agonized scream from Christine, and when the smoke cleared away, I saw her bending over him, and the crimson tide of his life was staining her white garments. Christine, Christine, repentance comes too late! You cannot give him life again. She screamed and tore her hair in her agony.

"Forgive me, forgive! I loved you, Theodore! Too late, forever too late!"

And this was Christine's triumph. Years after, the gay world, which had marvelled alike at the rare beauty and impenetrable, cold reserve of Lady Dacres, read with surprise the following announcement in the Morning Post:

"We learn with deep regret that the beautiful and accomplished Lady Dacres has been pronounced by her physician, incurably insane. Lord Dacres has the sincerest sympathy of his friends."

A PRACTICAL SPIRITUALIST.

A dry old codger, connected with the railroad interests, a man who listens always and speaks little, and was never known to argue a hobby with anybody, has lately been all mouth and ear to a very communicative spiritualist of the ultra school. He listened to and swallowed all sorts of things from the other world with so much pliability of assent that the spiritualist at last believed him to be one of the faithful. A few days since the spiritualist said to his pupil, "The spirit of B— appeared to me last night, and ordered me to borrow five dollars of you," for a certain purpose, which was named. "Yes, I know it did," replied he, "and isn't it strange? The same spirit called on me half an hour afterward, and told me not to let you have the money, as it had made a mistake in giving you the order!" The spiritualist hasn't been to see the old codger since.—New Haven Palladium.

SEWING TO MUSIC.

The effects of music on the senses were oddly and wonderfully verified during the mourning for the Duke of Cumberland, uncle of George the Third. A tailor had an order for a great number of black suits, which were to be finished in a very short space of time. Among the workmen there was a fellow who was always singing "Rule Britannia," and the rest of the workmen joined in the chorus. The tailor made his observations, and found that the slow time of the tune retarded the work; in consequence, he engaged a blind fiddler, and placing him near the workshop, made him play constantly a lively tune. The design had the desired effect; the tailors' elbows moved obedient to the melody, and the clothes were sent home within the prescribed period.—Artisan Anecdotes.

KINDNESS IS POWER.

A conqueror is kindness: far beyond
The armed victor, who doth thundering preach
Civilization with the cannon's tongue,
Woe-bought delights and bloody benefits.
A gentle word begets a gentle thought—
Drawing the sting from malice. Better thus
Than bruise with hate the ignorant serpent's head,
Who knoweth nothing till you teach it him.

LIGHTNING ON THE LAND.

In my memoranda of lightning on the land, and of its operations within the field of my research, in the year 1858, says Mr. E. Meriam, writing from Brooklyn Heights, the number of persons stated to have been killed by lightning is fifty-nine, of whom thirty-four were within buildings, seven under trees, sixteen in the open air, two on horseback. There are also two accounts which say the number killed was several. In 1859, the number mentioned as having been killed by lightning is seventy-seven, of whom twenty-seven were within buildings, eleven under trees, twenty-one in the open air, and eighteen not particularized, two accounts say several, and one account says a number were killed. The number of dwelling houses struck by lightning in 1858, is one hundred, of which eleven were burned, one set on fire, four torn to pieces, forty-five badly damaged, thirty-four slightly injured, five not stated to be injured. The number of dwellings stated to have been furnished with conductors which were struck, was eleven, of which four were much damaged, five slightly injured, and two not injured. In 1859, seventy-five dwelling-houses were struck, of which five were set on fire, three torn to pieces, thirteen badly damaged, thirty-four slightly injured, and fifteen not stated to have been injured. Five of these dwellings were furnished with conductors, all of which were damaged, some badly. No case of death by lightning in 1859 in a building furnished with conductors has been known within the field of my research; but in 1858, two deaths by lightning in buildings furnished with conductors are reported, one in Newcastle, Westchester county, N. Y., June 26th, of a lady standing in an open doorway during a thunder storm, and the other on the 27th of June, at Freeport, Armstrong county, Penn. In published accounts, rain-spouts are sometimes called "conductors." On July 8, 1855, a person was killed by lightning at North Prairie, Wis., and on July 18, 1857, another in Walden, Vt., in buildings furnished with lightning conductors. These are all the deaths by lightning in buildings having rods that have been recorded by me in a long series of years. I have met with no account of death by lightning in a building having a metallic roof, nor of a person reposing on an iron bedstead. No case of death by lightning of a telegraph operator while operating with the wires, has been reported since telegraphs have been in use, but during the present year a telegraph operator near Marietta, Ohio, was paralyzed by lightning, and during a snow storm, the telegraph operators at Springfield, Mass, and Hartford, Conn., were severely shocked while operating with the wires.

It is not surprising that lightning conductors should occasionally fail to conduct all the lightning, when it is considered that lightning rods have increased greatly in number and variety, and in many cases, care is not taken to preserve a continuity of the conducting surface, and sometimes conductors are allowed to get out of order, and thus rendered incapable of conducting safely an electric discharge from the clouds. I met with one case where a large quantity of hay was placed around a lightning conductor; had the lightning come down the rod while the hay was there, it would certainly have set it on fire. My confidence in the great utility of lightning conductors, properly constructed, remains undiminished; but the changes that have been made in the heating, lighting, and introduction of water into dwellings, by the substitution of stoves for open fireplaces, gas pipes for candles, and metallic water pipes, invite the lightning to enter buildings, and when buildings are furnished with rods, sometimes such fixtures attract the lightning from the rod to their surface. The safest position in a house during a thunder storm is a seat upon a chair in the middle of the room, with the feet upon the rounds. I would advise the closing of doors and windows, and in all cases when a person is struck down by lightning, cold water should be freely thrown upon the body, and if animation is not immediately restored, continue the drenching.

ABSENCE OF MIND.

This anecdote is old enough to be allowed repose, but yet it ought not to be buried. Talking of "absence of mind," said the Rev. Sidney Smith, "the oddest instance happened to me once in forgetting my own name. I knocked at a door in London, and asked if Mrs. B. was at home. 'Yes, sir. Pray, what name shall I say?' I looked in the man's face astonished; what is my name? I believe the man thought me mad; but it is literally true that during the space of two or three minutes I had no more idea of who I was than if I never existed. I did not know whether I was a dissenter or a layman; I felt as Sternhold or Hopkins. At last, to my great relief, it flashed across me that I was Sidney Smith. I heard also, of a clergyman who went jogging along the road until he came to a turnpike. 'What is to pay?' 'Pay, sir, for what?' asked the turnpike man. 'Why, my horse, to be sure.' 'Your horse, sir! what horse? Here is no horse, sir!' 'No horse! God bless me!' said he, suddenly looking down between his legs, 'I thought I was on horseback.'—Home Journal.

A DEAF MUTE.

There lives in Piacenza a deaf mute of extraordinary talents, E. G. M. Moser, a native of Regensburg, who until 1850 pursued his trade as a shoemaker. Since then, he has abandoned the awl in order to devote himself to study, and in a few years has learned, unassisted fifteen languages, living and dead, besides many dialects; he can write them correctly, and make himself understood in each one. He is a very ready accountant, and solves the most difficult problems with wonderful rapidity, by means of logarithms, of which he is a perfect master. He writes a good hand, and can with great speed write backwards words, entire sentences, or even a discourse. In 1848, he fought among the insurgents at the barricades of Vienna, and his left cheek still bears a scar of a sabre wound.—Piacenza Gazette.

EARTHLY JOYS.

Few rightly estimate the worth
Of joys that live and fade on earth;
They are not weeds we should despise;
They are not flowers of Paradise;
But wild flowers on the pilgrim's way,
That cheer, yet not protract, his stay.—ARON.

MY HOME.

BY WALTER S. DEVENS.

I struggle on mid hopes and fears
O'er life's tempestuous wave,
And misanthropic sobbings call
My soul unto the grave.

I mingle with the busy crowd,
Intent on joy and wealth;
They for a bag of earth-born dust
Destroy their mind and health.

I envy not the miser's hoard;
Fame is my only shrine:
To mingle with the mists to come
Some memories of mine.

O, 'tis the basest sight that meets
The eyes of erring man,
To see on nought a lifetime spent—
At most a broken span.

Our spirits are of noble birth,
Encased in casque of clay;
But mind and memory shall live
Throughout an endless day.

But mid these musings on the base,
Polluted use of mind,
Come visions of my southern home
With golden hopes entwined;

When I shall leave this hated crowd,
And lead a life of love
With thee, dear N—, whose angel form
Belongs to realms above.

There life and beauty ever beam
Beneath my trailing vine,
And round my happy southern home
Magnolian tendrils twine.

Thus may I breathe my life away,
Dear N—, beneath thy glance;
And soothe my mind with memory's sway,
Wrapt in a beauteous trance!

A BLOODLESS DUEL:

— OR, —

THE WIFE'S STRATAGEM.

BY MRS. M. T. CALDER.

It was during the session of the National Congress—never mind the year—at a crowded presidential levee, that a fair, slight woman, too girlishly fragile for a stranger to suspect the dignity of her position, as the wife of one of the most gifted and popular senators from the South, whispered to her companion in the promenade, a tall, broad-shouldered man of thirty-five or forty years:

"Cousin George, for my father's sake you must help me now. Have you not heard about those fiery speeches at the capitol between Mr. Dayton and my husband. I have been following every movement of theirs to-night, and I know there will be a duel. Tell me what I can do to avert the terrible crisis?"

The sharp anxiety betrayed in the voice thrilled painfully upon the listener's ear.

"Surely, Mary dear, your own gentle voice has power to still the storm of anger in your husband's breast, and even if not, with all life's blessings about him, will he dare to risk everything for so trivial a cause?"

The true wife flushed crimson with shame at the reproach her words cast upon the beloved one.

"Alas! so perfectly humane and upright, and tender in all things else, he is stubborn, and unapproachable upon that subject. I have pleaded, and reasoned, and adjured him, but he has never ceased to declare he should accept a challenge whenever one was sent to him. O, how I have prayed for some magic power to open his eyes to the wickedness of such an act!"

"Ah, Mary, a little home experience would soon convince him; once face to face with the sorrowful consequences, his false philosophy and flimsy code of honor would speedily perish before truth's imperial reality."

She did not reply. Suddenly as they threaded the crowd, he felt a light trembling of the fingers that rested on his arm. He concluded her agitation betokened the near approach of her husband, but was surprised to find it occasioned by meeting face to face a lady of stately, almost imperial beauty.

A very queen she seemed to have been pronounced by Nature itself, and the graceful, regal head was carried haughtily, as if well aware it merited a weightier crown than that shining coil of raven hair. Not so brightly or coldly flashed the diamond star amid those ebony tresses, as the chilling glance of that large, dark eye, when it fell on the slip fair-haired wife of Senator Phillips.

A haughty bow from the stately southern wife of Dayton, a startled, shivering glance from the gentle northerner, and the crowd passed between; but Mary Phillips turned her white face piteously to her cousin, and whispered faintly:

"Which will it be? One of us must lay aside these festive robes for the widow's sombre veil. Which of us? O God, have mercy! which will it be?"

Singularly enough, all the circumstances about them had contributed to place in an antagonistic position these two, universally acknowledged to be the loveliest ladies in Washington. First, and most of all, because their husbands represented two opposing parties in politics, and were each possessed of so nearly the same degree of talent and worth, as to place them side by side in the great race for the prize of the world's renown and applause. Then they themselves had become rival stars, likewise, in the gay circles of fashion, neither permanently outshining the other, but each peerless in her own way, fairly representing the peculiar style of her northern or southern clime.

Scarcely had Mrs. Dayton's stately form disappeared amid the throng, ere the pallor on Mrs. Phillips's cheek gave place to a soft flush, irradiating her whole countenance.

"George, George," cried she, "what was that you said to me a little time ago? Do you really believe a little home experience would convince my husband of his error? O, such a wild, daring plan has occurred to me, and yet it seems like inspiration. I can rely on you. Go gather every particular—the hour and place of meeting, and be sure and come to me before we leave. For me, I must see Mrs. Dayton, and speak with her, although I force the interview. Do not try to keep me. Let me go now. I tell you I believe the way has been pointed out to me in answer to my prayers. You shall hear it all, presently."

Later in the evening the rival belles stood side by side, and Mary Phillips's gentle face was sweet and calm beneath the haughty glance of astonished pride flung down upon her.

"My errand is urgent enough to excuse this abrupt address," she said, half apologetically, "for I have come as one anxious woman surely may come to another who shares the same fearful doom that is hanging above herself. Little heed, then, can I pay to etiquette, or past alienation, and speak with you I must."

"To what can Mrs. Phillips refer?" was the distant, repelling reply.

"To the duel your husband and mine have planned, even amidst to-night's festivities," came sharply and distinctly amid the confusion of sounds around.

A shade of pallor on the beautiful face, a scarcely perceptible quiver of the haughty lip. That was all.

"Well."

Mary Phillips gazed at her in utter wonder. "Nay," retorted she, passionately, "it is not well. Is earth's glory and beauty to be suddenly blotted out for me—the happiness of my whole life swept ruthlessly away by your husband's hand—and it be well? Or if my staff of strength is still left for me to lean upon, must I see the father of my boy, the husband I venerate for all that is noble and upright, disgraced and branded as a duellist? Great Heavens, Mrs. Dayton, can you for a moment encourage your husband in a duel?"

The regal head was thrown proudly back, the dark eyes flashed bright and clear, and unfalteringly came the reply.

"Certainly, Mrs. Phillips, I should scarcely care to see my husband's good name tarnished. I should despise him for a poltroon should he bear insult tamely, and not defend his honor, as a brave man should, when it is wantonly assailed."

A quick, scornful laugh, strange enough from those gentle lips.

"His honor! The honor of a duel! O, how little do you comprehend the sacred meaning of that word! But there is little time to argue here. Look you, Mrs. Dayton, it is but one side my words have dwelt upon. There is another, and Heaven be my witness, it is as terrible for me to think about. It is possible—nay it is probable, he has the firmest nerve—my husband may return unscathed, and yours—O, God have mercy on us both!—what if another sun beholds your proud head bowed in widowhood beside a bloody corpse, ignobly fallen in a foolish, sinful cause?"

There was an earnestness, a prophetic solemnity in her manner, that thrilled the listener's heart. Suddenly the barrier of pride gave way, a convulsive quiver relaxed the haughty lip, tears sprang to the glistening eyes, and the beautiful southerner cried, shiveringly:

"Hush, hush, Mrs. Phillips, you are saying such terrible things you frighten me!"

"Ay, but the reality will be more terrible still. Mrs. Dayton, friend, sister if you will, now is the time for us to act as becomes true wives, and Christian women, would we avert the threatening cloud of agony and shame."

"What can I do?" asked the stately woman, helplessly, no longer striving to conceal her terror and distress, and turning appealingly to the slight, girlish form beside her, whose undimmed, serious eyes were fixed, like some poor cast-away's at sea, upon some distant speck of hope, shining out of the distant horizon, scarcely certain enough for cheer, and yet not vague enough for despondency.

"Let me tell you the wild hope that has flashed upon me. With Heaven's help, Mrs. Dayton, we may yet frustrate this wretched duel, and accomplish a greater blessing yet, open the eyes of those we love to the fearful sin and wrong they have contemplated."

She held out her hand, as she ceased, and it was warmly clasped. Thus more like devoted sisters than the rival wives who had entered the little cloak room where this conversation had been held, in pride and coldness, they passed out, to mingle again with the crowd, and avoid suspicion of their knowledge of the coming meeting, rumors of which were already circulating in anxious whispers through the rooms.

At an unusually early hour on the morning of the day after the levee, a hack stopped before one of the private dwellings in a fashionable street, and two ladies, closely veiled, and wrapped in large gray shawls, descended hastily, and requested a private interview with the master of the mansion, an influential citizen, and a warm friend of Senator Phillips.

His start of surprise and perplexity, when the veils were raised, and disclosed those pale, rarely beautiful countenances, deepened into sorrowful dismay when their errand was unfolded.

Full two hours of the precious time that was fleeting so rapidly away, was spent in argument, remonstrance and tearful pleading, and still the stubborn heart of Mr. S—— was unmoved, and his iron will unyielding, but when he led them down the steps to the carriage, the little hand of the last slight figure he assisted in was carried reverentially to his lips, while he repeated, earnestly:

"God bless you, Mrs. Phillips, for the true-hearted woman that you are! You have succeeded, where no other could have dreamed of moving me. You have my promise. Even though I lose my friend thereby, I will do as you propose."

A grateful glance from the swimming blue eyes, a feeble attempt at thanks from the quivering lips, and the carriage turned away, to draw up again at another door, where the second of Mr. Dayton resided during his stay in town. It required less persuasion here. Whatever a man of Mr. S——'s well-known integrity would consent to, would be right and proper for Mr. W——, although he added, as he shook his head dubiously:

"I am sadly afraid, ladies, your husbands will scarcely forgive us for making such a farce of this event."

"Never fear, Mr. W——," replied Mrs. Phillips, gravely, "but actors in real life will thankfully exchange a tragedy for the most trivial comedy. But Heaven knows, it is all serious, and thrilling enough still. Only let nothing deter you from fulfilling your sacred promise."

And now the youthful wives were at liberty to return home, and wait the approach of the dreaded hour. What an embrace was that with which they parted, who so brief a time before had barely exchanged the coldest civilities! What a thrilling kiss, and lingering clasp of hands, and what true feeling lent its pathos to Mrs. Dayton's voice, as she whispered warmly:

"Pray for us both, Mrs. Phillips, and pray that the heart of the proud woman you have stirred to better feelings, may never lose your gentle influence."

That evening as Senator Phillips unclosed the door of his private parlor, a radiant figure came flying towards him, and two soft hands imprisoned his tenderly, while the sweet, beaming face was upturned sportively for the customary kiss. It was given fervently, and a stifled sigh came with it.

"God bless you, my own little wife!"

"Yes, Walter, bless me by blessing you. You know that is my constant prayer. And surely, it is generously granted us. We have health, prosperity, and domestic harmony. Do you know, I have been pondering all the day, how little I realized my own happiness, with your love my constant shield from harm. Once came the terrible thought that I might lose you. O, Walter, I dared not look at it a moment, the very faintest glimpse sent such a shivering despair to my heart. O, my Walter, what precious care you must take of yourself, for Charlie's sake, and mine. Poor wee fellow, there he lies asleep on the sofa. He tried so hard to keep awake to say good-night to 'dear papa,' but even while he was babbling about what he should tell you, down fell the little heavy eyelids, and Morpheus has locked them securely now."

She led him to the sofa, where a handsome, rosy boy of three summers lay curled up like a playful kitten, the round, rosy arms thrown up around the nobly-formed head, crushing down a thick cluster of moist, tangled curls. Still holding her husband's hand, and thus compelling him to remain there, she remained some time, thoughtfully gazing down at the pretty slumberer.

The brow of Senator Phillips grew dark with some swiftly gathering cloud, and there was a fixed, white look about his lips, that betrayed some powerful but sternly controlled emotion. Ah, what a pang struck home to the heart of that proud, strong man, as he stood speechless in that Eden of peace and love. He turned away abruptly. He could not bear the sight of his wife and child, those precious beings whose earthly hopes his own hand might dash away forever, that very morrow. For what? Ah, Senator Phillips, "a shallow reason," said conscience, plainly, when you dared to speak of vindicating honor, and escaping the brand of ignominy. Well might your heart sink, a leaden weight, within the coward breast that dared not say boldly, "My brother, I have sinned. Your life and mine are the Creator's only, to save or to destroy, as seemeth best. Forgive and be forgiven."

No word or look of Mary Phillips betrayed her knowledge of her husband's agitation, and his own emotion required too powerful control for him to detect the nervous trembling of the hand he held so fondly, or the wistful glance that followed him, when he turned away to hide some sudden spasm, called up by her innocent allusion to past or future joys.

Very similar was the scene at the home of the Daytons.

"My beautiful Bella," said the enthusiastic husband, "you are eclipsing yourself to-night. I think I never saw you looking so superbly beautiful as at this very moment."

"That is because I am anticipating the rare pleasure, now-a-days, of an evening's tete-a-tete with you. I am getting quite jealous of political affairs, I assure you, they absorb so much of your time. The truth is, dear George, I am miserably blue, when you are out of sight. What should I do to lose you altogether?" And dropping her head upon his shoulder, she burst into a passion of tears.

Grieved and conscience stricken, he tried to soothe her, whispering softly:

"Bella, sweet wife, you are nervous. I am afraid you are ill. What a foolish girl she is, to be sure!" And he attempted to laugh gaily, but gave only a ghastly glimmer of a smile, while she raised her drenched face, and said, hurriedly:

"To tell the truth, I have such strange fancies, sometimes. I know how weak and foolish they are, but cannot conquer them. When you are away, everything horrible that might occur, comes up before me. But I will leave such a gloomy subject. Let me tell you, rather, how proud I was of you, the other day, listening to you in the senate chamber. How my heart throbbed, and exulted at every eloquent sentence and generous sentiment. There is one, said I, who is ready to stand bravely forth for the right of all mankind, who is at peace with all, and the name I share will never bear a single stain."

"Bella, Bella, how foolishly you talk of such an unworthy specimen of mankind as your poor husband, whose greatest pride is the prize he won when that dainty finger there accepted the plain gold ring that shames those glittering diamonds near it." And to hide his saddened face, and divert her attention, he bent over the jewelled hand with all a lover's fondness.

She twisted the wedding ring thoughtfully around the slender finger, and said, in a musing tone:

"We had an auspicious wedding that night, did we not? How merry your sisters were, to see me so shy and silent, with the strange awe I could not drive away. I was almost afraid to promise yes to the momentous question, lest my giddy nature should make me fail in some way. But how boldly you spoke, dear George. I remember so well hearing the clear ringing of your voice above the tumult in my heart. Well you might be confident. There is little danger of your failing to love, cherish and protect your Isabel. No earthly temptation could make you peril your wife's happiness."

The agitated husband moved uneasily, dropped the hand he held, and then seizing it, vehemently exclaimed:

"Bella, Beila, in mercy, stop. I am not worthy such a wife as you!"

She looked up wonderingly into his face, but he turned away to the window, and lifted the curtain.

"It is cloudy overhead, is it not?" she asked quietly. "I had hoped so much for a day of sunshine, but I fear there will be a storm to-morrow."

A low groan escaped him. "Ay," he muttered, as he strode hastily from the room, "there will be a storm to-morrow!"

Gray and misty, but without rain or snow, the appointed morning came out slowly from the protecting mantle of night. In a lonely field, barren and bleak, shaded only here and there by a faded, moaning pine, fit rendezvous for such a deed, was gathered a group of gentlemen. Like the guilty wretch he felt himself to be, Senator Phillips had stolen away in the dusk of breaking day from the chamber of his wife and child, little dreaming, however, what a shivering throb his silent kiss upon the pure, pale cheek had sent to his Mary's anxious heart. Little dreaming now, as he stood, calm and haughtily erect, in outward seeming, with the deadly weapon in the hand her soft clasp has sanctified for better aims, how wild and fervent a prayer was rising up for him from those sweet lips he loved so well. Yes, very calm and cool in outward seeming, but what a tumult raged within, as he received the shining pistol, handed by his friend, and glanced over at the pale, grave face of the man before him. Was he an enemy? His conscience refused to confirm the charge. Nay, but even were it so, without a doubt, could he find within his heart the slightest desire to injure him? He tried to recall the offence. To dwell upon the words that at the time had left such a scorpion sting. How they had dwindled into insignificance! A few excited words of personal abuse! How trivial they seemed for one to refuse to pardon and overlook, who might so soon be pleading at the Great Tribunal above for mercy on his own sins. If true, they were deserved, if false, how speedily his life of rectitude could show the lie. Was it for such a cause his audacious hand was raised against the life his Maker had bestowed? One by one his clear-eyed Mary's arguments came up before him. He confessed them true, and loathed himself that he dared not own them audibly, and yet still he stood erect and silent.

Yes, there they stood, those gifted, generous-hearted men, with pallid lips and burning eyes, but yet no single throb of resentment or enmity in either heart. Gladly would the hands, so soon to speed the fatal ball, have met in friendly grasp; but the world's dread laugh, the world's flimsy code of honor, raised the potent barriers between, and they dared not thrust them down, though standing there, as they believed, to vindicate their manliness and bravery. Therefore, the stiff-frozen ground was measured off, the thrilling signal given, and loud reports and blinding smoke followed, rolling away in time to disclose a party of horsemen close at hand.

"Fly, gentlemen, all the officers of the law are upon us!" cries an agitated second, and in that moment of confusion, not one has thought for anything but escape.

The quick, fleet stepping of flying horses, and rumbling noise of dashing wheels upon the ground died off in the distance, and the lonely field is quiet once more.

"What did you say to S——, Warner? In Heaven's name, what did you say? That you saw Dayton stagger and fall after I had driven off? Have I killed him? O, heavens, am I a murderer?"

"Be calm, Phillips, I will go and ascertain the truth of the rumor."

Sinking back into the carriage, weaker than any sobbing infant, Senator Phillips waited to hear his doom. What a stern, haggard face he raised as his friend returned, slowly, reluctantly, and yet with suppressed excitement.

"It is true, then?" escaped with a heart-wrung groan from the duellist.

"I am afraid I must hurry you away, Phillips, if you would see your wife before you fly to a place of safety."

"Fly? No, no, S——, I have fallen low enough, but not so low as that. I have done the deed, and what man there is left in me will stay and abide the issue. The sooner the punishment comes, the better, if it can only quiet this fiend of conscience within."

"But, Phillips, man, your wife and child. You must think of them."

A cold shiver ran through his stalwart frame. "Why did you not caution me before?" he asked, bitterly. "It is too late now. Life, love and honor all swept away by my own hand, up-raised, like Cain's, against my brother man. Drive away home; home to my poor, ruined Mary. I thought a widow's grief might come upon her. I never dreamed of this!"

He did not speak again, but remained with his face buried in his hands, till the carriage drew up before the steps of his hotel. Slowly and painfully, as if the trembling limbs of fourscore years supported him, he descended from the carriage. As he reached the portal, a tall, graceful lady rushed wildly forth. His pallid face grew more deathly still, as he recognized the agitated countenance of Mrs. Dayton.

"It is you, then, Mr. Phillips?" cried she, almost incoherently. "Tell me, then, if it be true, this fearful rumor they have whispered through the town! Have you dared raise your hand against my husband's life? But where is he? He is not with you. O, tell me he is safe!"

Such a hollow groan for a reply. It seemed to shake the heartstrings of the man, as he strode by, and tottered up the stairs to his own apartment. His wife advanced to meet him, very pale, but with her own, sweet, serene smile. He caught her hand, and his white, dry lips moved, without an articulate sound, and then with a mighty effort he conquered the faintness that oppressed him, and said in a sharp, excited voice:

"Mary, Mary, my pure, good wife, I took you from your happy home to be the angel of my life, to warn me from evil, and keep me from sin, and see what I have done! I have disregarded your warnings, and refused to listen to your gentle pleadings. I have ruined myself, disgraced the name our boy must bear, and wrecked your happiness forever. O, Mary, Mary, I see it now. You were right, and I was a wretch to oppose my sinful reasoning to your purer instinct, but it is too late. I have fought a duel, and stamped upon my soul the brand of Cain."

Sweet and holy was the shining light of those blue eyes, as the wife folded her arms around his neck.

"This is a sorrowful commencement, my own husband, and yet if your conscience is clear, we can bear it cheerfully. You know what you have always said: that it was the only course a man could pursue, and he would have no cause for remorse, however it might result."

"Hush, hush, Mary, you will drive me frantic if you repeat the cowardly arguments I used. They were false—false as the honor I dared to prate about. What do they avail me now, when he who formed the pride and joy of so many loving hearts, a noble ornament to his native State, and a staunch pillar in his country's cause, lies cold and lifeless in the shroud, my hand bedewed with the warm life blood of his generous heart? What was she doing here, that poor young thing my wicked deed has widowed? How bright and radiant she shone, amidst the crowd at the last levee, and is it my work, that this terrible doom has come upon her? O, Mary, in Heaven's name, tell me I have not done this wicked deed!"

He turned his wild, haggard face imploringly to hers, which paled and flushed, and paled again, and then seemed to him to kindle with something of the celestial glory he had dreamed about, in angel visions. Instinctively he held his breath as she advanced, and caught his hand in hers.

"Walter, Walter, you confess it now—all the sin and wickedness of duelling? Tell me again that you do, so I shall be sure you forgive my daring stratagem."

She paused, arrested by a sudden hurrying on the stairs without, a quick, light footstep, followed by a heavier tread, and immediately the opening door disclosed the tear-drenched face of Mrs. Dayton.

"May he come in?" whispered she, anxiously. "I cannot bear it. He is so utterly wretched it will break my heart to keep him so a moment longer."

Mary Phillips's voice was thrilling in its solemnity, as she turned to her husband, who had stood in speechless dismay at sight of the intruder.

"O, Walter, Walter Phillips, vain and useless have been my earnest, heartfelt petitions, as well as our faithful pastor's righteous remonstrance and rebuke. You were obdurate and firm, yet see how this one hour of seeming reality has scattered to the winds your false and flimsy creed. Thank God that from this day you see the character of a duellist in its true light. My husband, my Walter, forgive your wife, that she had dared to circumvent your plans, and forced you to become—O, God be thanked, no duellist, no murderer—but a true Christian man, who shall confess from his inmost heart, 'that vengeance belongeth to the Lord, and He alone shall repay. See, Walter, here is your reward.'"

She unclosed the door, caught the hand of the pallid, sorrowful man who leaned without, scarcely daring to lift his eyes to hers, and led him joyfully forward. What sudden starts! What vehement words! Ay, and what blinding tears of thanksgiving and gratitude, falling over manly cheeks, as the rival senators, the whilom opponents, in a mortal quarrel, grasped hands, instead of deadly weapons, in a clasp, whose friendliness and brotherly love death only in future could chill or alienate.

Mary Phillips, meanwhile, had stolen away, and quietly returned with the waiting friends, the anxious seconds, who came in, hesitating and doubtful as to the result of the ruse they deemed so unpardonable. Easily were they re-assured at the first glimpse of those brightened faces.

"And are you sure, Phillips, you quite forgive me for removing the balls, and cheating you into supposing poor Dayton finished up?" asked Mr. S——, once more, after the agitated explanations had been required and given. "You know how irresistible that little wife of yours can be. Hang me if I believe I could ever get up a duel of my own after those solemn words of hers!"

Senator Phillips turned where his Mary was bending over her boy, to hide the relieving tears excitement had hitherto forbidden to flow, and said, as well as his tremulous voice of thrilling tenderness would allow:

"My wife, to you we owe this joyful termination of what seemed so terrible a tragedy. No words can thank you now, yet be sure your gentle influence can never fail again. We will trust that other husbands are more easily convinced of their sinful sentiments, if not, pray Heaven they may be saved, like me, by such a wife and such a stratagem."

LIMITED EXPERIENCE.

In former times men knew "by experience" that the earth stands still and the sun rises and sets. "Common-sense" taught them that there could be no antipodes, since men could not stand with their heads downward, like flies on the ceiling. "Experience" taught the King of Bantam that water can never become solid. The "experience" of some wise men resembles the learning of a man who has turned over the pages of many books without ever having learned to read; and their so-called "common-sense" is often, in reality, nothing else than common prejudice.

AUTUMN MUSINGS.

BY WENDELL P. HOW.

The summer flowers are fading,
And shed their rich perfume;
The autumn leaves are strewing
A garland round the tomb—

Where love and light are sleeping,
Wrapped in the cold embrace
Of the dank ground that presses on Her crumbling, mouldering face.

O, how I wept in sadness,
And mourned my bitter doom,
That had consigned her lovely form
To the chill, dreary tomb!

I thought of the glorious eve,
But twelve short months ago,
When I had told my earnest love
In accents mild and low;

And how the crimson, mantling blush
Stole to her marble brow:
She loved—what bliss was in that word!
But all is altered now.

Then, in the hopeless, cheerless gloom,
My heart forever sank
Into the realm of brooding night,
Where hover vapors dank.

But now I see beyond the mist,
Upon the other shore;
She stands there with a golden crown—
She only went before.

A STRANGE GHOST STORY.

BY HARRY HAREWOOD LEECH.

CHAPTER I.

A NEW LIFE. WANTED—A FARM.

RICHARD T. PEMBROKE he wrote his name, but all his companions called him Dick Pembroke, and he was just the merriest, handsomest, wittiest beau in New York, but by no means a conceited fopling was Dick; but just vain enough to dress in the best taste, in the height of fashion to show off his elegant figure, to play the gallant sufficiently to fascinate all the belles, and to lounge into le foyer of The Academy, with that nonchalant ease, which made his copyists ready to strangle themselves with envy. He was the embodiment of that strange species—the fashionable young man of the Nineteenth Century. His parents had died while he was young, leaving him upon his majority the recipient of a large fortune. His guardians, fond, foolish men, thought that their charge could not receive an education befitting a gentleman in America, so they must needs send him to a foreign school—somewhere near Chester, England—a course which in our own experience we have observed has confirmed many who were fools before, and perpetuated a race of pompous blockheads to bore simple-minded people with their (said blockheads') insufferable stupidity. But in the case of Dick Pembroke he had so much native goodness, and his heart was so large and genial, and his early remembrances of his dear home in New York were so vivid, that even after he had graduated in England, and travelled extensively upon the continent, he returned to his native country with that pleasure which is only known to the returned wanderer; and although by his travels his prejudices were conquered, his notions were enlarged, his views extended, and many useful sciences learned, which books can never teach or pedants show, still he never verified Cowper's lines in the famous Progress of Error,

"How much a dunce, that has been sent to roam, Excels a dunce that has been kept at home."

Richard Pembroke was just twenty-five. And his experiences had been large for a man of that age. Educated, travelled, wealthy, handsome, whole-hearted and witty, it is not to be wondered at, that he was a lion in the select circles in which he moved, and many were the delicious snares which beauty set for this rara avis, but in which the wily bird never was entrapped. And at the age of twenty-five, Richard Pembroke was as heart-free as any young, handsome man of the world can be, who has passed before the witching batteries of dark eyes, smiling lips, tender, bewildering hand-pressings and surreptitious foot-tappings, and yet not to have surrendered at discretion. Had Dick Pembroke been merely a selfish, courted man of fashion who indulged in rich attire, extravagant flirtations, luxurious living and expensive friends, he might still to this day have been nothing more; but as he had a vein of good judgment and common sense permeating his lighter character, like a vein of rich quartz through a barren hillside, he all at once awoke to the consciousness that he was leading, if not a wicked, at least an aimless life, and he determined while yet in life's morning to cast off the enervating pleasures and sycophantic, useless friends which he had indulged himself with; the former he had used to kill time, the latter to assist him in doing it.

He now was forming new resolves how he should commence the better life which he was determined to inaugurate. Should he travel again?

O, no! at least, not yet, for he thought of the desires he once had to reach his home and friends; besides this, there were wanting those bright imaginings with which we are wont to invest the ideas of a visit to the Old World, and which he, having torn aside the veil of romance, could not deck his thoughts again with such sweet, illusive, gauzy drapery; all was real—as it was. Should he devote himself to some science, and poring over musty books, and experimenting with strange chemicals, develop and discover to the world some wonderful agent which should be hailed with delight by the economists of nations? No, no! not that. Should he turn author? Write a book of travels? No! every fool who can find a publisher does that. Should he turn to that noblest first occupation of man—farming—the tilling of the soil?

"Make his corn and cattle his only care
And his supreme delight a country fair?"

And then he thought of the substantial, quiet pleasures of such a life, the health from labor springing, and then the perfect contentment which would open the source of every joy—far from the world's jarring bustle free, amid the scented fields. He thought of all these things, and his cheeks glowed more ruddily with the thoughts; he smiled as though he almost felt the sweet, odorous breezes wafted towards him over banks of sweet flowers and the stacks of new mown hay, and gathering some of the musical murmurs of the tiny brooks over which it sweeps towards him, with soft caresses flinging his long brown hair over his firmer cheeks, his brighter eyes. He almost shouted—here then was something to imagine, here then was real joy. His choice was made. He would buy a farm, and whilst he might indulge in all his intellectual pleasures, he would be a worker. Glorious thought! at last one of the world's workers.

But Dick Pembroke was hard to please in the choice of a homestead; he had pictured to himself a charming cottage-built house, almost smothered with creeping vines and flowers, situated upon a slight eminence, where rich sloping fields should delight the eye upon every side, a murmuring brook meandering through mysterious avenues of pines, and a broad river to be seen in the distance, over whose waters he could skim with his fairy-like yacht on the warm summer afternoons. But this kind of a home it was difficult to find. Of course, in the advertisements of the New York papers, there were scores of such for sale, with every natural beauty improved by the art and taste of man, where the fields were so rich and productive, and the yearly increase so large, that new buildings had to be constantly erected to store the golden grain, and stack the sweet hay and sheaved straw; but upon inspection, these model farms would dwindle down into very profitless, impoverished estates. The modern built house with all the latest "improvements," would become a crazy tumble-down tenement, with props to keep the structure from falling. The "commodious and extensive out-buildings" would be exceedingly primitive in structure, consisting for the most part of stakes driven into the ground, upon which dilapidated rails were laid for joists, upon which cedar boughs were heaped for an inexpensive roof, which would form "extensive cow sheds," around a log barn which would look to have been built specially for a rat harbor, instead of a protection and comfort for such useful animals as horses. "The wells of fine spring water were oftentimes situated in not very romantic dells, the locality approached through dark, luxurious grass, disagreeably suggesting the idea of snakes, and the croaking inhabitants of the springs seemed to intimate by their absolute possession, that they were not frequently stirred up. The "rich meadow lands" were oftentimes unmitigated marshes, and the "salubrious healthy country" was celebrated for that very common but decidedly unromantic disease, "the ague and fever," with the painful consciousness predominating, that you could not possibly take a walk out, but what you were sure to meet a rueful-looking neighbor, who would dismally inform you that "It was his day!" and who after having religiously received "his sweat" was preparing with an indescribable, calm, but (in those districts) usual philosophy to go to work again.

After myriad experiences of this order, Richard Pembroke was quite disgusted in looking after "places," and although not one jot abating his enthusiasm, he determined to bide his time, and not rashly purchase for the purpose of settling; but fate determined for him what he found so difficult to decide for himself. He received a rattling note from his volatile friend, Harry Marshall, who had forsaken city life long before, and was then leading a farmer's life in a picturesque portion of Maryland. Harry's letter, having exhausted all the gossip of his neighborhood, thus concluded:

—"But, my dear fellow, I never was happier in my life; to you, who are enjoying all the pleasures of a gay, city life, I say that there is nothing nobler, more soul-satisfying, than the independent, healthy pursuit of this 'first occupation.' It may seem prosy to you, it is heaven to me. I know you must be dreadfully wearied with your operas, Champagne suppers, insipid dinners, ceaseless flirtations and fruitless toils; I have had a chance to try both, and ten thousand to one, I select this. I miss oftentimes the companionship of yourself and a few other choice friends, but I know you are not complimented when I say I solace myself with my 'imported' Durhams, rare 'Southdowns' and Chester and China hogs; but to be serious, come down and pay me a visit next week. I can't promise you a feast worthy of Apicius, such as Delmonico or that dear Mullet at the club house used to set us, but I will not be such a pagan as to doom you to interminable fitches of bacon—but Aunt Marty shall exercise her best powers to produce you her lightest omelettes and patties, her most ravishing pancakes and incomparable jellies. Come, and although I cannot ask the gay Spratt or the witty Natt to meet you, whose bon mots shall sparkle as we sip our wine (I have some genuine Omartagn left yet) I can at least guarantee you good John Furrow, who is great on ditches, and modest Samuel Beech, our great oracle for early vegetables, and perhaps dovetail in the party, Amalek Ward, who drinks nothing but whiskey, and manages always to be drunk after soup. And then, I do not despair of making you a neighbor of mine besides—there is a charming old farm here, called the 'Dairy' (I hate the name, for everybody has the 'Dairy'), which is for sale. I know you will fall in love with the quaint, old Revolutionary house, so I want you to doff the fine linen and broadcloth, don your homely woolens, and come look after your estate—"

Thus chatted Harry Marshall to his friend, and the next train Dick Pembroke was en route for Maryland; but he had a plan of his own in view, and he did not intend to spoil it by acquainting his friend Marshall with it—but he was determined to see this "Dairy," and perhaps present himself to his delighted friend as his near neighbor. He therefore travelled quietly to Maryland, and was conveyed from the railroad station nearly to his destination by stage, the driver of which was one of those chatty, companionable fellows who seem born just to fill such stations, from whom he learned all about the country, the farmers, the crops and a good deal about his old friend Marshall.

"Why, sir, d'ye see Mr. Marshall," the driver would say, "he just makes the best farmer for a gentleman, in all these parts. It would do you good to see his machines—"

"Machines!" from Pembroke, wonderingly.

"Yes, sir. His mowers, corn-shellers, seed-sowers, and—"

"O yes, yes! But tell me," Pembroke suddenly exclaimed, as they drove by a fine old wood, and could see a large house and extensive white-washed outbuildings in the distance, "what farm is that?"

"O, that's nothing, sir."

"Nothing?" asked his inquirer, with surprise.

"No, sir, only Walnut Ridge—the other's the farm."

"Why, what do you mean? Surely that is a very pretty place, and there looks to be considerable land about it."

"Well, sir, you see the Dairy Farm yonder, with the big brick house on the hill there, that is a tract, sir, of over a thousand acres, and Walnut Ridge is only a little slice now—but it is a sad story, sir," added the driver, with a good deal of feeling.

"What is that?" asked Pembroke, curiously, and not a little amused at the man's lugubrious countenance.

"Why, sir, old Gaybrooke—he used to be Colonel Gaybrooke when he lived in the big house—owned the whole of the Dairy at one time, and lived like a gentleman. O, sir, I remember when the house was crowded with lots of company from Baltimore—there was driving and riding, hunting foxes and duck shooting, parties and suppers, no end to 'em, and the old colonel was as courtly as a king, everybody liked him, and he had the best lot of niggers in Harford, and the farm was like a garden-patch, it was, sir. Well, all at once it was whispered the old man was in trouble, that he had signed notes for other people which he had to pay. Then he tried to sell part of the estate, and as money was very scarce then, he could not raise enough by this means. Well, it was advised that he should sell off a few head of his niggers, but the old man loved them too much for that, and he said 'his boys should have a home while he had one.' But Gaybrooke grew sadder and sadder, and he commenced to neglect the place; the fences tumbled down and weren't put up again, and the Dairy wasn't half-cropped. To make a long story short, the sheriff at last got hold of everything, and the whole place was bought for a song, and they soon after moved to Walnut Ridge, just at the end there of the estate. The man who purchased the farm soon moved upon it with his family, but they didn't stay there long, for they declared it was haunted, that footsteps could be heard all over the house at night, and windows slamming awful."

And the driver's eyes got bigger as he was telling it.

"Since then these folks have been trying to sell it, sir, but nobody will live there. But it's a great pity for the old place to go down so, and more, for that matter, for poor old Gaybrooke and his daughter"

"Daughter—ah, he has a daughter, then?"

We are afraid Dick Pembroke was not interested in Walnut Ridge fully till then.

"O yes, sir," continued this budget of news, "as pretty a thing as there is in the country."

Ah, it must be a change for her, what with governesses at home, dancing and music-masters, horses and her own servants, she must feel it sharp, sir—very sharp. Did you say, sir, you were going all the way up to Churchillville?"

"No; I think I will alter my mind, and take a ramble over this old farm. Your account has interested me."

"What, not over the house?" said the driver, with real concern in his tones.

"Yes. Why not?"

"Well, sir—well—Who-a! Ho-o!—you know best, of course. But I wouldn't go into that house—no, not if you would plug this whipstock with gold. I wouldn't—"

Pembroke smiled at the driver's extravagant ideas of being bribed to enter the haunted house, but laughing gaily, he bounded from the stage, shouted a good-by, and darted through the crazy old gateway directly towards Walnut Ridge.

CHAPTER II.

THE MYSTERIOUS INTRUDER.

AFTER Pembroke left the communicative driver, he strolled along leisurely towards the smaller buildings which had been described to him as Walnut Ridge, and he could not but be pleased with the beauty of the scenery surrounding him. At the left, upon a gentle rise, were the neat-looking buildings on the Ridge. Before him the quaint, sombre-looking house of the main farm, built of good solid English brick, and looking as staunch now as it was in seventeen hundred and something, when it was put up; on all sides the beautiful fields sloping towards the dark woods on one side, and to the broad, placid river beyond, on the other. Way off in the distance, amidst picturesque groups of pines, which from his position almost looked impenetrable, the clay chimneys of "quarter" houses loomed above their waving tops, and the cheerful songs of the negroes at work were borne faintly to his ears. On every side the fields were rich with golden grain, or the tall grass intervening and looking like beds of emeralds; the pleasant quiet, that soothing, dreamy stillness in the air, that feeling of peace and repose which the country always brings to him who is satiated with the bustle, glitter and pomp of the world of the cities, in this hour pervaded the soul of Pembroke, and he felt almost sad that he was so near the house at Walnut Ridge, he longed so much to stroll listlessly, carelessly along, his feet straying into pleasant, untrodden paths, almost without his thoughts controlling them.

But he stood before the door of the house at Walnut Ridge. All was quiet in and about the house, the buzzing of the flies only relieving the dead quiet everywhere; but he had scarcely placed his hand upon the door to knock, when a fierce-looking terrier monster flew from behind the wood-pile, and with dreadful bark, and a prodigal display of teeth, seemed disposed to test the tenderness of the stranger's calf, who found now that he would be fully occupied in preventing that disagreeable action. He seized a short stick of wood and parried off the fierce tusks ably, but the animal was indefatigable, and attacked at all points, and there is no doubt but what he would have succeeded in beating in the outposts and taking the fort by storm, had not an ally unexpectedly arrived in the person of an imbecile-looking colored boy, who had only to shout:

"Hi! hi! Snap—hi—be off wid you!" for the dog to creep sullenly, and by his mournful-looking eyes and voracious mouth, we risk but little in saying, regretfully, away.

But this charitable action performed, said darkey seemed to think his politeness should cease, for he stood regarding the heated and puffing stranger with curious eyes, and at last opened his wonderful mouth, from the depths of which issued, as from some caverned recess, a most discordant laugh.

"Hi-yl! Snap come a-near—hab you. Hi! Ha, ha, ho, ho!"

"You rascal, what are you laughing at?" said the poor, provoked citizen. "I'll teach you." And he made a bound, caught the darkey by the neck, and had given him three or four hearty cuffs before the negro was aware that he was caught, and it was now evident the poor black was but half-witted, for although he had a heavy body, his head was diminutive and illy formed, and the instant he had received Pembroke's cuffs, he slunk down upon the earth, doubled himself up in a most ludicrous shape, and uttered such a baby-like, pitiful yell, that had not its sound been so comical, his chastiser would really have been sorry for what he had done. He was upon the point of raising him up, and felt vexed enough to give him another cuff for his childishness, when a hand was laid lightly upon his arm. He turned around impatiently and met a pair of most beautiful brown eyes gazing reproachfully at him.

"Miss—ma'am—I beg your pardon," he stammered.

"Don't whip that poor boy, sir," the owner of the brown eyes said. "He is not exactly right, and has had trouble enough, poor fellow!"

"O, miss, I really beg pardon. I came over to look at the 'Dairy,' when the dog attacked me, and after the boy called him off, he aroused my anger by laughter; but I am very sorry—very."

The young lady received his intended apology coolly enough, indeed, and then invited him into the house to see her father, who would show him the farm. He followed her in, feeling very mean and properly ashamed of himself, and could any abasement been found which would have removed the remembrance of his conduct from the beautiful girl's mind, we are sure at that moment Dick Pembroke would have accepted it. Mr. Gaybrooke soon received the stranger, and with stately courtesy showed him all over the place. But what charmed Pembroke particularly, was the remarkable looking house, with its wide halls, the high windows and lofty ceilings—the former with the deep, old-fashioned casements—the ancient looking stairways, the wainscotted rooms all indicative of an age passed away. Then the cellars and the heavy archways of solid stone, and the grand, grim old fire-places before which our Revolutionary grandmothers have hobnobbed perhaps, the curious carvings and heavy mouldings along the ceilings, and everything massive and solid as stone, brick, and well-seasoned heavy wood could make it. The wide loft or attic, through the centre of which the chimney passed—and this attic being unplastered, the great weight of the beams and trusses used in the construction of the noble old building could be contrasted with the flimsy structures of the present day—all these things charming Pembroke more than the broad stretch of beautiful land and the glorious prospect of the noble Bush River; for he was looking upon the building as a relic of the Revolutionary era, and with somewhat of an antiquarian's eye. He became the owner of the Dairy Farm, and we will shortly tell the reader why he called it Walnut Ridge.

The autumn following the summer of Richard Pembroke's purchase, he came down from New York to take up his residence in the haunted mansion of the Dairy. During the summer he had extensive repairs going on about all the out-buildings, but he allowed no Vandal hand to touch a column, or disturb a moulding of the old brick mansion-house—that was sacred property. The neighbors far and near were canvassing the new proprietor. Many pronounced him a blockhead, more, a foolhardy, daring young man, to suppose he could dwell in peace in the haunted house, when so many brave men had been terrified beyond endurance. But the fact is, Dick Pembroke cared not a whit about ghosts or goblins; he was as brave as a lion, above all superstition, and was proceeding to make himself comfortable as rapidly as possible—but he had some secret, very secret plans of his own, which we cannot divulge just now.

And when the brown autumn came, Richard Pembroke moved to warm, genial Maryland. What though the dead leaves strewed the shaded walks, and cracked and rustled crisply beneath his bounding step? What though the sweet wild flowers were withered and pale, and through the dim woods which loomed up beyond the brown meadows the winds bleak and cold were dying with a moan? What though the frost hung blackening on the shrubs, and the dewdrops fell from them in frozen showers, and the many-hued leaves upon every tree and bush blended the gay and beautiful, the mournful and the tender?—His heart was as fresh and green as summer with her bright flowers and singing birds, for he was conscious of a more tender heart, a more enlarged soul, a sweeter hope, a brighter faith. He was living in a delicious dream. Should he awake, it would be with a fearful shudder, a spasm which would rend his heart, destroy his hope and blast his faith. May he not awake! Ah, it is very sweet to love—and Richard Pembroke was in love.

In love with beautiful little Milly Gaybrooke. And she was worthy the affection of any man, and had not cruel fortune deserted her father, crowds of suitors would have been bowing at her shrine. As it was, she had been obliged to refuse two offers from young men who were all very well—good farmers who understood the application of lime and bone-dust thoroughly, but unfortunately lacked a very mysterious and not easily to-be-defined requisite—soul; who had no sympathies for any disease greater than the "hol-low born" or "potato rot," and would by no means think of procuring a wife to perform any purer, higher, nobler duties, than to milk cows, make butter, and drop corn in busy season if help was short. And they asked Milly to marry them in much the same way as they would bid for a pair of short-horns, and were refused, as we before remarked; for, although their adversity had taught poor Milly proper humility, she could not quite crush out the seeds of her early education, and choke out the refinement of heart and feeling which was innate.

She had always treated Pembroke with politeness, but yet with a dignified coldness, which taught him she expected, if he recognized her at all—he, the rich proprietor—it must be as his equal, and at the same time conveyed to him, when he addressed her tenderly, that she would not be foolish enough to engage in any flirtation. Brave heart! Strong, womanly faith! respect follows in thy train. And now the elegant man of the world, he who was wealthy and travelled, and could select with confidence the brightest gem from out the glittering casket of the elite of cities, was timid as a woman when he approached that simple country maiden, and feared and trembled lest she might despise him. He dreamed of her, whispered her name tenderly to the chill autumn winds, almost hoping their harsh gales would carry it to her more softly than he spoke it; blushed when they met like any bumpkin, and if her dress touched his, would think how delicious the slightest contact of the beloved was, and go home to the grim old house, and sitting in the deep embrasure of the window, with the cold moonlight gliding into the deep corners, lighting up some strange carved head or shape, he would dream of her as tenderly and fondly as any school boy, and then run off into a thousand wild fancies of "how complete would this old house be if she were here, if she could but occupy this seat by me, and her merry, musical voice sound through these wide halls." And then he would dash to the blazing fire in the wide fireplace, light the lamps, expel the melancholy moonlight, and smoke religiously until nearly midnight, and tumble through the night with unquiet dreams, but with all he could not forget the fairy Milly.

But the spirits which haunted the old house. Did not Pembroke hear the strange noises which it was alleged drove all its former occupants from the premises? He did, reader, and night after night did he seek a solution of the mystery, but without throwing any light upon the subject. At various hours of the night would he be startled from a quiet slumber by dull, creaking noises, like the drawing back of some old panel from its unused case, or the flashing of strange, flickering lights through the chamber, which would penetrate the shadows here and there, and then suddenly disappear, permeating the darkness and then gradually melting in the gloom; then the sound of footsteps coming and going as though in ordinary occupation, coming nearer and nearer, then ceasing suddenly. On several occasions he had searched every nook and corner of the spacious habitation, expecting at each moment to come suddenly upon the mysterious nocturnal intruder, yet no traces could be found of any human being who could possibly make such noises as he heard. But still, at such times he would instinctively feel that some presence was near—at times he fancied he felt a human breath upon his cheek. But when he paused and searched, his blood would run cold to find himself the only human being awake and restless, wandering at dead of night in this mansion, with his flickering light casting strange shadows over the grotesque mouldings, and carved ancient heads and figures; each one of which seemed at such times to be endowed with myriad eyes, each one of which would start and blink and glare upon him.

But still, when daylight came, and the broad, genial sunlight penetrated his spacious chambers, he would laugh at his foolish fears, and vow that no ghosts or hobgoblins should drive him from the neighborhood of her whom he loved so dearly. But when night again came round he grew uneasy, and prolonged the hours in the lower parts of the house considerably before he retired to his chamber.

It was a blustering, windy night in the latter part of October. Dick Pembroke felt uncommonly lonely upon this night, and pictured to himself a thousand times the figure of Milly Gaybrooke gracing the comfortable vacant chair upon the opposite side of the fireplace, her plump, round arms nestled among the downy soft cushions, her fair, oval face with the faint color growing into deep, happy blushes as her soft, brown eyes looked fondly upon him. Him—faugh! He knew he was growing sentimental as a sixteen-year-old boarding-school miss, but had she not spoken to him so kindly to-day? Had not she relaxed somewhat her coldness? No, Richard T. Pembroke—no! And the fire cracked the negative fiercely out to him, as the last spark died upon the hearth, and he had to go to bed, miserable bachelior, to get rid of solitude. No lights—no fire—if possible no thoughts.

He ascended into his chamber, and after retiring and making himself generally wretched with his thoughts, not one of which originated in common sense, was invested with judgment, or ended in resolution, he fell into an uneasy slumber. It must have been midnight when he awoke, for the old brass clock in the dining-room below, had, with an eccentricity habitual to it, just struck twenty, and he gazed around him timidly, for he seemed to feel that unaccountable presence, which the most of us have experienced without being able to define how our belief originates, and yet we are certain that there is a wakeful, human observer by, as that we have no reason to believe so from optical evidence. So Richard Pembroke felt, and he peered cautiously towards the fireplace. There, the backlog was still burning in a smouldering, defiant sort of way, and ever and anon condescended to throw a fitful light across the wainscoting, from which Pembroke could make out a dim tracery of old beading, which seemed to support some pictures that he had hung there. Then all was obscure again, and sleeping, waking, and dozing off again, Pembroke must have passed another half hour. He awoke partially, stupidly once more. Heavens! what a sight he beheld! When his eyes unclosed, and took in with a waking man's glance the objects in the room, they rested upon a figure standing nearly over him; a light (it seemed to be a small lantern) was held close to his head, partly aside, and flashed a bright, blinding beam full into his eyes, and scarcely could he comprehend his position, ere the figure turned and seemed to float rather than walk to the opposite side of the large apartment. In a moment Pembroke had recovered his presence of mind; he sprang quickly from his bed and darted upon the intruder. He could not escape him now—he was almost to the side of the apartment. Pembroke reached forth his hand to seize the strange visitor by a long cloak that he wore, when suddenly, without a word, with an unusual, excited motion, the pursued seemed to touch some secret spring in the wainscoting, it flew wide apart with a slight, creaking noise, and before the bewildered Pembroke could recover his surprise, the panels shut with a click in his face, much the same as we have seen traps in pantomimes, and silence reigned as profound as though the stillness of night had never been disturbed by any weird presence.
